ARTICLE 43. Accordingly, as soon as possible, uniform arrangements as to management, shall be made, and especially shall uniform regulations be instituted for the police of the railroads. The Empire shall take care that the administrative officers of the railway lines keep the roads always in such a condition as is required for public security, and that they be equipped with the necessary rolling stock.

ARTICLE 44. Railway companies are bound to establish such passenger trains of suitable velocity as may be required for ordinary travel, and for the establishment of harmonizing schedules of travel; also, to make provision for such freight trains as may be necessary for commercial purposes, and to establish, without extra remuneration, offices for the direct forwarding of passengers and freight trains, to be transferred, when necessary, from one road to another.

ARTICLE 45. The Empire shall have control over the tariff of fares. The same shall endeavor to cause—

1. Uniform regulations to be speedily introduced on all German railway lines.

2. The tariff to be reduced and made uniform as far as possible, and particularly to cause a reduction of the tariff for the transport of coal, coke, wood, minerals, stone, salt, crude iron, manure, and similar articles, for long distances, as demanded by the interests of agriculture and industry, and to introduce a one-penny tariff as soon as practicable.

ARTICLE 46. In case of distress, especially in case of an extraordinary rise in the price of provisions, it shall be the duty of the railway companies to adopt temporarily a low special tariff, to be fixed by the Emperor, on motion of the competent committee, for the forwarding of grain, flour, vegetables, and potatoes. This tariff shall, however, not be less than the lowest rate for raw produce existing on the said line.

The foregoing provisions, and those of articles 42 to 45, shall not apply to Bavaria.

The imperial government has, however, the power, also with regard to Bavaria, to establish, by way of legislation, uniform rules for the construction and equipment of such railways as may be of importance for the defense of the country.

ARTICLE 47. The managers of all railways shall be required to obey, without hesitation, requisitions made by the authorities of the empire for the use of their roads for the defense of Germany. Particularly shall the military and all material of war be forwarded at uniform reduced rates.

VIII.—MAILS AND TELEGRAPHS.

ARTICLE 48. The mails and telegraphs shall be organized and managed as state institutions throughout the German Empire. The legislation of the empire in regard to postal and telegraphic affairs, provided for in article 4, does not extend to those matters whose regulation is left to the managerial arrangement, according to the principles which have controlled the North German administration of mails and telegraphs.

ARTICLE 49. The receipts of mails and telegraphs are a joint affair throughout the Empire. The expenses shall be paid from the general receipts. The surplus goes into the treasury of the Empire. (Section 12.)

ARTICLE 50. The Emperor has the supreme supervision of the administration of mails and telegraphs. The authorities appointed by him are in duty bound and authorized to see that uniformity be established and maintained in the organization of the administration and in the transaction of business, as also in regard to the qualifications of employés.

The Emperor shall have the power to make general administrative regulations, and also exclusively to regulate the relations which are to exist between the post and telegraph offices of Germany and those of other countries.

It shall be the duty of all officers of the post-office and telegraph department to obey imperial orders. This obligation shall be included in their oath of office.

The appointment of superior officers (such as directors, counselors, and superintendents,) as they shall be required for the administration of the mails and telegraphs, in the various districts; also the appointment of officers of the posts and telegraphs, (such as inspectors or comptrollers,) acting for the aforesaid authorities in the several districts, in the capacity of supervisors, shall be made by the Emperor for the whole territory of the German Empire, and these officers shall take the oath of fealty to him as a part of their oath of office. The governments of the several states shall be informed in due time, by means of imperial confirmation and official publication, of the aforementioned appointments, so far as they may relate to their territories.

Other-officers required by the department of mails and telegraphs, as also all officers to be employed at the various stations, and for technical purposes, and hence officiating at the actual centers of communication, &c., shall be appointed by the respective governments of the states.

Where there is no independent administration of inland mails or telegraphs, the terms of the various treaties are to be enforced.

ARTICLE 51. In assigning the surplus of the post-office department to the treasury of the Empire for general purposes, (article 49,) the following proceeding is to be observed in consideration of the difference which has heretofore existed in the clear receipts of the post-office departments of the several territories, for the purpose of securing a suitable equalization during the period of transition below named.

Of the post-office surplus, which accumulated in the several mail districts during the five years from 1861 to 1865, an average yearly surplus shall be computed, and the share which every separate mail district has had in the surplus resulting therefrom for the whole territory of the Empire shall be fixed upon by a percentage.

In accordance with the proportion thus made, the several states shall be credited on the account of their other contributions to the expenses of the empire with their quota accruing from the postal surplus in the Empire, for a period of eight years subsequent to their entrance into the post-office department of the empire.

At the end of the said eight years this distinction shall cease, and any surplus in the post-office department shall go, without division, into the treasury of the empire, according to the principle enunciated in article 49.

Of the quota of the post-office department surplus resulting during the aforementioned period of eight years in favor of the Hanseatic towns, one-half shall every year be placed at the disposal of the Emperor, for the purpose of providing for the establishment of uniform post-offices in the Hanseatic towns.

ARTICLE 52. The stipulations of the foregoing articles 48 to 51 do not apply to Bavaria and Wurtemberg. In their stead the following stipulation shall be valid for these two states of the confederation.

The Empire alone is authorized to legislate upon the privileges of the post-office and telegraph departments, on the legal position of both institutions toward the public, upon the franking privilege and rates of postage, and upon the establishment of rates for telegraphic correspondence into Hanseatic towns. Exclusive, however, of managerial arrangements, and the fixing of tariffs for internal communication within Bavaria and Wurtemberg.

In the same manner the Empire shall regulate postal and telegraphic communication with foreign countries, excepting the immediate communication of Bavaria and Wurtemberg with their neighboring states, not belonging to the Empire, in regard to which regulation the stipulations in articles 49 of the postal treaty of November 23, 1867, remains in force.

Bavaria and Wurtemberg shall not share in the postal and telegraphic receipts which belong to the treasury of the Empire.

IX.—MARINE AND NAVIGATION.

ARTICLE 53. The navy of the empire is a united one, under the supreme command of the Emperor. The Emperor is charged with its organization and arrangement, and he shall appoint the officers and officials of the navy, and in his name these and the seamen are to be sworn in.

The harbor of Kiel and the harbor of the Jade are imperial war harbors.

The expenditures required for the establishment and maintenance of the navy and the institutions connected therewith shall be defrayed from the treasury of the Empire.

All sea-faring men of the Empire, including machinists and hands employed in ship-building, are exempt from service in the army, but obliged to serve in the imperial navy.

The apportionment of men to supply the wants of the navy shall be made according to the actual sea-faring population, and the quota furnished in accordance herewith by each state shall be credited to the army account.

ARTICLE 54. The merchant vessels of all states of the confederation shall form a united commercial marine.

The Empire shall determine the process for ascertaining the tonnage of sea-going vessels, shall regulate the issuing of tonnage-certificates and sea-letters, and shall fix the conditions to which a permit for commanding a sea-going vessel shall be subject.

The merchant vessels of all the states of the confederation shall be admitted on an equal footing to the harbors, and to all natural and artificial water-courses of the several states of the confederation, and shall receive the same usage therein.

The duties which shall be collected from sea-going vessels, or levied upon their freights, for the use of naval institutions in the harbors, shall not exceed the amount required for the maintenance and ordinary repair of these institutions.

On all natural water-courses, duties are only to be levied for the use of special establishments, which serve for facilitating commercial intercourse. These duties, as well as the duties for navigating such artificial channels, which are property of the state, are not to exceed the amount required for the maintenance and ordinary repair of the institutions and establishments. These rules apply to rafting, so far as it is carried on on navigable water-courses.

The levying of other or higher duties upon foreign vessels or their freights than those which are paid by the vessels of the federal states or their freights does not belong to the various states, but to the Empire.

ARTICLE 55. The flag of the war and merchant navy shall be black, white, and red.

X.—CONSULAR AFFAIRS.

The Emperor shall have the supervision of all consular affairs of the German Empire, and he shall appoint consuls, after hearing the committee of the federal council on commerce and traffic.

No new state consulates are to be established within the jurisdiction of the German consuls. German consuls shall perform the functions of state consuls for the states of the confederation not represented in their district. All the now existing state consulates shall be abolished, as soon as the organization of the German consulates shall be completed, in such a manner that the representation of the separate interests of all the federal states shall be recognized by the federal council as secured by the German consulates.

XI.—MILITARY AFFAIRS OF THE EMPIRE.

ARTICLE 57. Every German is subject to military duty, and in the discharge of this duty no substitute can be accepted.

ARTICLE 58. The costs and the burden of all the military system of the empire are to be borne equally by all the federal states and their subjects, and no privileges or molestations to the several states or classes are admissible. Where an equal distribution of the burdens cannot be effected in natura without prejudice to the public welfare, affairs shall be equalized by legislation in accordance with the principles of justice.

ARTICLE 59. Every German capable of bearing arms shall serve for seven years in the standing army, ordinarily from the end of his twentieth to the beginning of his twenty-eighth year; the first three years in the army of the field, the last four years in the reserve; during the next five years he shall belong to the militia. In those states of the confederation in which heretofore a longer term of service than twelve years was required by law, the gradual reduction of the required time of service shall take place in such a manner as is compatible with the interests and the war-footing of the army of the empire.

As regards the emigration of men belonging to the reserve, only those provisions shall be in force which apply to the emigration of members of the militia.

ARTICLE 60. The strength of the German army in time of peace shall be, until the 31st December, 1871, one per cent. of the population of 1867, and shall be furnished by the several federal states in proportion to their population. In future the strength of the army in time of peace shall be fixed by legislation.

ARTICLE 61. After the publication of this constitution the full Prussian military system of legislation shall be introduced without delay throughout the Empire, as well the statutes themselves as the regulations, instructions, and ordinances issued for their execution, explanation, or completion; thus, in particular, the military penal code of April 3, 1845; the military orders of the penal court of April 3, 1845; the ordinance concerning the courts of honor of July 20, 1843; the regulations with respect to recruiting, time of service, matters relating to the service and subsistence, to the quartering of troops, claims for damages, mobilizing, &c., for times of peace and war. Orders for the attendance of the military upon religious services is, however, excluded.

When a uniform organization of the German army shall have been established, a comprehensive military law for the Empire shall be submitted to the diet and the federal council for their action in accordance with the constitution.

ARTICLE 62. For the purpose of defraying the expenses of the whole German army, and the institutions connected therewith, the sum of 225 (two hundred and twenty-five) thalers shall be placed at the disposal of the Emperor until the 31st of December, 1871, for each man in the army on the peace-footing, according to article 60. (See section 12.)

After the 31st of December, 1871, the payment of these contributions of the several states to the imperial treasury must be continued. The strength of the army in time of peace, which has been temporarily fixed in article 60, shall be taken as a basis for calculating these amounts until it shall be altered by a law of the Empire.

The expenditure of this sum for the whole army of the empire and its establishments shall be determined by a budget law.

In determining the budget of military expenditures, the lawfully established organization of the imperial army, in accordance with this constitution, shall be taken as a basis.

ARTICLE 63. The total land force of the empire shall form one army, which, in war and in peace, shall be under the command of the Emperor.

The regiments, &c., throughout the whole German army shall bear continuous numbers. The principal colors and the cut of the garments of the Royal Prussian army shall serve as a pattern for the rest of the army. It is left to commanders of contingent forces to choose the external badges, cockades, &c.

It shall be the duty and the right of the Emperor to take care that, throughout the German army, all divisions be kept full and well equipped, and that unity be established and maintained in regard to organization and formation, equipment, and command in the training of the men, as well as in the qualification of the officers. For this purpose the Emperor shall be authorized to satisfy himself at any time of the condition of the several contingents, and to provide remedies for existing defects.

The Emperor shall determine the strength, composition, and division of the Contingents of the imperial army, and also the organization of the militia, and he shall have the right to designate garrisons within the territory of the confederation, as also to call any portion of the army into active service.

In order to maintain the necessary unity in the care, arming, and equipment of all troops of the German army, all orders hereafter to be issued for the Prussian army shall be communicated in due form to the commanders of the remaining contingents by the committee on the army and fortifications, provided for in article 8, No. 1.

ARTICLE 64. All German troops are bound implicitly to obey the orders of the Emperor. This obligation shall be included in the oath of allegiance. The commander-in-chief of a contingent, as well as all officers commanding troops of more than one contingent, and all commanders of fortresses, shall be appointed by the Emperor. The officers appointed by the Emperor shall take the oath of fealty to him. The appointment of generals, or of officers performing the duties of generals, in a contingent force, shall be in each case subject to the approval of the Emperor.

The Emperor has the right with regard to the transfer of officers, with or without promotion, to positions which are to be filled in the service of the Empire, be it in the Prussian army or in other contingents, to select from the officers of all the contingents of the army of the Empire.

ARTICLE 65. The right to build fortresses within the territory of the Empire shall belong to the Emperor, who, according to section 12, shall ask for the appropriation of the necessary means required for that purpose, if not already included in the regular appropriation.

ARTICLE 66. If not otherwise stipulated, the princes of the Empire and the senates shall appoint the officers of their respective contingents, subject to the restriction of article 64. They are the chiefs of all the troops belonging to their respective territories, and are entitled to the honors connected therewith. They shall have especially the right to hold inspections at any time, and receive, besides the regular reports and announcements of changes for publication, timely information of all promotions and appointments concerning their respective contingents.

They shall also have the right to employ, for police purposes, not only their own troops but all other contingents of the army of the Empire who are stationed in their respective territories.

ARTICLE 67. The unexpended portion of the military appropriation shall, under no circumstances, fall to the share of a single government, but at all times to the treasury of the Empire.

ARTICLE 68. The Emperor shall have the power, if the public security of the Empire demands it, to declare martial law in any part thereof, until the publication of a law regulating the grounds, the form of announcement, and the effects of such a declaration, the provisions of the Prussian law of June 4, 1851, shall be substituted therefor. (Laws of 1851, page 451.)

Addition to section XI.

The provisions contained in this section shall go into effect in Bavaria as provided for in the treaty of alliance of November 23, 1870, (Bundesgesetzblatt, 1871, section 9,) under III, section 5, in Württemberg, as provided for in the military convention of November 21-25, 1870, (Bundesgesetzblatt, 1870, section 658.)

XII.—FINANCES OF THE EMPIRE.

ARTICLE 69. All receipts and expenditures of the Empire shall be estimated yearly, and included in the financial estimate. The latter shall be fixed by law before the beginning of the fiscal year, according to the following principles:

ARTICLE 70. The surplus of the previous year, as well as the customs duties, the common excise duties, and the revenues derived from the postal and telegraph service, shall be applied to the defrayal of all general expenditures. In so far as these expenditures are not covered by the receipts, they shall be raised, as long as no taxes of the Empire shall have been established, by assessing the several states of the Empire.

according to their population, the amount of the assessment to be fixed by the chancellor of the Empire in accordance with the budget agreed upon.

ARTICLE 71. The general expenditures shall be, as a rule, granted for one year; they may, however, in special cases, be granted for a longer period. During the period of transition fixed in article 60, the financial estimate, properly classified, of the expenditures of the army shall be laid before the federal council and the diet for their information.

ARTICLE 72. An annual report of the expenditure of all the receipts of the Empire shall be rendered to the federal council and the diet, through the chancellor of the empire.

ARTICLE 73. In cases of extraordinary requirements, a loan may be contracted in accordance with the laws of the Empire, such loan to be granted by the Empire.

Addition to section XII.

Articles 69 and 71 apply to the expenditures for the Bavarian army only according to the provisions of the addition to section XI of the treaty of November 23, 1870; and article 72 only so far as is required to inform the federal council and the diet of the assignment to Bavaria of the required sum for the Bavarian army.

XIII.—SETTLEMENT OF DISPUTES AND MODES OF PUNISHMENT.

ARTICLE 74. Every attempt against the existence, the integrity, the security, or the constitution of the German Empire; finally, any offense committed against the federal council, the diet, a member of the federal council or of the diet, a magistrate or public official of the Empire, while in the execution of his duty, or with reference to his official position, by word, writing, printing, signs, or caricatures, shall be judicially investigated, and upon conviction punished in the several states of the Empire according to the laws therein existing, or which shall hereafter exist in the same, according to which laws a similar offense against any one of the states of the empire, its constitution, legislature, members of its legislature, authorities or officials is to be judged.

ARTICLE 75. For those offenses, specified in article 74, against the German Empire, which, if committed against one of the states of the Empire, would be deemed high treason, the superior court of appeals of the three free Hanseatic towns at Lubeck shall be the competent deciding tribunal in the first and last resort. More definite provisions as to the competency and the proceedings of the superior court of appeals shall be adopted by the legislature of the empire. Until the passage of a law of the Empire, the existing competency of the courts in the respective states of the empire, and the provisions relative to the proceedings of those courts, shall remain in force.

ARTICLE 76. Disputes between the different states of the confederation, so far as they are not of a private nature, and therefore to be decided by the competent authorities, shall be settled by the federal council, at the request of one of the parties. Disputes relating to constitutional matters in those of the states of the confederation whose constitution contains no provision for the settlement of such differences, shall be adjusted by the federal council, at the request of one of the parties, or, if this cannot be done, they shall be settled by the legislative power of the confederation.

ARTICLE 77. If in one of the states of the confederation justice shall be denied, and no sufficient relief can be procured by legal measures, it shall be the duty of the federal council to receive substantiated complaints concerning denial or restriction of justice, which are to be judged according to the constitution and the existing laws of the respective states of the confederation, and thereupon to obtain judicial relief from the confederate government in the matter which shall have given rise to the complaint.

XIV.—GENERAL PROVISION.

Amendments to the constitution shall be made by legislative enactment. They shall be considered as rejected when 14 votes are cast against them in the federal council. The provisions of the constitution of the empire, by which fixed rights of individual states of the confederation are established in their relation to the whole, shall only be modified with the consent of that state of the confederation which is immediately concerned.

AMERICAN LEGATION,
Berlin, May 29, 1871. (Received June 14.)

SIR: To the inquiry when diplomatic relations with France will be resumed, the Foreign Office still answers that the time is not yet definitely known. I shall telegraph to you, according to your directions, as soon as it can be done. I have written to Mr. Washburne, but as yet have received from him no answer.

The German estimate of the number of lives lost in the city of Paris, since the beginning of the French bombardment, including men, women, and children, is fifty thousand. Bodies lie unburied in the streets, and there is no orderly provision for the wounded.

The finances of France occupy public attention. By the treaty of peace Germany is to receive, thirty days after the restoration of order in Paris, five hundred millions of francs, and in the course of the year a milliard more. I am told that an association of European bankers, is disposed to provide for the first payment, receiving French 3 per cent. rentes at 50 per cent., and a commission of 4 per cent. Subscriptions to the loan, at the rate of 50 per cent., are to be opened in all parts of France, and the bankers are to make good the deficiency in the subscription, but to receive the commission of 4 per cent. on the whole; and they are further to have a six months' option of taking the milliard on the same conditions.

The debt of France before the war was about thirteen milliards; add to this the debt incurred by Napoleon in the early part of the war; the debt incurred by Gambetta; the debt incurred by the Versailles government in subduing the insurrection in Paris, and now the five milliards that are promised to Germany, and the aggregate seems more than even a state so wealthy as France can bear. Moreover, the cities and departments of France have large debts of their own. The prospect is very sad for a people which in habits of order and powers of generalization and analysis excelled all others in Europe. I hear from the most intelligent men of Germany ardent wishes for the recovery of France, and the acknowledgment that its peculiar office in the civilization of Europe cannot be made good by any other nation.

AMERICAN LEGATION,
Berlin, May 30, 1871. (Received June 14.)

SIR: I received from you, last evening, an official copy of the treaty of Washington, as published by order of the Senate. The treaty, in whole or in copious abstracts, had already gone through the European papers, and the decision of the Senate was made known by cable as soon as the vote was declared. Justice is everywhere done to the ability and moderation of the American negotiators, and the result is considered in the highest degree, I might almost say in an unexampled degree, honorable to them ; and this opinion is held most strongly by those who understand international relations best.

In efficiency and dignity the conference at Washington contrasts most favorably with the late conference at London on the Pontus question.

Of course I do not as yet officially present the treaty to this government, but await your instructions.

AMERICAN LEGATION,
Berlin, June 5, 1871. (Received June 21.)

SIR : The answer to my informal inquiries when diplomatic relations will be resumed with France is still indefinite. I annex a copy of a note which I have received from Mr. Washburne, who, at my request, made corresponding inquiries at Paris. I think the question will be settled within a few days. The great subject of political interest for the last week has been the bill for establishing a government in the new province of Alsace and Lorraine. Under the old German Empire the free cities, with their domain, stood directly under the protection of the Emperor. In theory, Alsace and Lorraine form a district belonging neither to Prussia nor to any other of the German states, standing directly, not under the King of Prussia, but under the Emperor of Germany. An exact conformity to the old precedents would make of them a republic under the protectorate of the Emperor. Prince Bismarck declared his wish to establish in the new territory self-government in the fullest extent compatible with their forming an integral part of Germany. Especially he was anxious to secure to the new provinces their own legislature, with control over their own internal affairs. In particular he desired to protect them against the interference of the German Parliament in affairs that belonged exclusively to themselves. In the course of the debate incidents in American history were repeatedly introduced as authorities, and our system of concentrating general affairs in the hands of the General Government, and distributing affairs of local interest among the several States, is working itself more and more into German institutions. During the debates there was at one time a fear of some serious difference between the chancellor and the diet; but, while the diet maintained with dignity all its rights as a deliberative body, it manifested, in a remarkable degree, the strength of its attachment to Prince Bismarck, and confidence in his wisdom. Indeed, the relation between the prince and the diet is unique. He has neither a party nor a majority at his bidding, but carries his measures by appeals to the judgment and sentiment of the house. His support comes sometimes from one side, sometimes from another; but on every side he is looked upon as the only possible chief minister for Germany at the present time. He has not only no rival, but nobody is thought of as eventually able to take his place.

I remain, &c., &c.,

GEO. BANCROFT.

Mr. Washburne to Mr. Bancroft.

PARIS, May 31, 1871.

MY DEAR COLLEAGUE: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 22d instant. I thank you for the copy of the dispatch. I had Colonel Hoffman see Mr. Jules Favre on last Monday, and Mr. F. informed him that France was now ready to resume diplomatic relations with the German Empire, and that they were only waiting to find the right man to send to Berlin as minister. He thought that would be in the course of a week or two. While I should be very glad to be relieved of my charge, yet I shall take pleasure in acting for the German government until their minister shall come to my relief. Some few Germans, and a large number of Alsacians, have been arrested in these latter days, and I am occupied in getting them discharged. By good fortune the Prussian embassy has escaped all damage, and I so telegraphed Prince de Bismarck the other day.

I remained here during the whole period of the infernal insurrection, and I saw it go out in fire and blood, and amid scenes which have no parallel in the history of civilization. No consideration on earth, except one of the highest, that of the discharge of a sacred public duty, could ever induce me to go through what I have passed through for the last nine months, and more particularly the last ten weeks. But it is a pleasure for me to know that I have been able to protect the lives and property of all the Americans, and I believe all the Germans, in Paris, but it has been at a fearful risk. The greater part of my labor and responsibility has been in regard to the Germans and Alsacians, and which will, in due time, be made by me the subject of an official dispatch.

The suppression of the insurrection brings with it a military rule (perhaps necessary) of terrible severity. No persons are permitted to leave Paris at present, and I do not know how long people are to be shut in.

As soon as things get quieted down here, and as soon as I am relieved of my German charge, I propose going to Carlsbad for six weeks to recruit my health.

Believe me, &c.,

E. B. WASHBURN.

AMERICAN LEGATION,
Berlin, June 12, 1871. (Received June 29.)

SIR: All Berlin is alive with preparations for the triumphal entry of the Emperor into the capital of Germany on Friday next, and between two and three hundred thousand people from abroad are expected here on the occasion. The most interesting business before the Diet relates to indemnity for losses during the war, and the indemnification is to be carried further than ever before.

Ship-owners whose ships were detained in foreign ports are to receive relief for the extraordinary expenses to which they were exposed. Everything destroyed in Alsace and the German part of Lorraine is to be paid for or rebuilt.

Four millions of thalers are to be set apart for distribution among the generals who have most distinguished themselves in the late war, and this appropriation will be voted by parliament out of the moneys to be received from France. The chancellor of the empire, lately raised to the rank of a prince, will receive a forest in the duchy of Lauenburg, esteemed to be worth one million of thalers. This donation will be made by the King of Prussia as duke of Lauenburg; and the property is so situated that no act of parliament will be needed to confirm the grant.

The diplomatic relations of the new empire are receiving some extension in the east and in the west.

A chargé d'affaires from Japan appeared here not long ago, and fifty-five young Japanese, as he informs me, are now distributed through Germany, diligently engaged in making themselves masters of the German language and culture. The chargé manifested a particular wish to place himself on the best terms with the American legation here. He brought me, however, nothing from your department. The republic of Colombia has sent here Mr. Santa Maria as consul general, with a contingent appointment as chargé. He came immediately to me before presenting himself to the government, declaring that he was instructed to do so by his own government, and appeared to take very great pleasure in representing the close analogy between the constitution of the United States of Colombia and our own. But he brought me no letter whatever from any one, and I have no instruction respecting him from you. His manner implied a very hearty sympathy with our government, and a disposition to lean upon it for moral support.

I have already written you that diplomatic relations between Berlin and Versailles will soon be opened by the mutual appointment of chargés d'affaires. Viscount Gabriac—not he whose wife is an American lady, formerly of New York—is expected before many days. This government has appointed for Versailles Count Waldersee, who was formerly military attaché to the Prussian embassy at Paris. Very few days will elapse before this arrangement will go into effect. So soon as Count Waldersee enters upon his duties, Mr. Washburne can give up his duty of protecting Germans in France. I keep him informed of what passes here on the subject. Count Waldersee leaves for France to-morrow.

AMERICAN LEGATION,
Berlin, June 20, 1871. (Received July 15.)

SIR: Four days of sunshine intervening between periods of incessant rain gave brilliancy to the military entry of the Emperor of Germany into his capital.

The via triumphalis was about three miles long, through streets as wide and in some places thrice as wide as Broadway. Lines of cannon captured from the French were ranged in close order on each side of the way, and the whole line of march was through an allée of flag-staffs garlanded and festooned with oak-leaves and evergreens. The flags, as they represented Germany and its several States, were of all colors, and all harmoniously contrasted and blended. The best talent of the sculptors and painters of Berlin was called into requisition, and, under the hands of men of genius, the coarsest linen, stuffed with straw and covered with gypsum, produced in the distance the effect of marble, and, near at hand, that of casts of beautiful statues. At the starting point of the march, a gigantic image, representing the city of Berlin, gave the welcome to the returning troops. Midway on the line of march a colossal victory, having on her right hand and left statues of Strasburg and Metz, in sitting posture, was much admired. At the end, a Germania receiving back into her arms Alsace and Lorraine, on a pedestal encircled by bas-reliefs, was generally thought a design worthy of being perpetuated in bronze or marble. In the street Unter den Linden skillfully executed historical and allegorical pictures, of enormous dimensions, hung across the avenue along which the army was to pass. The Academy of Arts was conspicuous by well-executed full-length portraits of the Emperor, Bismarck, and the generals. Altogether the decorations were never paltry or common-place, but the designs showed, on the part of the artists, felicity and fertility of invention. The Emperor, now in his seventy-fifth year, rode out to his troops at 10 o'clock, returned at the head of forty thousand men, and, in the scorching sun, received the salutations of all the regiments as they passed by him, and then superintended the unveiling of the statue of his father, remaining on horseback more than six hours, and in all that time showing no sign of fatigue. The spectacle was not inferior to the Roman triumphs of old, except, indeed, that prisoners did not form a part of the procession, and that no other spoils were exhibited beyond captured eagles and banners, and trophies gained in battle. The pageant had for its spectators, besides the citizens of Berlin, three or four hundred thousand strangers, gathered from Germany and almost every part of the civilized world.

The United States were much more largely represented than any other foreign country. In this latitude, where twilight lingers late into the night, the illumination was necessarily short, but very brilliant and universal. No inhabited hut was so poor as not to join in it. At the gala performance in the opera on Saturday evening, the Emperor and Empress appeared, surrounded by their children and the various branches of their family, and by many members of the regal and princely houses of Germany; pit, balcony, and boxes were filled, chiefly with the most distinguished generals who have taken part in the war, high officials of the kingdom and empire, and members of their families. Those of our sex glittered each in what Shakespeare calls "a mine of gold," those of the other sparkled in clusters and rivers of diamonds and precious stones. Of the two pieces that were performed, the first represented Justice as having done its work in the late war, and now introducing Peace attended by all the Seasons and all the Arts. The second showed Barbarossa spell-bound in his cave, dreaming on till the empire should be restored, and seeing in his visions what the spectators saw in tableaux vivants, the epoch-making incidents of German history, from the crusades, and early humble fortunes of the younger branch of the Hohenzollerns, to the moment when its chief was upborne at Versailles as Emperor by the arms of the princes of Germany. Sunday was the day of thanksgiving. Two or three months ago a good deal was spoken of a fast in commemoration of those who had fallen in the war, but the feeling of joy could not be restrained; men thought the union and peace of Germany not too dearly bought by the loss of many of the best, and that it should therefore be celebrated not by mourning, but by a festival. The days of triumph being past, Berlin, after almost a full year of intensest excitement, falls back into its normal quietude in midsummer, only with a feeling of security such as it never had before. On the other hand, France still remains in an unsettled state, in danger of being torn by dynastic factions. As a republic, if its government were well established, it would again recover its influence. But almost the only French institution which has passed through the war unscathed is the organized Catholic church. The archbishops, bishops, priests, and inferior clergy are all there as before. The archbishop of Paris, who had fallen under suspicion, is venerated as an orthodox martyr. The liberal Père Hyacinthe pleads for hours together for the civil dominion of the Pope, and the clerical party strains its influence for the restoration of the Pope in Italy and the Bourbons at home. But France will never submit to the rule of Jesuits. Any dynasty that might return to power would represent, not the country, but a faction or party. Nothing can so well unite France as a well-organized republic, and yet even a republic is not sure of support from a majority of the cultivated classes, or of the nation. Everything there is heaving and tossing in uncertain expectation, while here the world moves on in tranquillity which nothing now within view is likely to disturb. The Emperor, in his old age, finds himself happy in the love and confidence of his whole people.

SIR: I transmit to you herewith the draft of a note which, in conjunction with the representative of Her Britannic Majesty, you will present to the government of the Emperor of Germany, in pursuance of the thirty-fourth article of a treaty signed at Washington on the 8th of May, 1871, of which a copy is herewith sent, requesting that His Imperial Majesty will be pleased to act as arbitrator in a question which has arisen between the Governments of the United States and of Great Britain, in regard to a line of boundary between the Territories of the United States and those of Her Britannic Majesty, under the first article of the treaty concluded at Washington on the 15th of June, 1846, a copy of which is also sent to you. You will accordingly arrange with your British colleague for the simultaneous presentation of your respective notes.

I am, &c.,

HAMILTON FISH.

Draft of note to be presented to the government of the Emperor of Germany.

The Government of the United States and the government of Her Britannic Majesty having agreed, by a treaty signed at Washington on the 8th of May, 1871, of which a copy is hereunto annexed, together with a copy of the previous treaty of June 15, 1846, herein referred to, to submit to the arbitration and award of His Majesty the Emperor of Germany the decision of the question set forth in the thirty-fourth article of the first-named treaty, in the following words: "Whereas it was stipulated by article I of the treaty concluded at Washington on the 15th of June, 1846, between Her Britannic Majesty and the United States, that the line of boundary between the Territories of the United States and those of Her Britannic Majesty, from the point on the forty-ninth parallel of north latitude up to which it had already been ascertained, should be continued westward along the said parallel of north latitude to the middle of the channel which separates the continent from Vancouver's Island, and thence southerly through the middle of the said channel and of Fuca Straits to the Pacific Ocean; and whereas the commissioners appointed by the two high contracting parties to determine that portion of the boundary which runs southerly through the middle of the channel aforesaid were unable to agree upon the same; and whereas the government of Her Britannic Majesty claims that such boundary line should, under the terms of the treaty above recited, be run through the Rosario Straits, and the Government of the United States claims that it should be run through the Canal de Haro, it is agreed that the respective claims of the Government of the United States and of the government of Her Britannic Majesty shall be submitted to the arbitration and award of His Majesty the Emperor of Germany, who, having regard to the above-mentioned article of the said treaty, shall decide thereupon finally, and without appeal, which of those claims is most in accordance with the true interpretation of the treaty of June 15, 1846;" and the high contracting parties reposing entire confidence in the spirit of justice and impartiality which distinguish His Imperial Majesty, the common friend of the two states, having agreed, in pursuance of the said treaty, to address themselves to His Imperial Majesty, and having further mutually engaged, in the event of His Imperial Majesty being willing to afford his good offices as arbitrator on this occasion, to consider the award of His Majesty as absolutely final and conclusive, and to give effect to the same without any objection, evasion, or delay whatsoever, the undersigned has received the orders of his Government to communicate to His Imperial Majesty the treaty which has thus been made on the part of the Government of the United States, and to express the President's earnest desire that His Imperial Majesty will be pleased to take upon him the office of arbitrator in the question. The undersigned has the honor to request His Serene Highness the Prince Bismarck to lay this communication before His Majesty the Emperor of Germany, and to be pleased to make known to the undersigned His Imperial Majesty's determination with regard to his acceptance of the desired arbitration.

SIR: The German secretary of state has notified to me and to the British legation that the Emperor of Germany accepts the office of arbitrator on our northwestern boundary question. I suppose I am acting entirely in harmony with your wishes in proposing to the British legation a very early attention to the subject, in the hope that we may speedily bring the matter to a conclusion and an award. Should any delay occur, I will take care that the fault shall not be on our side. I venture to expect an award in our favor. I have watched for a quarter of a century the course of this negotiation. In all that time the present administration is the first that has taken the subject in hand from a right point of view, and if a favorable award is obtained it will be mainly due to the form of arbitration which you established by the treaty of Washington.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE AND THE GERMAN LEGATION AT WASHINGTON.

No. 180.

Mr. Fish to Baron Gerolt.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, November 21, 1870.

The undersigned, Secretary of State of the United States, duly received the note of the 4th instant, with the accompanying documents addressed to him by Baron Gerolt, envoy and minister plenipotentiary of the North German Union, relative to intercourse between the diplomatic representatives in Paris of the governments of neutral states and their respective governments. In that communication it is assumed that, Paris being in a state of siege by the German forces, the latter have a belligerent right under the public law to cut off all intercourse between the diplomatic representatives of foreign powers there and their governments at home; or, if such intercourse should be allowed at all, that the besieging forces may prescribe the conditions upon which it shall be permitted. The right seems further to be claimed upon the alleged impropriety of diplomatic agents continuing to reside in a beleaguered city which contains persons in authority whose title thereto has not been recognized by the assailant.

The undersigned, after a careful consideration of the subject, and with every disposition to acknowledge the just and necessary belligerent rights of the blockading force, cannot acquiesce in the pretension set up on behalf of that force. It is true that, when such a force invests a fortified place with a view to its reduction, one of the means usually relied upon for that purpose is the interruption of ordinary communication by messengers or by letters. This is acknowledged to be not only a belligerent right, but also one incident to the actual sovereignty over the enemy's territory occupied by the assailant adjacent to the blockaded place. Paris, however, is the capital of France. There the diplomatic representatives of neutral states had their official residence prior to the investment. If they think proper to stay there while it lasts, they must expect to put up with the inconveniences necessarily incident to their choice. Among these, however, the stopping of communication with their governments cannot be recognized. The right of embassy to a belligerent state is one which it is both the duty and the interest of its enemies to acknowledge, and to permit the exercise of in every usual or proper way. If this right should be denied, or unduly curtailed, wars might be indefinitely prolonged, and general peace would be impracticable.

The privilege of embassy necessarily carries with it that of employing messengers between the embassy and its government. This is a privilege universally recognized by publicists. There is no exception or reservation made for the case of an embassy having its abode in a blockaded place. Indeed, the denial of the right of correspondence between a diplomatic agent in such a place and his government seems tantamount to insisting that he cannot elect to be a neutral, but must be regarded as an adversary if he continues to stay there, especially when the legitimacy of the authority of those directing the resistance is denied by the other assailant.

The opposite course, which it has suited the convenience of some neutral government to adopt, is obviously liable to be construed, partly, at least, the occasion of withholding the privilege of correspondence. Should this be a correct view of the case, no independent state, claiming to be a free agent in all things, could, in self-respect, acquiesce in a proceeding actuated by such a motive. The undersigned does not charge the government of the North German Union with being so actuated, but deems himself warranted in thus referring to the point, as it is adverted to by the representative of that government both at Berlin and before Paris.

The undersigned is consequently directed to claim that the right of correspondence between the representatives of neutral powers at Paris and their governments is a right sanctioned by public law, which cannot justly be withheld without assigning other reasons therefor than those which have hitherto been advanced. The burden of proof of the sufficiency of those reasons in furtherance of the belligerent rights of the assailant must be borne by him. While, however, the undersigned is directed to claim the right as due to all neutrals, he will not omit to acknowledge the partial exception made in favor of the minister of the United States for the reasons assigned.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to Baron Gerolt the assurance of his very high consideration.

To the Northern German Legation, Washington, D. C.:

The treatment of German merchant ships by France obliges us to revoke the declaration made by us at the beginning of the war, "exempting all French merchant vessels, not carrying contraband of war articles, from capture by our war-vessels."

As neutral property may have been shipped on board of French vessels in confidence of the above declaration, the new measure will not be carried into effect until four weeks after this date.

BISMARCK.

No. 182.

Mr. Fish to Baron Gerolt.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 14, 1871.

The undersigned, Secretary of State of the United States, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note of Baron Gerolt, the envoy and minister plenipotentiary of the North German Union of the 14th instant, inclosing a translation of a telegram from Count Bismarck, of the 13th instant, to the North German legation at Washington, in the following words:

The treatment of German merchant ships by France obliges us to revoke the declaration made by us at the beginning of the war, exempting all French merchant vessels, not carrying contraband of war articles, from capture by our war-vessels.

As neutral property may have been shipped on board of French vessels in confidence of the above declaration, the new measure will not be carried into effect until four weeks after this date.

In informing Baron Gerolt that the information so communicated will be made public, the undersigned has the honor further to express the great regret with which the Government of the United States receives the information that circumstances have arisen which in the opinion of the government of North Germany justifies its withdrawal from a position which the Government of the United States regarded with very great satisfaction, as taken in the best interests of civilization.

The telegram from Count Bismarck which was communicated to the undersigned by Baron Gerolt on the 19th day of July last was in the following language:

Private property on high seas will be exempted from seizure by His Majesty's ships, without regard to reciprocity.

The notice now communicated to the undersigned by Baron Gerolt relates in terms to French merchant vessels, and makes no mention of American merchant vessels. To avoid misapprehension and future difficulty, the undersigned has the honor to inquire of Baron Gerolt whether the merchant vessels of the United States are to continue exempt from seizure, or whether they are to be considered at the expiration of the term named as relegated to their rights under the 13th article of the treaty of 1799 between the United States and Prussia, which was revived by the 12th article of the treaty of 1828.

ARTICLE XIII.

And in the same case of one of the contracting parties being engaged in war with any other power, to prevent all the difficulties and misunderstandings that usually arise respecting merchandise of contraband, such as arms, ammunition, and military stores of every kind, no such articles carried in the vessels, or by the subjects or citizens of either party, to the enemies of the other, shall be deemed contraband, so as to induce confiscation or condemnation and a loss of property to individuals. Nevertheless, it shall be lawful to stop such vessels and articles, and to detain them for such length of time as the captors may think necessary to prevent the inconvenience or damage that might ensue from their proceeding, paying however a reasonable compensation for the loss such arrest shall occasion to the proprietors; and it shall further be allowed to use in the service of the captors the whole or any part of the military stores so detained, paying the owners the full value of the same, to be ascertained by the current price at the place of its destination. But in the case supposed of a vessel stopped for articles of contraband, if the master of the vessel stopped will deliver out the goods supposed to be of contraband nature, he shall be admitted to do it, and the vessel shall not in that case be carried into any port, nor further detained, but shall be allowed to proceed on her voyage.

All cannons, mortars, fire-arms, pistols, bombs, grenades, bullets, balls, muskets, flints, matches, powder, saltpeter, sulphur, cuirasses, pikes, swords, belts, cartouch boxes, saddles, and bridles, beyond the quantity necessary for the use of the ship, or beyond that which every man serving on board the vessel, or passenger, ought to have; and in general whatever is comprised under the denomination of arms and military stores, of what description soever, shall be deemed objects of contraband.

The undersigned, &c.,

No. 183.

Baron Gerolt to Mr. Fish.

LEGATION OF THE NORTH GERMAN UNION,
Washington, January 16, 1871. (Received January 17.)

The undersigned, envoy and minister plenipotentiary of the North German Union, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note of the Hon. Hamilton Fish, Secretary of State of the United States, bearing date of the 14th instant, in which, in reply to the communication of the undersigned of the 13th instant, in relation to the revocation of the declaration made by the North German Union at the commencement of the war with France, for the protection of all private property at sea, the honorable Secretary expresses the deep regret of the Government of the United States that the North German government has thought itself justified, by circumstances of subsequent occurrence, in abandoning a position taken for the best interests of civilization, which had been hailed by the Government of the United States with so great satisfaction.

The undersigned thinks it his duty to remind the Hon. Hamilton Fish that that position of North Germany, and the recognition of the freedom of all private property at sea, with the exception of contraband articles, was formerly taken, and maintained by Prussia and Austria in their war with Denmark, as well as in the war between Prussia and Austria, and that only extraordinary and unforeseen circumstances in the present war between Germany and France could have induced the German government to abandon that position, since French vessels of war, under the direction of the present authorities of France, have, in violation of all international law, captured and burned German vessels upon the high seas, within the jurisdiction of neutral powers, of which the undersigned had the honor to inform the honorable Secretary of State on the 15th of December last, by reading the dispatch of Count Bismarck in relation thereto. In regard to the inquiry contained in the note of the Hon. Hamilton Fish of the 14th instant, whether the merchant vessels of the United States, after the inauguration of the new measure, would still be protected from capture, as before, and would be treated according to article XII of the treaty of 1828 between Prussia and the United States, the undersigned can only express his conviction that all rights which are guaranteed by treaty to the United States by the North German government will remain intact, as heretofore. Still, in order to avoid any misunderstanding on the subject, the undersigned thinks it his duty to express the opinion that in all cases contraband articles cannot be excluded from the provisions of the above-mentioned article XII, and that if in the telegram mentioned by the Honorable Secretary of State from Count Bismarck, dated July 19, 1870, viz, "Private property on the high seas will be exempted from seizure by His Majesty's ships without regard to reciprocity," articles contraband of war are not excepted there from, as was done in the last telegram of the 13th instant, that exception might be considered as a matter of course, especially since in article XIII of the treaty of 1799, which was superseded by the treaty of 1828, the contraband articles are enumerated, which are to be treated according to the provisions of the treaty.

The undersigned will, however, hasten to obtain from his Government a distinct declaration with regard to the words, and the sense of the aforesaid telegram of July 19, 1870, and he avails himself of this occasion, &c.

FR. v. GEROLT.

No. 184.

Mr. Fish to Baron Gerolt.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 19, 1871.

The undersigned, Secretary of State of the United States, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note which Baron Gerolt, envoy and minister plenipotentiary of the North German Union, did him the honor, on the 16th instant, to address to him upon the revocation of the declaration made by the North German Government at the commencement of the war with France, for the protection of all private property at sea. Baron Gerolt apparently labors under a mistake in supposing that the undersigned, in his note of the 14th instant, inquired whether the merchant vessels of the United States would, after the inauguration of the new measures, still be protected from capture as before, and would be treated according to the provisions of the treaty between Prussia and the United States which was cited by the undersigned.

The undersigned was unfortunate in the use of language in his note of the 14th instant, if it is capable of being construed as implying any doubt of the purpose of the government of His Majesty the King of Prussia, or of the government of North Germany, to observe faithfully its treaty obligations toward the United States. The telegram of Count Bismarck communicated to the undersigned by Baron Gerolt on the 14th instant, related to terms to French vessels alone.

It was the object of the undersigned to ascertain whether the vessels of the United States were to continue at liberty to transport contraband of war without liability to seizure, in accordance with the terms of the notice communicated to the undersigned on the 19th of July last. If it should appear that it was the purpose of the North German government to withdraw the privilege so conceded, it would follow that the vessels of the United States would be remitted to the rights secured to them by the treaty cited in the undersigned's note of the 14th instant. The undersigned hopes to receive at an early day information on this subject which may be made public.

The undersigned observes with some surprise that Baron Gerolt thinks that it might be considered as a matter of course that articles contraband of war were not intended to be embraced among the items of "private property on the high seas to be exempted from seizure," under the notice of the 19th of July last. The undersigned takes the liberty to refer Baron Gerolt to the very precise language in the telegram of Count Bismarck, and to say that it seems to the undersigned scarcely probable or even possible that a statesman so distinguished as Count Bismarck, and so accurate in the choice of words to express his meaning, would have failed to set forth so important an exception, had he not intended to extend the exemption from seizure to all private property.

The undersigned has the honor, &c.,

LEGATION OF THE NORTH GERMAN UNION,
Washington, January 20, 1871. (Received January 21.)

The undersigned, envoy and minister plenipotentiary of the North German Union, has had the honor to receive the note of the Hon. Hamilton Fish, Secretary of State of the United States, of the 19th instant, and has thereby seen, with regret, that his understanding of the meaning of the telegram from the chancellor of the Union, of July 19, 1870, mentioned in his note of the 16th instant, does not agree with the Hon. Hamilton Fish's interpretation of the same, and that he does not seem to have correctly understood the inquiry made in the note of the 14th instant.

The undersigned has already, on the 16th instant, reported this matter to his government, and asked for instructions concerning the interpretation of the two telegrams from Count von Bismarck, the one of July 19, of last year, and the other of the 13th of the present month, and has requested that a reply may be sent to him by telegraph.

The undersigned therefore hopes soon to be enabled to answer the inquiry made by the honorable Secretary of State in his note of the 19th instant, and he avails himself of this occasion, &c.

LEGATION OF THE NORTH GERMAN UNION,
Washington, February 9, 1871. (Received February 10.)

The note of the Hon. Hamilton Fish, of the 9th of January last, to the undersigned, in relation to the treatment of American merchant vessels by North German vessels of war after the revocation of the declaration of the North German government of July 19, 1870, asked:

"Whether vessels of the United States were to continue at liberty to transport contraband of war without liability to seizure, in accordance with the terms of the notice communicated to the undersigned on the 19th of July last?"

The undersigned therefore inquired of his government concerning this matter on the 20th of January last, and has this day received the following telegraphic dispatch from Count Bismarck:

"Our action in relation to American vessels is, of course, governed by the treaty of 1799. A written reply will be sent."

This reply will doubtless contain a full discussion of the question raised by the honorable Secretary of State, and the undersigned will not fail to communicate the same to the honorable Secretary in due time.

The undersigned has the honor, &c.

The undersigned, envoy and minister plenipotentiary of the North German Union, has the honor, in accordance with instructions received, most respectfully to transmit to the Hon. Hamilton Fish, Secretary of State of the United States, copies of the following documents:

1st. A letter addressed by the Swiss envoy, Kern, and several other diplomatic agents, formerly accredited in Paris, under date of the 13th ultimo, to the chancellor of the Union, in which the adoption of measures is proposed which may allow the countrymen of the signers to go with their property during the siege to a place of safety.

2d. The reply thereto of Count von Bismarck, dated the 17th ultimo.

The undersigned gladly avails himself of this additional occasion to renew to the Hon. Hamilton Fish the expression of his most distinguished consideration.

A 377.

COUNT: For several days large numbers of shells, from the localities occupied by the besieging troops, have fallen in the interior of the city of Paris. Women, children, and invalids have been struck. Among the victims, several belong to neutral states. The lives and property of persons of every nationality established at Paris are constantly jeopardized.

These facts have occurred without any previous notice having been given to the undersigned, (most of whom have, at the present time, no mission save that of watching over the safety and interests of their countrymen,) to enable them to warn their countrymen of the dangers with which they are threatened, and from which motives of vis major, particularly the difficulties placed in the way of their departure by the belligerents, have prevented them from escaping.

In the face of events of so grave a nature, the members of the diplomatic corps at Paris, who have been joined by the undersigned members of the consular corps, in their respective embassies and legations, have thought necessary, in view of their responsibility to their governments, and with a keen sense of the duties incumbent upon them toward their countrymen, to come to an understanding in relation to the determination to be adopted.

These deliberations have led the undersigned to the unanimous resolution of asking that, in accordance with the recognized usages and principles of international law, measures may be taken to permit their countrymen to retire to a place of safety with their property.

Confidently expressing the hope that your excellency will be pleased to intervene near the military authorities for the furtherance of their request, the undersigned avail themselves of this occasion to beg you to accept the assurances of their very high consideration.

His Excellency COUNT BISMARCK-SCHÖNHAUSEN,

VERSAILLES, January 17, 1871.

MR. MINISTER: I have had the honor to receive the letter of the 13th instant, signed by yourself and the American envoy, together with various other diplomats formerly accredited in Paris, wherein the request is made to me, with an appeal to the law of nations, to intervene near the military authorities to the end that measures may be taken to permit the countrymen of the signers to retire with their property to a place of safety during the siege which has been commenced.

I regret my inability to reach the conviction that the request which the signers have done me the honor to address me, is based upon international law.

The unusual measure, which stands alone in the history of modern times, of changing the capital of a great country into a fortress, and its environs, with nearly three millions of inhabitants, into a fortified camp, has certainly been followed by a very unusual and lamentable state of things. For this those persons are responsible, who have selected this capital and its environs as a fortress and field of battle, but it must be borne in every fortress by those who voluntarily take up their abode therein and retain it during the war. Paris is the most important stronghold in the country, and France has assembled her principal armies therein; these attack the German forces from their secure position in the midst of the population of Paris, by means of sallies and artillery-fire. In view of these facts, it cannot be expected that the German commanders should refrain from attacking the stronghold, or from conducting the attack in a manner suited to the object of every siege.

Whatever could be done to preserve the neutral portion of the population of Paris from the ills and dangers of the siege, has been done by the Germans. By a circular of the secretary of the state, Mr. Von Thile, of the 26th of September last, the envoys accredited in Berlin, and by my communication of October 10, his eminence the Papal nuncio and the other members of the diplomatic corps still remaining in France at that time, were reminded that the inhabitants of Paris would thenceforth be subject to the course of military events. In a second circular, of October 4, reference was made to the consequences which must arise to the non-fighting population, from a resistance carried to the utmost; and I communicated the contents of this circular, on the 29th of the same month, to the envoy of the United States in Paris, requesting him to bring the same to the notice of the other members of the diplomatic corps. There has, therefore, been no lack of warning to neutrals to leave the besieged city, although the issue of such warnings and the permission to leave the city are dictated by a feeling of humanity, and by consideration for the citizens of neutral and friendly nations, but by no means by a principle of international law. Still less is the obligation, founded upon law or custom, of giving previous notice to the besieged of the particular military operations which are contemplated, as I had the honor to state, in reference to the bombardment, in my letter addressed on the 26th of September last, to Mr. J. Favre. It was to be expected that the city would be bombarded if resistance was continued. Vattel says, although he had no instance of a fortified city like Paris before his eyes, with such great armies and munitions of war:

"The destruction of a city by bomb-shells and hot shot is an extreme measure which should not be adopted without very strong reasons. But it is nevertheless authorized by the laws of war, when it is otherwise impossible to reduce an important place on which the success of the war may depend, or which serves to inflict dangerous blows upon us."

A well-founded objection to the bombardment of Paris is so much the less admissible, as it is not our intention to destroy the city, as Vattel considers allowable, but only to render the strong central position untenable, in which the French armies prepare their attacks upon the German troops, and in which they find shelter after having accomplished the same.

Finally, I take the liberty of reminding your excellency, and the other signers of your favor of the 13th instant, that in accordance with the above-mentioned notifications and warnings from us, all neutrals who desired it were allowed, for months, to pass through our lines without any conditions save the establishment of their identity and nationality, and that up to this day, not only have members of the diplomatic corps, but also other neutrals, when this was requested by their governments or envoys, received permits to pass our outposts.

Many of the gentlemen who signed the letter of the 13th instant were notified by us months ago that they could pass our lines, and they have long been in possession of the permission of their governments to leave Paris. Hundreds of citizens of neutral states are in a similar situation, men for whom permission to depart has been asked of us by their envoys. We have no official information why these persons have made no use of the authorization to leave which was so long since granted to them, and of which it has so long been in their power to avail themselves. I may, however, conclude, from reliable private correspondence, that the French authorities have for a long time refused permission to leave to the citizens of neutral states, and to the diplomatic agents of the same. If this is the case, it would be proper for those forced to remain in Paris to present their protest to the authorities there. At all events, I am justified, in view of the foregoing, in contradicting so far as the German army is concerned the assertion made in the letter of the 13th instant that neutrals have been prevented from escaping from the dangers by the difficulties placed in their way by the belligerents. The permission granted to the members of the diplomatic corps we shall continue, as a matter of international courtesy, however difficult and annoying this may be in the present state of siege. In order to free your numerous countrymen from the dangers which are inseparably connected with a state of siege, I have now, to my regret, no means left save the taking of Paris. We are in the painful situation of not being able to subordinate our military action to our feelings of compassion for the sufferings of the non-fighting population. Our course is distinctly marked out to us by the law of war and by the duty of protecting the German army against new attacks from the army of Paris.

That the German artillery does not intentionally fire upon buildings designed to shelter women, children, and invalids, it is scarcely necessary to assert, in view of the conscientiousness with which the Geneva convention has been observed by us, even under the most difficult circumstances. On account of the style of architecture in the city, and the distance from which the batteries still fire, a casual injury to such buildings is with difficulty avoided, as is also the wounding or killing of non-combatants, who, in every siege, are greatly to be pitied. The fact that painful and, by us, deeply-regretted events must be connected with a siege in a city like Paris to a greater extent than in other strongholds, should have deterred the authorities of the city from fortifying or from making an obstinate defense. But no nation can be permitted to make war upon its neighbors, and, in the course of the same, to endeavor to protect its main stronghold by pointing to the unarmed and neutral inhabitants residing therein, and to the hospitals, in the midst of which the armed forces, after every attack, may seek shelter and prepare for new attacks.

I most respectfully request your excellency to be pleased to bring this reply to the notice of your fellow-signers of the letter of the 13th instant, and to be pleased to accept the renewed assurance of my most distinguished consideration.

(Received from Baron Gerolt March 21.)

Mr. Bancroft has had the kindness to communicate to Mr. von Thile an extract from a dispatch of Mr. Fish, Secretary of State, whereby he is directed to present the congratulations of His Excellency the President on the union of the German States under a common constitution and on the renewal of the empire in Germany. I have brought this communication to the notice of His Majesty the Emperor and King, who has received it with lively satisfaction. He directs you to thank His Excellency the President, and to assure him that he also feels confident that the German Empire, re-established upon a federative basis, will afford a guarantee for the peace of the world. His Majesty sees an indication of the fulfillment of this hope in the friendly relations which have always uninterruptedly existed between Germany and America, and in the congratulations which have just been offered by His Excellency the President.

You will, in accordance with this most high order, express yourself to Mr. Fish in the sense of this dispatch, and hand him a copy of the same, if he desires it.

LEGATION OF THE NORTH GERMAN UNION,
 Washington, March 1, 1871. (Received March 2.)

With reference to his note of the 9th of February last in regard to the treatment of articles contraband of war which are found on board of American vessels during the war between Germany and France, the undersigned, envoy and minister plenipotentiary of the North German Union, has the honor to transmit to the Hon. Hamilton Fish, Secretary of State of the United States, a copy of the dispatch which the Chancellor of the Union, Count von Bismarck, has prepared in reply to the notes (of the 14th and 19th of January last) of the honorable Secretary of State to the undersigned in relation to this matter. Count Bismarck to Baron Gerolt,

VERSAILLES, February 9, 1871.

With your excellency's kind reports of the 16th and 20th ultimo I have had the honor to receive a copy of the correspondence between the Secretary of State, Mr. Fish, and yourself, in relation to the treatment of private property at sea. In amplification of my telegraphic reply of the 8th instant I have most respectfully to say as follows:

When I sent my telegram of the 19th of July last, viz:

"Private property on high seas will be exempted from seizure by His Majesty's ships without regard to reciprocity,"

I supposed that it would be understood as it could only be intended, according to international usages, and particularly according to the principles which have hitherto been advocated by the United States—that is to say, as the reply to a definite question long since propounded in the writings of publicists and in diplomatic correspondence. I think myself all the more authorized to entertain this supposition, as the Government of the United States itself has transferred the question from publicistic to diplomatic ground. The cabinet of President Pierce presented two principles to the consideration of all maritime powers after the outbreak of the Crimean war, viz, that the neutral flag should cover peace-property, except contraband of war, and that all neutral property on board of merchant vessels of belligerent states, except contraband of war, should not be liable to condemnation. It was on account of this initiative that the powers represented at the Paris congress made the treatment of private property at sea the object of a deliberation and resolution, and adopted both principles. The Government of the United States having been asked to give its acquiescence to the four points of the Parisian declaration, declared its readiness to do so only on condition that the property of subjects of a belligerent state should be exempt from capture at sea by the war-vessels of the other party, contraband of war excepted. I take the liberty of referring to these occurrences because I had them in mind in writing my telegram of the 19th of July last, and they explain why I did not particularly mention the presumptive exception of contraband of war in a telegram designed for your instruction. That the North German Union has renounced the right of capture of war material, which is to be conveyed in French or neutral vessels to the enemy, has not been inferred by neutral states from the communication of the same import which has been sent to them. They have therein seen only the proclamation of the principle of "the freedom of private property at sea," to the extent to which this principle, at the instance of the United States, has occupied public opinion on both sides of the ocean since the Crimean war.

We regret that the course of the French war-navy has rendered it impossible for us longer to carry out the intention which we expressed at the beginning of the war. If the American Government could successfully use its influence with that of France so the French cruisers would spare private property, but especially that they would no longer destroy German merchant vessels, but take their prizes into a port and subject them to the decision of a court, we would be willing, in return for such a concession in the interest of the advancement of international questions relating to private property at sea, to revoke the order for the capture of such French merchant vessels as have no articles contraband of war on board. Our action towards American vessels will, as a matter of course, be in accordance with the provisions of the treaty of 1799, and this is a question which is independent of the instructions which German vessels of war receive for their guidance during the continuation of a war with other states.

Your excellency will have the kindness to send to the Secretary of State, Mr. Fish, a copy of this dispatch.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, March 9, 1871.

The undersigned has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note of Baron Gerolt of the 1st instant, with which the Baron did him the honor to transmit a copy of the dispatch of the Chancellor of the North German Union dated 9th February last.

The termination of the war in which the North German Union has lately been engaged happily removes from the questions to which the Chancellor's dispatch and the correspondence between the undersigned and Baron Gerolt alluded to therein relate, any present practical significance.

The undersigned notes, however, the qualification which it appears was intended to be attached to the decree of the 19th of July last, viz, "Private property on the high seas will be exempted from seizure by His Majesty's ships without regard to reciprocity."

And with reference to the concluding passage of Count Bismarck's dispatch of 9th of February, the undersigned takes pleasure in saying that the confidence of this Government never allowed a doubt that the action of North Germany toward American vessels would be in accordance with the provisions of existing treaties.

The undersigned, envoy and minister plenipotentiary of the North German Union, has the honor, in accordance with instructions received, most respectfully to transmit to the Hon. Hamilton Fish, Secretary of State of the United States, a copy of a dispatch of the 19th ultimo, whereby his highness the chancellor of the German Empire informs the maritime powers of the conduct of the French war-navy toward the German corvette Augusta, in the Spanish port of Vigo, of the opinion entertained by the Imperial German government of this conduct, as well as of the reasons for which said government did not make said conduct the subject of a protest.

The undersigned gladly avails himself of this additional occasion to renew to the honorable Secretary of State the assurances of his most distinguished consideration.

FR. v. GEROLT.

BERLIN, May 19, 1871.

According to the reports (the truth of which has been otherwise confirmed) of the commander of the German corvette Augusta, the French war-navy observed, while the said vessel was in the Spanish port of Vigo, in January last, a course of conduct toward her which was at variance with unquestionable principles of international law.

The French iron-clad frigate Heroine, having entered the port of Vigo on the 13th of January, and having approached so near to the Augusta (with the unmistakable design of reconnoitering) that the latter was forced to draw in her anchor to sixty fathoms, ran out on the day following, not in order to put to sea, but to cast anchor within the Bay of Vigo, among the Cies Islands. She thence came farther into the harbor by night, and sent off her steam-launch to make observations. She also kept making signals from her anchorage in neutral water to several French vessels which were lying or cruising outside, of which several bore her company by turns, (one at a time.) Although the object of this spying in neutral waters was frustrated by the loyal and firm enforcement of the neutrality laws on the part of the Spanish government, and by the signing of a truce on the 28th of the same month, there was reason for the allied German governments to bring the conduct of the French vessels of war, which was in violation of the law of nations, to the knowledge of maritime powers, which, in every naval war, have an equal interest in having the rights of neutrals respected, and the presumptions of the belligerents, which are based upon them, not deceived. In order not to anticipate the royal Spanish government as the one principally interested, I addressed the inquiry to the cabinet at Madrid whether it proposed to issue a proclamation in defense of its territorial rights. I was informed, in reply, that the Spanish government had entered into correspondence with the delegation of the Government of the national defense at Bordeaux, and felt satisfied in consequence of a declaration which had been received from the same, which left the right inviolate in principle, the observance of which in fact (recognition of which?) the Spanish government had obtained. Since, meanwhile, the conclusion of a peace has taken place, I think proper to refrain from making a protest. In order, however, that no inferences may hereafter be drawn from our silence, I take the liberty of bringing the conduct of the French war-navy toward the Augusta, our opinion of this conduct, and our reasons for not making it a subject of protest, to the knowledge of maritime nations. I most respectfully beg your excellency to be pleased to send a copy of this dispatch to the minister of foreign affairs.

THE RUSSIAN QUESTION—PRINCE GORTCHAKOFF'S REPLY TO LORD GRANVILLE—FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT BY SUBMARINE TELEGRAPH.

ST. PETERSBURG, December 1—11.15 A. M.

The following is the full text of Prince Gortchakoff's reply to Lord Granville, being a dispatch addressed to Baron Brunnow, dated Tsarskoe Selo, 8th (20th) November, 1870:

"MONSIEUR LE BARON: The ambassador of England has read and left with me a copy of Lord Granville's dispatch in reply to our communication of October 19. I hastened to submit it to His Majesty the Emperor. Our august master was pleased to point out that it contained, in the first place, an expression of the earnest desire of the cabinet of London to preserve cordial relations between England and Russia; and secondly, an assurance that the cabinet would not have refused to enter into an examination of the results of the treaty of 1856, so far as they have been modified by circumstances. As for the question of strict right stated by Lord Granville, we have no wish to enter into any discussion, recall any precedent, cite any example. Such a controversy would in no way promote the good understanding which we desire. Our august master had to discharge an imperious duty to his own country, without wishing to injure in any way the governments which were signatories of the treaty of 1856. On the contrary, His Imperial Majesty appeals to their sense of justice, and to their regard for their own dignity. We regret to see that Lord Granville addresses himself principally to the form of our communications. The form was not our choice. We could have asked nothing better, surely, than to attain our end by an agreement with the signatories of the treaty of 1856. But the principal secretary of state of Her Britannic Majesty well knows that the attempts made at different times to assemble the powers in a general conference, with a view to remove the causes of difficulty which disturbed the general peace, have invariably failed. The prolongation of the present crisis, and the absence of a regular government in France, postpone still further the possibility of such an agreement. Meanwhile, the position in which the treaty left Russia has become more and more intolerable. Lord Granville will agree that the Europe of to-day is very far from being the Europe which signed the treaty of 1856. It was impossible that Russia should agree to remain the only power bound indefinitely by an agreement which, onerous as it was at the time when it was concluded, became daily weaker in its guarantees. Our august master has too deep a sense of what he owes to his country to force it to submit any longer to an obligation against which the national sentiment protests. We cannot admit that the abrogation of a purely theoretical principle, to which no immediate effect is given, and which simply restores to Russia a right of which no great power could consent to be deprived, should be considered as a menace to peace; or that, in annulling one point of the treaty of 1856, there is any implication that all are annulled. The imperial cabinet never had any such intention. On the contrary, our communication of October 19 declares, in the most explicit terms, that His Majesty the Emperor fully maintains his adhesion to the general principles of the treaty of 1856, and that he is ready to come to an agreement with the signatory powers of that treaty, either to confirm its general stipulations, or to renew them, or to substitute for them any other equitable arrangement which may be thought suitable to secure the repose of the East and the equilibrium of Europe. There seems, then, to be no reason why the cabinet of London should not, if it please, enter into an explanation with the signatories of the treaty of 1856. For our part, we are ready to join in any deliberation having for its object the settlement of guarantees for the consolidation of peace in the East. We are persuaded that fresh guarantees would be found in the removal of a permanent cause of irritation between the two powers the most directly interested. Their mutual relations would be more firmly established on the basis of a good and solid understanding. You are desired, M. le Baron, to read this dispatch to Lord Granville, and to leave a copy of it with him. The principal secretary of state of Her Britannic Majesty has expressed to us the regret that he would feel if this discussion should disturb the harmony which the government of Her Majesty the Queen has striven to maintain between the two countries. Be good enough to express to his excellency how entirely his regret would be shared by the imperial cabinet. We believe that a good understanding between the two governments is exceedingly advantageous to the two countries as well as to the peace of the world. It is with lively satisfaction that we have seen our relations during late years grow more and more close and cordial. The grave circumstances in which we find ourselves at this moment seem to us to make this more desirable than ever.

"GORTCHAKOFF."

[From the London Times, Monday, December 5, 1870.]

THE TREATY OF 1856.

The following is Lord Granville's reply to the second note of Prince Gortchakoff :

Earl Granville to Sir A. Buchanan.

"FOREIGN OFFICE, November 28.

"SIR: The Russian ambassador has read and given to me a copy of a dispatch of Prince Gortchakoff of the date of 8-20th November.

"It is not necessary for Her Majesty's government to recur to the important question of international law raised by the circular of Prince Gortchakoff, as they have nothing to add to the declaration on that subject which they have already made.

"His Excellency has been good enough to appeal to my knowledge of facts which, his excellency states, prevented that consultation and agreement with other parties to the treaty which Russia would have preferred.

"I am aware that suggestions for Congresses to settle other European questions have been made and not adopted.

"It has also been stated to me that intimations have been given to some of my predecessors that, in the case of certain contingencies, which, however, have never occurred, such as the possession of the principalities by Austria, Russia would feel bound to call in question some of the provisions of the treaty of 1856. But I am ignorant of any occasion on which Russia, the party most interested, has proposed in any way to this country that a relaxation of the treaty should be taken into consideration.

"I cannot therefore admit that the Imperial government can justify this proceeding by the failure of efforts which have never been made.

"The courteous language in which Prince Gortchakoff's dispatch is written, his assurance of the manner in which he would have preferred to open this question, and his declaration of the strong desire for a confirmation of good relations between the two nations, particularly important at this time, encourage Her Majesty's government in the belief that the obstacle to such relations will be removed.

"They observe that his excellency describes the declaration which has been made by Russia as an abrogation of a theoretical principle without immediate application. If these words are to be construed into an announcement that Russia has formed and stated her own opinion of her rights, but has no intention of acting in conformity with it without due concert with the other powers, they go far to close the controversy in which the two governments have been engaged.

"Her Majesty's government have no objection to accept the invitation which has been made by Prussia to a conference, upon the understanding that it is assembled without any foregone conclusion as to its results. In such case Her Majesty's government will be glad to consider with perfect fairness, and the respect due to a great and friendly power, any proposals which Russia may have to make.

"You will read and give a copy of this dispatch to Prince Gortchakoff.

"I am, &c.,

"GRANVILLE.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
London, December 30, 1870. (Received January 14, 1871.)

SIR: As illustrative of the prompt and efficient action of the British government under the foreign enlistment act of 1870, I would respectfully call your attention to the annexed extract from the Daily News of yesterday, relative to the arrest of the ship International, in the Thames, for having on board a submarine cable for the French government. It may not be unjust to say that a little of the same spirit during the southern rebellion would have saved much trouble and not a little feeling.

I am told that there is a movement on foot to transfer the cable to American owners and ship it in an American bottom; but so far this project has not been successful.

I have, &c.,

BENJAMIN MORAN.

[From the Daily News.]

LONDON, Thursday, December 29.

We are informed that the International, a ship having on board a sub-marine cable for the French government, has been seized on the complaint of Count Bernstorff, the Prussian ambassador, and lies in the Thames in charge of custom-house officers. The cable was manufactured by the India-rubber, Gutta-percha and Telegraph Works Company, (Limited,) of Silvertown, under a contract with M. Steenacker's director-general of telegraphs in France, to connect Dunkirk with Cherbourg, Brest, and Bordeaux. By an amendment to an act passed during the last session of Parliament, "military telegraphing" was included among the subjects with respect to which an infringement of neutrality became possible, and it is under this statute that the government found itself obliged to take notice of the information supplied by Count Bernstorff and to act upon his demand for the detention of the vessel. An application by the company for the release of the vessel and cable has been, we understand, addressed to the proper authorities, but thus far has met with no success. As it is not denied that the cable was intended to be laid between Dunkirk and Bordeaux, and as it might, undoubtedly, be used for military purposes by the French government, the case contemplated by Parliament, in the act above referred to, was thought to have been prima facie made out. Count Bernstorff can have little reason to complain that, in this instance at least, the English government has not acted with promptitude and effect, if it be true, as we are assured, that within three hours from the time of filing the complaint the vessel was in custody.

London, January 5, 1871. (Received January 18.)

SIR: The appointment of General Schenck as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to this court has been cordially welcomed by the nation at large. The press has received the announcement in a friendly manner, and I send herewith an editorial touching his mission, extracted from the Times of to-day. Judging from the tone of public opinion, he will be met in a conciliatory spirit by the government on all questions pending between the two countries.

Indeed, I think there is a sincere disposition here, on the part of both the government and the people, to bring the Alabama and the fishery questions to a friendly and satisfactory close at an early day.

I am, &c.,

BENJAMIN MORAN.

[From the London Times, January 5, 1871.]

Before the end of this month the new American minister will in all probability have reached England, and by the time Parliament has fairly set to work upon the active business of the session, he will doubtless have broached the substantive issues of his mission to Lord Granville. The irritable feelings which were prevalent three years ago in the United States have in great measure subsided. The disappointment which we, on the other hand, suffered by the unexpected rejection of the Clarendon-Johnson convention, has been healed by the lapse of time. Around us we see the horrid realities of war, the disruption of the European state system, the palsied commerce of two great nations. Although the United States are separated by a broad ocean from these melancholy spectacles, they have only to look back a few years to warnings scarcely less urgent and appalling. In spite of angry politicians and thoughtless publicists, England and America are too well convinced of the unfruitful miseries of war to challenge it rashly. Of course, the one nation as well as the other cherishes its just pride, its dignified resentment of insult, its resolution to repel dictation. But when intelligent and high-minded statesmen govern affairs, either at Washington or at Westminster, we may reasonably hope that national susceptibilities will not be rashly wounded. What is called the "Alabama question" has dragged its slow length along ever since 1863, when Mr. Adams began to remonstrate against the negligence of the British government. More than once since then we have had a glimpse of a satisfactory settlement, but we have never hitherto reached a point at which we could command a prospect more hopeful than that we have now before us. Rational discussion has done its work on both sides of the Atlantic. Here, in the beginning, we were undoubtedly somewhat cold and unyielding in our refusal to acknowledge any error. As we grew cold, the Americans grew hot. Their demands rose with their rising wrath. Mr. Reverdy Johnson's well-meant endeavors only served to disappoint just expectations on our side, and to excite a storm of unreasonable but not inexplicable anger on the part of the Americans. When the Clarendon-Johnson convention was repudiated so emphatically at Washington, it seemed imperative for this country to withdraw for the time from negotiation. The United States, in appointing Mr. Motley their minister at St. James, appeared to adopt a similar line. At all events, during Mr. Motley's tenure of office the question slept. It was re-awakened by the news of Mr. Motley's recall, and by the somewhat threatening message of the President. The difficulty experienced in filling the vacant place added to the obscurity of the situation. Meantime, Mr. Butler blew his trumpet loudly, and many persons in the United States and in this country echoed his blatant utterances in solemn earnest.

At last we are relieved from uncertainty as to the person with whom we have to deal, if not as to the policy he brings us. General Schenck is one of the most respected politicians of the republican party in America; his position in Congress was almost unique; he was the leader of a powerful party, yet he never arrogated to himself the dictatorship which party leaders are accustomed to assume. It will not be his least recommendation in England that he has consistently and energetically opposed the extravagances of General Butler, and, as General Butler has of late been most mischievous and extravagant wherever Great Britain was concerned, we may hope that General Schenck represents an adverse influence. It is of the utmost moment for us to know what terms of negotiation, if any, he is bringing to us. According to our correspondent at Philadelphia, he is ready to concede much, and to demand terms which our government may, at all events, legitimately debate. An eminent German jurist some months ago traced the lines for a settlement of the Anglo-American claims, and it is said that General Schenck adopts this statement of the issues as the basis of arbitration which he is prepared to suggest in England. It may be that he is not empowered to suggest any such basis, and even if he were, we should be justified, after the experience of the Clarendon-Johnson convention, in dealing cautiously with the proposals of an American minister until we know whether or not they may be ratified by the American people.

Supposing, however, that the rumors which reach us from Washington are correct, and that General Schenck is authorized to treat upon a basis similar to that laid down by Professor Bluntschli, of Berlin, we have yet to pause before we accept the decision of a German jurist on this grave international difficulty. Was Dr. Bluntschli's conclusion arrived at after hearing an ex parte statement, or would it have been modified if the arguments on the English side had been fully and officially presented? These are points which may yet be raised; but Dr. Bluntschli's leading decisions, if fairly taken as the bases of arbitration in matters of detail, evade the main objections which prevented former solutions of this difficulty. In effect, if we believe the story we have heard of General Schenck's mission, the American Government is now content to abandon the preposterous claim for "consequential damage," and the unintelligible demand for a "formal" apology. Our alleged delinquency in prematurely recognizing the South is altogether set aside, and all the horrible sequence of calamity conjured up in Mr. Sumner's famous speech is put out of sight. The British government, according to this story, will be asked to pay for the damage done to American shipping by the Alabama, which escaped, through our negligence and the imperfection of our municipal law, from an English port. Furthermore, we are to be called upon to recoup the expenditure of the United States Government upon naval preparations for the repression of the Alabama's depredations. We are to be taxed with interest on this loss and outlay since the time of its accruing. Finally, we are to be asked to join with the American Government in a declaration "recognizing as of perpetual obligation the rules of international law, of the violation of which the payment of the money is an implied admission." We cannot assert that any of these points is so unreasonable as not to be fairly matter for diplomatic discussion; indeed, all of them might properly be considered by an equitably constituted arbitral tribunal. It is for Lord Granville and General Schenck to decide how much either party ought to concede. National irritabilities have now been eliminated, and only great international interests remain to be considered.

The sensible exposition of the question recently put forth before the Historical Society of New York by Mr. Charles Francis Adams, formerly American minister in this country, will disabuse many persons of the mischievous notion that the rantings of Mr. Butler and Mr. Chandler represent the public opinion of the United States. Fortune has not permitted Mr. Adams, who so ably sustained the American claims during the darkest days of the Union, to carry the negotiations with England to a prosperous close, and to reconcile the countries, which were disunited by a temporary and unreasonable misunderstanding. If this were not to be, General Schneck, representing the best and most honorable section of the dominant party in the United States, is probably one of the most useful representatives America at this crisis could send to England. We may be hopeful, let us trust, of a settlement which, without compromising our honor, may satisfy all the legitimate claims of the United States. On our side, we are well assured, there is nothing but a desire to attain, by fair concessions or frank allowances, the settlement of a foolish quarrel which has alienated two great nations allied by blood and by intellectual sympathies. The American people, at first passionately excited at our recognition of belligerent rights in the southern confederacy, enraged beyond measure at the infractions of international law with which we were charged, broke out, when the civil war was ended, into outrageous recriminations. These have died away. Why should a reconciliation be delayed any longer? What Mr. Adams asks in New York Mr.

Vernon Harcourt has been asking in language equally moderate at Oxford. Mr. Harcourt, of course, does not yield one of the points advanced in earlier stages of the controversy by Mr. Sumner and others. The alleged responsibility of England for her recognition of the South as a belligerent power, he repudiates as a legal monstrosity and a political imposture. As to our liability for the depredations of the Alabama, he maintains that on strictly legal grounds we could scarcely be rendered responsible for her original escape, but that her subsequent admission to British ports was undoubtedly an error. But in any case, whether we believe we were right or wrong, it is desirable, says Mr. Harcourt, that these questions should be discussed by a competent tribunal. It is eminently perilous to leave them open, and to give weak or dishonest politicians an instrument for embroiling two kindred nations. Daniel Webster's noble words, which Mr. Harcourt so aptly quoted, express the present feeling of all thoughtful men in England and America: "This constant speculation, this supposition that war may come, is half as bad as war itself. What we want is settled peace, and the conviction that peace will remain until there is some just and sensible cause for war."

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
London, January 19, 1871. (Received February 3.)

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that in the latter days of last December the Right Honorable Mr. Hammond, one of her Majesty's under-secretaries of state for foreign affairs, asked me if I could send a letter to Mr. Washburne from Lord Granville to M. Jules Favre, in case the North German ambassador here should not object, to which I replied in the affirmative. Late in the evening of the 30th ultimo, I received a private note from Mr. Hammond, inclosing the letter from Lord Granville for M. Favre, inviting him to the London conference on the Black Sea question, and saying that Lord Granville had told Count Bernstorff about it the day before. I accordingly sent the letter that evening to Mr. Washburne, in a brief note, stating that I did so at Lord Granville's request, and I left it to Mr. Washburne to deliver the letter or not, as he might think proper. It was delivered, and M. Jules Favre has since published it in his circular in reply, addressed to the diplomatic representatives of France abroad.

The translation of this note of Lord Granville into French, and back again from French into English, has no doubt led to inaccuracies. I inclose a copy, as printed in the Times of the 17th instant, merely remarking that I did not offer to communicate with M. Jules Favre, but when applied to, to send a note to Mr. Washburne from Lord Granville for him, did so, as an act of comity to both the British and other governments interested in the treaty of Paris of 1856.

I have thought it my duty to make this explanation to you, as without it my course in the matter might be open to misconstruction.

FRANCE AND THE CONFERENCE.

The Journal Officiel of Paris states that the minister of foreign affairs has addressed the following circular to the French diplomatic agents abroad :

PARIS, January 12, 1871.

"SIR: The government has hitherto felt it right to maintain a strict reserve in respect of the negotiations which have been set on foot for a revision of the treaties of 1856. That such revision, should it be necessary, belongs exclusively to the powers which were signatories of those treaties, is a truth so evident that it is needless to dwell upon it. There can be no doubt upon the point. Thus, when one of those powers demanded a modification of the conventions which were equally binding upon all the signatories, the idea of a conference, at which the question could be discussed, was adopted without difficulty. The place of France in that conference was marked out. But could she think of occupying it at a moment when she was entirely absorbed by the defense of her territory? Such was the grave question which the government has had to consider under the circumstances which I am about briefly to recount. It was by a dispatch, dated Tours, 11th of November, received in Paris on the 17th, that the minister for foreign affairs was informed, by M. de Chaudordy, of Prince Gortchakoff's circular. This intelligence was communicated to him by a telegram from our minister at Vienna, in the following terms: 'The Russian minister yesterday made a communication, from which it appears that his government considers itself as no longer bound by the stipulations of the treaties of 1856.' On the same day, November 17, the minister of foreign affairs replied to M. de Chaudordy, recommending the strictest reserve. We had up to that time received no official communication, and we were bound to confine ourselves to a policy of observation, at the same time without omitting to maintain on all occasions our formal right to take part in a resolution which, without our participation, would be absolutely devoid of value. Europe could not entertain any other view, and in the conversations and notes which have been interchanged between the various powers and ourselves, it has always been understood that France was a necessary party to the deliberation, and that she would be invited to join in it. I should hold myself guilty of an unpardonable indiscretion if I were now to reveal the details of these pourparlers. Our effort has been to take advantage of the friendly dispositions which have been manifested toward us, and to bring the representatives of the powers to acknowledge that, without deserting or in any way detracting from the extreme importance which the discussion of the treaties of 1856 would have for us, yet we were bound upon entering the conference to introduce yet another discussion of a most important character which should not be met by a plea of incompetency. However, it must be admitted that, while fully sharing this view, the delegation at Tours has always been of opinion that we should accept the invitation of Europe if it should be addressed to us. Summing up this opinion, M. de Chaudordy wrote on his dispatch of the 10th of December: 'The delegation is of opinion, after having examined, with me, all the dispatches, that we should join the conference, even without a previous promise or a subsequent armistice.' The opinion of the members of the delegation has never changed. M. Gambetta strongly expresses it in his last dispatch from the 31st of December, 1870, to the 3d of January, 1871. Addressing the minister of foreign affairs, he writes: 'You must be on the point of quitting Paris to repair to the conference at London, if, as I am assured, England has succeeded in obtaining a safe-conduct for you. I can imagine the pangs which you will experience in leaving Paris and our colleagues. I can hear the expression of your grief and your early refusals, and yet I must tell you in the interest of our cause it must be so.' Before M. Gambetta had written these lines, the minister of foreign affairs, following as well as the imperfection and the delays in communication allowed him to do the negotiations entered upon at Tours, and continued afterward at Bordeaux, had intimated to M. de Chaudordy that the government had decided that, if regularly invited, France would send a representative to the conference at London, but with the condition that England, which had sent it a verbal invitation, would undertake to obtain the necessary safe-conduct for its representative if he were selected in Paris. This arrangement was accepted by the English cabinet. M. de Chaudordy informed the minister of foreign affairs of it in a dispatch dated

Bordeaux, December 26, 1870, received on the 8th of January. He informed him at the same time that the delegation of the government had selected him as the fitting representative of France at the conference. This communication was confirmed by the following letter, written by Lord Granville on the 29th of December, and transmitted to us on the 10th of the present month through the medium of the United States minister:

“LONDON, December 29, 1870.

“MONSIEUR LE MINISTRE: M. de Chaudordy has informed Lord Lyons that your excellency was proposed to represent France at the conference which it has been agreed to hold in London, concerning the neutralization of the Black Sea, and he has at the same time requested me to obtain a safe-conduct which will enable your excellency to pass through the Prussian lines. I immediately requested Count Bernstorff to apply for the safe-conduct, and to transmit it to your excellency by a German officer dispatched with a flag of truce. M. de Bernstorff yesterday informed me that a safe-conduct would be placed at your excellency's disposition whenever it should be applied for by an officer sent from Paris to the German headquarters, seeing that satisfaction had not been given for the officer bearing a flag of truce upon whom the French had fired. I have been informed by M. Tissot that much time would elapse before this information could be transmitted to you by the delegation at Bordeaux, and I have consequently suggested to Count Bernstorff another means by which it could reach you, by taking advantage of the opportunity offered by the chargé d'affaires of the United States to acquaint you with what has passed. It had been agreed that the conference shall assemble this week, but in order to afford time for the arrival of the French plenipotentiary, the day of meeting has been fixed for the 3d of January. I trust that your excellency will authorize M. Tissot to represent you at the first meeting, at which I will place upon the order of the day only questions of form, and, if your excellency is in a position to inform me of your arrival, I would propose to adjourn the conference for a week, to obtain the valuable advantage of your experience. I trust that your excellency will permit me to take the opportunity of expressing my gratification at entering upon personal relations with yourself, and the pleasure I shall have in seeing you in London.

“I have the honor, &c.,

“Being called upon by the dispatch, the government could not, without abdicating the rights of France, reject the invitation which it received in her name. Undoubtedly it might be objected that, for France, the moment is not favorable for a discussion respecting the neutrality of the Black Sea. But it is precisely because at this supreme moment France is fighting for her honor and her existence, that the official proposition made to the French Republic by the European cabinets acquires an exceptional importance. It is a tardy commencement of justice, an engagement which cannot be retracted. It consecrates with the authority of public law the change of reign, and brings upon the scene where the destinies of the world are being contested the free nation, free despite her wounds, in place of the chief who led her to her danger, or of the pretenders who sought to dispose of her. Besides, who does not feel that, admitted to face the representatives of Europe, France has an incontestable right to lift up her voice? Who can arrest her when, relying upon the eternal rules of justice, she will defend the principles which guarantee her independence and her dignity? She will abandon none which we have maintained. Our programme is unchanged, and Europe, who invites those who framed it, knows well that they are bound and are prepared to maintain it. There was no room, therefore, for hesitation, and the government would have committed a grave fault in rejecting the overture which was made to it. But while recognizing that fact, it thought, with myself, that the minister for foreign affairs could not, without some reason of paramount importance, quit Paris in the midst of a bombardment which the enemy is directing upon our city. For a week past, suddenly, without warning to the inoffensive inhabitants and neutrals, the commander-in-chief of the Prussian army showers his murderous projectiles upon our buildings. It seems that he selects in preference our hospitals, our schools, our churches, our benevolent institutions. Women are killed in their beds, children in the arms of their parents or under the eyes of their teachers. Yesterday we accompanied to their last resting-places five little coffins of young pupils crushed under the weight of a shell weighing 200 pounds. The church, where their remains were blessed by the priest and watered by the tears of their parents, testified by its walls, shattered even at night, to the fury of the assailants. I know not how long these inhuman measures will continue. Useless for the attack, they are only an act of depredation and murder destined to excite terror. Our brave population of Paris feels its courage increase with the danger. Firm, irritated, resolute, it is indignant and does not bend. It means more than ever to fight and conquer, and we mean it also. I cannot think of separating myself from it at this crisis. Perhaps our protests addressed to Europe, the protest of the ambassadors present in Paris, will soon put an end to it. Till then England will understand that my place is in the midst of my fellow-citizens. This is what I explained to the foreign minister of Great Britain in the reply which is subjoined, and which fitly closes this statement:

“PARIS, January 10.

“M. le Comte: I received only to-day, the 10th of January, at 9 p. m., through the minister of the United States, the letter which your excellency has done me the honor of writing to me, dated the 20th of December, 1870, whereby I am informed that you have requested Count Bernstorff to place at my disposal the safe-conduct necessary for my passing through the Prussian lines and attending, as representative of France, the conference which is to be opened at London. I thank your excellency for this communication, and for the kindness shown me in facilitating the accomplishment of the duty imposed on me. It is, however, difficult for me to depart immediately from Paris, which, for eight days, has been given up to the horrors of a bombardment carried on against its inoffensive population, without the warning which is usual according to the law of nations. I do not feel it right to abandon my fellow-citizens at the moment when they are victims of this violence. Moreover, the communications between Paris and London are, by the act of the commander-in-chief of the besieging army, so slow and uncertain that I cannot, notwithstanding my good wishes, reply to your appeal in the terms of your dispatch. You kindly informed me that the conference would meet on the 3d of January, and would then probably adjourn for a week. Apprised of this on the evening of the 10th, I could not profit by your invitation in proper time. Moreover, Count Bismarck, while allowing the letter to reach me, has not accompanied it with a safe-conduct, which is, however, indispensable. He requests that a French officer should repair to the Prussian headquarters to seek the safe-conduct, availing himself of complaints which he addressed to the governor of Paris on the occasion of an incident complained of by a parlementaire on the 23d of December; and Count Bismarck adds that, until satisfaction has been given him, the Prussian commander-in-chief forbids any communication by parlementaires. I do not inquire whether such a resolution, contrary to the laws of war, would not be the absolute negation of superior rights which necessity and humanity have always maintained for the benefit of belligerents. I content myself with remarking to your excellency that the governor of Paris promptly ordered an inquiry into the facts cited by Count Bismarck, and, in announcing this to him, brought to his knowledge facts of the same kind, much more numerous, imputable to Prussian sentinels, on which facts, however, he had never thought of relying for the purpose of interrupting the exchange of ordinary relations. Count Bismarck seems to have admitted, at least partially, the justice of these observations, for this very day he charged the United States ambassador to inform me that, reserving respective inquiries, he re-establishes relations by parlementaires. There is no necessity, then, for a French officer to repair to the Prussian headquarters, and I am about to enter into communication with the United States ambassador in order to procure the safe-conduct which you have kindly obtained. As soon as I have this document in my hands, and the situation of Paris permits, I shall proceed to London, sure beforehand of not invoking in vain, in the name of my government, the principles of right and morality which Europe has so great an interest in causing to be respected.

“Accept, &c.,

“JULES FAVRE.”

“I beg you, sir, to bring this dispatch to the knowledge of the government to which you are accredited. It is fit that Europe should be enlightened on our intentions and our acts; it is to its equity that we submit them.

“Accept, &c.,

“The minister of foreign affairs, JULES FAVRE.”

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
London, January 19, 1871. (Received February 3.)

SIR: Referring to my No. 164, I have now the honor to send herewith copies, extracted from the Times of the 11th, 13th, and 18th instant, of the reports of the proceedings against the ship International for violating the neutrality or foreign enlistment act of 1870, together with an editorial from the Times of the 18th on the subject.

LAW REPORT—COURT OF ADMIRALTY, JANUARY 10—BEFORE THE RIGHT HON. SIR R. J. PHILLIMORE—THE INTERNATIONAL AND CARGO.

This was an application under the foreign enlistment act, 1870, which provides, among other things, that "if any person within Her Majesty's dominions, without the license of Her Majesty, does any of the following acts—that is to say, builds or agrees to build * * * any ship * * * or issues or delivers any commission for any ship * * * or equips any ship with intent or knowledge, or having reasonable cause to believe that the same shall or will be employed in the military or naval service of any foreign state at war with any friendly state, or dispatches, or causes to be dispatched, any ship with intent or knowledge, or having reasonable cause to believe that the same shall or will be employed in the military or naval service of any foreign state at war with any friendly state, such person shall be deemed to have committed an offense against this act, and * * * the offender shall be punishable by fine and imprisonment, * * * and the ship in respect of which any such offense is committed and her equipment shall be forfeited to Her Majesty." The act also provides that the owner of the ship so detained may apply to the court of admiralty, which may release the ship with costs and damages. It appeared that on the 28th day of November last, the India-rubber, Gutta-percha, and Telegraphic Works Company, (limited,) by their manager, agreed with M. Steenackers as directeur général des télégraphes et des postes to furnish and lay submarine cables along various parts of the French coast, extending from Dunkerque to Verdon, near Bordeaux, and that the International, a vessel belonging to that company, was, accordingly, laden with cable and proper fittings, and while she was lying off the company's works at Silvertown, and ready to start, she was, on the 21st of December last, arrested by order of the government. Various negotiations ensued with the government to obtain a release of the vessel, but without avail; and a motion to the court upon affidavits was now made on behalf of the company for a release of the vessel, with costs and damages.

The attorney general, (with him the solicitor general, the Queen's advocate, and Mr. Archibald,) for the Crown, applied that the case might be postponed till Thursday to give the crown time to answer the affidavits of the other side, which had only been delivered on Saturday last.

Sir J. Karslake, Q. C., (with him Mr. T. Hughes, Q. C., Mr. Lindley, and Mr. Pritchard,) for the company, resisted the application, on the ground that, as the seizure was made on the 21st of last month, the advisers of the Crown must be well aware of the facts of the case, and ought to have been now prepared with affidavits. Delay was of the utmost consequence to the company, as they were under contract with the French government to lay the cable before the 31st instant.

Sir R. J. Phillimore was of opinion that it was extremely expedient that the matter should, as the statute requires, be decided with celerity and dispatch; still, he should be sorry to be too precipitate, as the question was one of the gravest importance. The application was the first of its kind that had been made to the court under the statute. His lordship then ordered that the affidavits should be filed by 1 o'clock this day, and that the motion should be heard on Thursday morning.

COURT OF ADMIRALTY, JANUARY 12—BEFORE THE RIGHT HON. SIR R. J. PHILLIMORE—THE INTERNATIONAL AND CARGO.

This was an application under the foreign enlistment act, 1870, which provides, among other things, that "if any person within Her Majesty's dominions, without the license of Her Majesty, does any of the following acts—that is to say, builds or agrees to build * * * any ship * * * or issues or delivers any commission for any ship * * * or equips any ship with intent or knowledge, or having reasonable cause to believe that the same shall or will be employed in the military or naval service of any foreign state at war with any friendly state, or dispatches, or causes to be dispatched, any ship with intent or knowledge, or having reasonable cause to believe that the same shall or will be employed in the military or naval service of any foreign state at war with any friendly state, such person shall be deemed to have committed an offense against this act, and * * * the offender shall be punishable by fine and imprisonment, * * * and the ship in respect of which any such offense is committed and her equipment shall be forfeited to Her Majesty." By the interpretation clause of the act "military service shall include military telegraphy, and any other employment whatever in, or in connection with, any military operation." The act also provides that the owner of the ship so detained may apply to the court of admiralty, which may release the ship with costs and damages. It appeared that on the 28th day of November last the India-rubber, Gutta-percha, and Telegraphic Works Company, (limited,) by their manager, agreed with M. Steenackers, as directeur général des télégraphes et des postes, to furnish and lay submarine cables along various parts of the French coast, extending from Dunkerque to Verdon, near Bordeaux, and that the International, a vessel belonging to that company, was accordingly laden with cable and proper fittings, and while she was lying off the company's works at Silvertown, and ready to start, she was, on the 21st of December last, arrested by order of the government.

Various negotiations ensued with the government to obtain a release of the vessel, but without avail, and on Tuesday last the court was moved for a release of the vessel with costs and damages, when the further hearing was postponed till to-day, to enable the Crown to answer the affidavits of the applicants. The application for release was founded upon the affidavit of Mr. Gray, manager of the company, in which he stated, among other things, that the vessel was bought in July last, partially built, and afterward fitted for the company's ordinary business of laying submarine cables; and that after she was delivered to the company she was used for laying for the British government a submarine cable between Jersey and England; that the present contract was made with M. Steenackers as a civil functionary, answering to our postmaster general, under whose direction all telegraphic and postal arrangements are conducted, whether for public or private purposes, except military telegraphy, which is provided for by the minister of war and naval telegraphy, which is under the minister for marine. Mr. Gray also stated his belief that the cables were to be used for ordinary public and private business, though, no doubt, messages would sometimes be sent by them relating to military matters. M. Sauvinet, the chief secretary of M. Steenackers, also made an affidavit corroborating Mr. Gray, and stating, also, that at the date of the contract the seat of the government was at Tours, and that there was no intention to remove it to Bordeaux; that the system of submarine cables provided for by the contract was designed to replace or add to the inland telegraphic communications broken by the war, and to keep the commercial port of Bordeaux in communication with England, America, and the north of France and Europe; that all the telegraphic communication between Europe and America is now carried on by means of the French Atlantic submarine cable between Brest and America, and if the intended cables were laid they would afford another means of communication between England and Brest, and so with America, and that the submarine telegraph cable between France and Algeria has been laid by Englishmen by contract with M. Steenackers since the commencement of the war. On behalf of the Crown affidavits were filed by Mr. Clare, secretary to the submarine telegraph company, and Mr. Scudamore, secretary to the general post-office, stating the number of lines of telegraph between this country and France, the number of messages which can be transmitted in the course of the day, and their belief that the proposed cable would have little value for commercial purposes, and would not be wanted after the close of the war. A copy of the bulletin, dated the 10th of December, was also produced, by which the government was transferred from Tours to Bordeaux.

By the terms of the contract the cables were to be laid before the 31st instant, under a penalty of 44,000*l*; i. e., half the price mentioned in the contract.

Sir J. Karslake, Q. C., Mr. T. Hughes, Q. C., Mr. Lindley, and Mr. Pritchard appeared for the company; and the attorney general, the solicitor general, the Queen's advocate, and Mr. Archibald for the Crown.

The hearing of the application occupied the whole day, and his lordship reserved his decision, but stated that he would give judgment very shortly.

[From the London Times, January 18, 1871.]

THE INTERNATIONAL AND CARGO—COURT OF ADMIRALTY, JAN. 17—BEFORE THE RIGHT HON. SIR R. J. PHILLIMORE.

This was an application, under the foreign enlistment act, 1870, on behalf of the India-rubber, Gutta-percha and Telegraphic Works Company, the owners of the International steam-vessel, for a release, with costs and damages, of the vessel, which was arrested in the river Thames by order of the government on the 21st of December last, particulars of which have already appeared.

Sir J. Karslake, Q. C., Mr. T. Hughes, Q. C., Mr. Lindley, and Mr. Pritchard appeared for the company; the attorney general, the solicitor general, the queen's advocate, and Mr. Archibald for the Crown.

The case was argued on the 12th instant, and the court now gave judgment.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE: This is an application, under the 23d section of 33 and 34 Vic., cap. 90, by the India-rubber, Gutta-percha, and Telegraph Works Company, (limited,) the owners of the ship International and her cargo, for the release of that vessel and cargo, which have been and are now detained by the order of the secretary of state under the provisions of the same statute. This statute, passed during the last session, under which the authority of this court is now for the first time evoked, is in my judgment very important and very valuable; strengthening the hands of Her Majesty's government, and enabling them to fulfill more easily than heretofore that particular class of international obligations which may arise out of the conduct of Her Majesty's subjects toward belligerent foreign states with whom Her Majesty is at peace. It is the duty, I think, of the court, upon whom is devolved the application of this statute to particular cases, so to construe it as, on the one hand, to give, if possible, due and full execution to its main purpose; and, on the other, not to strain the provisions of it so as to fetter the private commerce of Her Majesty's subjects beyond the express limits which the statute for the general interests of the public weal has prescribed. The statute provides, among other things, "that if any person within Her Majesty's dominions dispatches, or causes or allows to be dispatched, any ship with intent or knowledge, or having reasonable cause to believe, that the same shall or will be employed in the military or naval service of any foreign state at war with any friendly state, such person shall be deemed to have committed an offense against this act." Then certain penalties ensue to the person and to the ship. It is with the latter only that the court is now concerned. The act confers special powers on the secretary of state, (section 23,) which he may exercise in two ways. He may issue a warrant for the detention of a suspected vessel, and then simply detain such vessel, taking no further proceedings and leaving the owner to make his application for release to this court; or he may proceed to obtain the condemnation and forfeiture of the vessel to the Crown. The secretary of state, in this instance, has taken the former and milder course, and does not, I am informed by the attorney general, think it a case in which further or more serious steps should hereafter be taken. "Interest Reipublice," it is said, that this vessel should suffer a temporary detention, or if released by order of this court, that such release should be accompanied by a special bond entered into by the owners of the vessel giving security against any belligerent or non-neutral use of the vessel or her cargo. But the vessel is not to be proceeded against for any second penalty. The owners of the International and her cargo, however, are applicants to this court, both for the immediate and unconditional release of the vessel and cargo and for the condemnation in costs and damages (a power conferred by the statute on this court) of the government. I must now draw attention to the facts of this case as they appear in the affidavits, and as they are connected with others which are matters of general notoriety. The vessel herself, it is admitted, independently of her peculiar cargo, is not, per se, in any way adapted for purposes of war. Mr. Gray (the manager of the company) swears that "the said company carries on, among other things, the business of the manufacture and laying of submarine cables," and that "on or about the seventh day of July, 1870, the said company purchased the said ship, then partially built, and caused her to be specially fitted for the purpose of their ordinary business, of laying submarine cables as aforesaid." She was purchased by her present owners, the India-rubber and Gutta-percha Telegraph Works Company, on the 7th of July last year. At that time the terrible and devastating war which very soon afterward began to cover France with blood had not broken out. At the time of the purchase the ship was partially built, and was subsequently, as is shown by Mr. Gray, "specially fitted for the purpose of laying submarine cables." The ship was delivered as completed to the company in the month of September, and was shortly afterward let by the company to Her Majesty's government for the purpose of laying a submarine cable between England and Jersey, which task she successfully performed. On the 23th of November the company entered into a contract with the director general of telegraphic and postal service in France to furnish and lay down certain submarine cables. It will be important to notice precisely the principal features of the contract. On the 21st of December, while lying in the Thames with cable on board of the kind required for the fulfillment of the contract, she was seized by officers of the customs, and on the 27th was detained by a warrant from the secretary of state for foreign affairs. The contract to which I have referred was entered into between the company and the French government, represented by the director general of telegraphs and mails, subject, however, to subsequent sanction (article 12) by a decree of the government of national defense. According to the terms of the contract, the company were to lay down in the channel and in the ocean various electric submarine cables, intended to connect, 1. Dunkirk with Cherbourg; 2. The west coast of the peninsula of Cotentin, toward Carteret, with some point of the bay of St. Brieuc; 3. The peninsula of Quiberon with Belle Isle en Mer;

4. Belle Isle en Mer with Royan; 5. Royan with Verdun. The cable is described as being of two kinds—a submarine cable and a land or shore-end cable, “cable d’atterrissement et celui de pleine mer.” They were to be made in conformity with models produced in court. By the 15th article the French government “reserves the selection and designation of the line of direction of the cable, and the precise points of landing, which is to be made known to Mr. Matthew Gray before the vessel which is to lay it down leaves the port of London.” By the 3d article, “the first and fourth sections to be laid down” (that is, Dunkirk to Cherbourg and Belle Isle en Mer with Royan) “shall comprise at each of their extremities 20 kilometers of cable of the land model; the intermediate portions shall be composed of cable of the model for deep seas.” “The second, third, and fifth sections are to be constructed entirely of land-cable;” that is to say, (2.) “the west coast of the peninsula of Cotentin, toward Carteret, with some points of the bay of St. Brieuc;” (3.) “the peninsula of Quiberon with Belle Isle en Mer;” (5.) “Royan with Verdun.” The contract further provides (article 4) that “at the extremities of each section a length of 500 meters of land-cable shall be placed at the disposal of the French administration, over and above the submerged conductor to be placed underground beyond the sea, to the point of junction of the submarine and land line.” The whole sum to be paid to the company was not quite 90,000*l.*, in five installments. The operation of laying down the several cables was to be completed by January 31, 1871. In case of non-fulfillment, the French government were to take possession of the conductor, the ownership of which was to be theirs after the payment of the first two installments.

It appears, therefore, that there was one undivided contract to lay down a series of cables, extending from Dunkirk to Verdun, at the mouth of the Garonne, with the exception of certain portions of land, a telegraphic communication over which would be necessary to complete the connexion between the two extremities mentioned. With this connexion the company had no concern, except in so far as 500 meters of land-cable, or, rather, of additional shore-end, were, under article 4, to be provided by them and placed at the disposal of the French government. It has appeared from the material portions of the contract to which I have adverted, as well as from the ordinary functions of the company, that prima facie, at least, this undertaking had not for its object any employment “in the military or naval service” of France. It was apparently a bona fide commercial undertaking between the subjects of Her Majesty and a government in friendly relations with her. And the attorney general was express and clear in his statement that no mala fides or deception of any kind was to be imputed to the company, but a violation of the law through ignorance. It was also admitted, as I fully expected it would be, by the attorney general that this statute in no way affects the previously existing international law as to contraband. I have not, therefore, to consider whether, as suggested by the Queen’s advocate, this vessel might have been seized by a Prussian cruiser as being employed in the service of France, or as carrying contraband of war of a novel kind, but falling under the old principle. The carrier of contraband may violate the proclamation of the neutral state of which he is a member, and deprive himself of the right to protection from her; but the punishment of his offense is by the general law of nations left to the belligerent, who has the right of capture. The offense is not cognizable by the municipal law of this country. It occurred to me during the argument that the only bearing of the law of contraband on the present case might arise from the analogies furnished by that law—namely, that as “circumstances arising out of a particular situation of the war, and condition of the parties engaged in it” (“The Jonge Margaretha,” 1 C. Rob., 193) might clothe an article ancipitis usus with the character of contraband, so it might be argued that the cargo of the International, innocent under ordinary circumstances, might, in those of the present war, bring the vessel within the category of a ship dispatched for employment in the military or naval service of France.

I shall bear this analogy in mind in considering the further arguments addressed to me by the law officers of the Crown, which I am about to notice. The counsel for the Crown have strongly contended that, considering all the circumstances of the case, those who dispatched the International and her cargo had, notwithstanding the language of the contract, “intent and knowledge,” or, at least, “reasonable cause to believe” that she would be employed in the military service of France. First, it is pointed out that the contract is with the French government; second, it is said that the state of France at the period of the date of the contract was such as to render it impossible to believe that the government could have contemplated laying a cable for commercial purposes mainly or alone; third, that the circumstance of the places to be united by the cable, especially Dunkirk, Cherbourg, and Bordeaux, through Verdun, was one fraught with suspicion, as affording the inception, at least, of means of communication between the main armies of France, the value of which could not be over-estimated to the defenders of that country in her present position; fourth, it was especially pressed upon the court that the contract was entered into very shortly before the removal of the government to Bordeaux, and must have been intended to facilitate the communications of the government in its new seat with the rest of France.

On behalf of the applicants it had been alleged that the telegraphic line is strictly civil and postal, and not military. That the statute has specifically provided that to furnish "military telegraphy" shall be considered an employment in the military service of the state to which it is furnished. That "military telegraphy" is, according to a recognized scientific definition, of a wholly different kind and character from ordinary civil postal telegraphy; and this fact was, indeed, not denied by the counsel for the Crown; but I must observe that to maintain that military and postal telegraphy are different in kind is one proposition, and to maintain that, therefore, postal telegraphy, though proved to be employed exclusively, or mainly, for military purposes, cannot be considered as being employed in the military service of the state, so as to fall within the purview of the statute, is another and very different proposition, to which I am not disposed to assent. The statute, by specifying military telegraphy, has not, in my opinion, excluded the possibility of showing that, in the particular circumstances of the case, postal telegraphy must be considered as the telegraphy employed in the military service of the State. The question is, whether there is evidence before me in the present case to prove that the real object of this postal telegraphy was and must have been known to be subserving in its main end and purpose the military service of France. The positive evidence is entirely in favor of the applicants. I do not say that such evidence is necessarily binding upon the court, or that the counter presumption may not be so strong as to render such testimony null. Lord Stowell somewhere says: "It is the idlest of all conceits that a court is bound by mere swearing." The swearing must, of course, be credible; but the presumption must be very strong to overbear the testimony furnished in this case, by the affidavits both of the French and English witnesses, especially where no mala fides or want of candor is ascribed to the applicants.

The company is formed to furnish ordinary postal telegraphs. The contract with the French government is to furnish telegraphy of this kind only. No other kind is furnished. It is inapt per se for land telegraphs, much more for military telegraphy. It is credibly sworn, I think, that the applicants are no parties, directly or indirectly, to any intention or project of adapting this, so to speak, civil telegraphy to military purposes. No such adaptation is within the letter or spirit of their contract. The present circumstances of France are certainly such as to make the means of communication between her armies and her government of the utmost value to her. It is probable that this telegraphic line from Dunkirk to Verdun will be partially used for effecting, or endeavoring to effect, such communication. But neither does this appear to be the main object of the line, nor could it, without additions and adaptations with which this company has no concern, be made even partially to subserve this end. On the other hand, there is nothing incredible in the statement that commercial interests are largely concerned in the establishment of a postal telegraphic line between Dunkirk and Verdun, at the mouth of the Garonne, due regard being had to the great and increasing commercial importance of Bordeaux. It is, however, probable, as I have said, that the line may be occasionally used for military among other purposes; but such a probability is not sufficient to divest the line of its primary and paramount commercial character, and to subject this company to the very severe penalty imposed by the statute.

After a careful consideration of the statute and of the facts of this case, I have arrived at the conclusion that the applicants have made out their claim to have this vessel released. They, it is admitted, have acted with candor and with good faith toward the government, and I do not think I ought to clog the release with the bond proposed by the attorney general, the conditions of which, I may observe, were only very generally hinted at, and which might not be easy to frame. Be this, however, as it may, I do not impose such a condition on the release which I decree. I am of opinion, however, that having regard to the peculiar circumstances of the case, which I need not repeat, Her Majesty's government took a correct view of the grave obligations imposed upon them, and that there was "a reasonable and probable cause" for the detention of this ship and cargo, and for putting the applicants upon their defense. I therefore make no order as to costs or damages.

Notice of appeal from his lordship's judgment to the judicial committee of the privy council was given both on behalf of the company and of the Crown.

[From the London Times of January 16, 1871.]

It is an odd result of the accidental composition of our judicial system that questions of the most vital importance to the nation should be brought for determination before a judge whose court attracts, under ordinary circumstances, the most moderate degree of attention. We are, of course, a seafaring people. Were it not for our supremacy on the great deep, our position in the scale of nations would be very different from what it is. We rule the waves. "The charter of the land" assures us of this privilege, and in the darkest moments of national retrospect we still flatter ourselves, we hope with truth, that we could defy all assaults on our naval supremacy. And yet the judge of our admiralty court—we say it with all respect for the present occupant of that position—is, it must be acknowledged, very much a creature of accident. He fulfills the double duty of examining who is at fault in the case of collisions at sea and who is at fault in the case of an alleged infringement of the thirty-nine articles. Whether Sir Robert Phillimore is more at home in the one or the other class of subjects coming before him for determination is a matter which must not be too curiously investigated. Some of his predecessors were great in one direction, some in another. Lord Stowell was one of the executors of Dr. Johnson, yet it is currently believed that his judgments on admiralty cases were more valuable than his exertations on ecclesiastical law. His decisions as the judge of the first prize court of the realm are invaluable; but his opinions on heresy are, perhaps, hardly so highly accounted now as they were in his own time. Sir Herbert Jenner Fust, on the other hand, if he descend to posterity at all, will be remembered as the judge who pronounced judgment in the great case of "Litchfield v. Another," on the momentous question whether an altar-table could be made of stone as well as of wood, and who had the felicity of hearing and deciding in its first stages the issues in the cause of "Gorham vs. the Bishop of Exeter," which, now that Dr. Phillips and Mr. Gorham have both gone to their account, we may be permitted to say agitated public attention to an extent it did not deserve.

Sir Robert Phillimore yesterday gave judgment in the case of the "International." We have no intention of questioning his decision. On the contrary, we accept it with great satisfaction. If we may be permitted to say so, we could not have advised any other conclusion than that at which the learned judge arrived. Yet it is remarkable that a question of such intricacy and of such international importance should have been relegated to the judge of a court of such comparative obscurity. If everything were submitted to tribunals constituted according to the intrinsic value of causes as they arise, we might expect that the lord chancellor, the lord chief justice, the chief of the common pleas, the chief baron, with, perhaps, the chancellor of the exchequer thrown in as an assessor, would have been called on to decide it. Imagine that the Alabama, instead of being suffered to escape, as unfortunately she was, had been apprehended and detained by the collector of customs at Liverpool, and that thereupon the Messrs. Laird had applied to the court of admiralty to have her restored to them. The whole wit and learning of the kingdom ought to have been cited to adjudicate upon the question. The matter of the "International" is no whit less intricate, and possibly no less momentous. What are the circumstances of the case? The India-rubber, Gutta-percha, and Telegraph Works Company entered, on the 28th of November last, into a contract with the director general of telegraphic and postal service in France to furnish and lay down certain submarine cables. Sir Robert Phillimore in his judgment recites some former transactions of the company in relation to the ship which was the subject of the contest before his court, but we cannot persuade ourselves that they had anything to do with the point before him for decision. In November the company contracted with the French director general of telegraphs to furnish and lay down electric submarine cables from Dunkirk to Cherbourg; again, from the west coast of the peninsula of Cotentin to a point in the bay of St. Brienc; again, from Quiberon to Belle-isle-en-Mer, and again from Belle-isle-en-Mer, by two stages, to the mouth of the Garonne—that is to say, to the port of Bordeaux. The several sections thus contracted for, when supplemented by a piece of land-cable crossing the westernmost peninsula of France, would connect Dunkirk and the other chief ports of the coast, except Brest, with Bordeaux. Such was the contract between the company and the de facto Government of France. On the 21st of December the "International," a ship of the company, being loaded with submarine cables for the purpose of fulfilling this contract, was seized in the Thames by the officers of the customs, and on the 27th was detained by warrant of the foreign secretary. The company at once applied to the court of admiralty to be released from the detention occasioned by this warrant, and Sir Robert Phillimore yesterday decided that the company had a right to the release; but the point involved in the application was, in his opinion, of such nicety and doubt that, though he decided in favor of the company, he refused to allow them the costs of their application, and left to the Crown and the company the burden of sustaining their several costs of procedure.

How did it come to pass, it will be asked, that there could have been any case for detaining the International, with its cargo of telegraphic cables, to be laid around the west coast of France? The service to be thus rendered seems in itself sufficiently innocent, its military bearing too remote to be the subject of judicial observation. The answer to these questions strikingly illustrates the peculiarities of parliamentary government. The war between France and Germany broke out toward the end of the last session, and it was then remembered at the Foreign Office that our foreign enlistment act was very imperfect, and that a royal commission had recommended its amendment in several particulars. A bill was accordingly introduced in hot haste, and hurried through Parliament. It included much of perhaps doubtful policy; it omitted as much that might, perhaps, have been included. It left untouched the facility of exporting arms to a belligerent, but, according to the contention before Sir Robert Phillimore, it prohibited the supply of a telegraphic cable to a friendly government at war with another ally. In effect, the 8th section of the bill which thus became an act confiscated to the Crown any ship dispatched with intent or knowledge or under reasonable suspicion that the same "should be employed in the military or naval service of any foreign state at war with any friendly state." This language is vague, but still it could scarcely be pretended that a ship sent from our shores with a cable to be laid between, for example, Havre and Bordeaux, was dispatched with an intent that it should be employed in the military or naval service of France; but the interpretation clause of the statute—a clause which generally passes sub silentio in Parliament—declares that military service shall include military telegraphy; but the same clause defines "naval service" without any reference whatever to telegraphy. Under this interpretation clause the Foreign Office held that the International, being about to be dispatched with cables to be laid between Dunkirk and several points leading in a broken chain to the mouth of the Garonne, was sent on a mission of "military telegraphy," and therefore on "military service," and thus became forfeited to the Crown.

We have not been slack to admit the obligations of neutrality during the present war. If we have in any way been open to criticism, it is that we have gone before the requirements of international law rather than lagged behind them; but the contention of the officers of the Crown in claiming the forfeiture of the International appears to over-pass all reasonable construction of the statute, as it certainly exceeds any argument that can be advanced on principle. As far as the law of nations is concerned, it could not be contended for a moment that the International was liable to capture as bearing a contraband cargo. If she was open to seizure at all, it must be under the statute. The question before Sir Robert Phillimore, therefore, was simply whether a contract with the French government to lay a cable between Dunkirk and Bordeaux—for we may omit the consideration of the fact that there were missing links in the complete connection—was a service of "military telegraphy." We have little hesitation in answering that it was not. The cable when laid might be used, among other purposes, for the conveyance of orders directing the movements of the armies of France; but, admitting this, the service so rendered was no more military than the supply of writing-paper would have been. A means of communication, in itself perfectly innocent, would have been established, and its devotion to military purposes would have been ancillary to the transaction, and not the essence of it. No neutral power can be expected to extend its surveillance over its citizens to such an extent; and, indeed, could the doctrine be established, as was implied in the claim to arrest the International, there would be ground for the creation of a new neutral league to break up the servitude sought to be imposed by belligerents on their neighbors. Sir Robert Phillimore, after a careful examination of the facts, decided that the primary and paramount character of the undertaking was commercial, and that, therefore, the International was free from the penalty sought to be enforced; and if this conclusion be questioned, we may ask what possible contract could be made with the French government which would not be open to objection? Is it maintained that the fact of war between two nations imposes upon neutrals the duty of complete isolation from each, since no contract with either can possibly be conceived which is not for its benefit? Such a reductio ad absurdum seems a sufficient answer to a claim that was, perhaps, properly advanced in the court of admiralty, and certainly was properly rejected.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
London, January 26, 1871. (Received February 9.)

SIR: I have the honor to state that on the 22d instant I received your telegram of the preceding day instructing me to inform Mr. Washburne by the first opportunity that the United States steamer Shenandoah, now at Havre, would receive orders to be at his disposal on the surrender of Paris to convey him to Bordeaux; and yesterday morning I received your telegram of the 24th instant, instructing me to get from Mr. Stevens the dispatch of the Secretary of the Navy to Captain Wells and send it to Mr. Washburne.

I at once sought an interview with His Excellency Count Bernstorff, and learned from him that he would cheerfully transmit a small parcel for me to Paris by a special courier who would leave London for Versailles in the evening. I accordingly wrote a note to Mr. Washburne, incorporating in it copies of your above-mentioned telegrams, and inclosed to him the dispatch of the Secretary of the Navy to Captain Wells, as well as the dispatches received from you for him by Mr. Stevens since Friday last.

The Prussian courier left this place for Versailles last evening about 8 o'clock, and I am encouraged to hope that Mr. Washburne will receive your telegraphic messages, placing the Shenandoah at his disposal, and the various dispatches which I sent with them, in a very few days.

I had the honor to telegraph to you yesterday a brief report of my action on the subject, in fulfillment of your instructions, and I now beg to inclose herewith copies of your telegrams to me, of my note to Mr. Washburne, and of my cable message to you.

I have, &c.,

BENJAMIN MORAN.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,*

London, January 25, 1871.

MY DEAR MR. WASHBURNE: Early on Sunday morning, the 22d instant, I received the following telegram from Mr. Fish, and as Count Bernstorff will send a special courier to Versailles this evening, I avail myself of his kindness and forward the message to you at the earliest opportunity.

"WASHINGTON, January 21, 1871.

"To MORAN, Chargé, American Legation, London:

"Inform Washburne by first opportunity that the Shenandoah is at Havre, and will receive orders to be at his disposal on the surrender of Paris to convey him to Bordeaux or elsewhere. He can order to Antwerp or Ostend, or where he prefers, to meet him.

"FISH."

And at 3 a. m. to-day, I received a second telegram, as follows:

"WASHINGTON, January 24, 1871.

"To MORAN, Chargé, American Legation, London:

"Get from Stevens dispatch of Secretary of Navy to Captain Wells; send it to Washburne.

"FISH."

In compliance with Mr. Fish's instructions in this last telegram, I this morning obtained from Mr. Stevens, the dispatch agent here, the dispatch in question, addressed both to Commander Wells and yourself, and send it herewith.

I also add copies of telegraphic correspondence which has passed between the honorable the Secretary of the Navy, Commander Wells, and Mr. Stevens, in regard to the fact of the Shenandoah having been placed under your orders. This correspondence has not, however, come to me officially, and is contained in copies of two letters, addressed by Mr. Stevens on the 23d instant, to the Hon. George M. Robeson, Secretary of the Navy. The Shenandoah is still at Havre, where she awaits your orders.

Asking an early reply to this note, and that you will command me in all things, I am, &c.,

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, February 3, 1871.

MY DEAR GENERAL: Shortly after your acceptance of the appointment of envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Great Britain certain overtures were made by the British government to this Government looking to the appointment of a joint high commission, to sit in Washington, for the adjustment of several of the questions existing between the two governments. It was not thought proper to enter upon the consideration of the questions suggested, unless the same high commission should also be charged with the negotiation of a settlement of the "Alabama claims," so called. As your selection for the mission to London had been made in full confidence of your ability to treat this class of questions, the President, before giving any answer to the overtures that were made, desired me to confer with you and ascertain your views and wishes on the subject. This was done on the 11th of January last, and you gave a decided expression of opinion that the proposal contemplated by the overtures then made ought not, in the interests of the country, to be rejected, and you generously disclaimed any desire to retain in your own hands the negotiations on those important subjects which had already been intrusted to you, and on which you were then receiving the views of this Government, in view of what you thought the greater opportunity of a satisfactory settlement by means of the joint commission proposed to be held in Washington.

You were then requested to delay your arrangements for sailing for your post of duty until the result of the pending overtures should be ascertained, and I promised to give you the earliest notice of the conclusion of the arrangements then under discussion. I have now the pleasure to inform you that notes have passed between Sir Edward Thornton and myself contemplating and agreeing to a joint high commission to meet shortly in this city for the consideration of the various important questions between the two countries, including those of the fisheries, the northwestern water boundary, the Alabama claims, &c. The official or public announcement of this arrangement is delayed for sufficient reasons until some time next week. Until announced by authority you will be pleased to consider the communication now made as confidential.

In conclusion, I have to request that you will further postpone your arrangements for departure, as the President will desire your able services as one of the high commissioners on the part of the United States.

Very faithfully, yours,

HAMILTON FISH.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
London, February 4, 1871. (Received February 18.)

The first direct news that has reached London from Paris since the capitulation, arrived this evening. For a whole week a black veil seemed to have fallen between that city and the outer world: The advices so far are meager, but they are sufficient to show that the sufferings of the population during the siege, and particularly at its close, from want of food and fuel, were really terrible. Nothing more truly awful has occurred since the siege of Jerusalem by Titus. Starvation had actually set in, and the proud capital fell, not before the military prowess of Prussia, but before the sappings of famine.

Politically, things are much confused in France. Mr. Gambetta's course is doing mischief. Many regard him as a despot. He is not disposed to carry out fairly that clause of the convention of the 28th of January which relates to the elections. He proposes to exclude all but republicans from the polls. In other words, he advises not to consult the whole nation, but to try to get an assembly elected only by one section of French society, and that probably not the majority. An object of this kind was foreseen by Count Bismarck and M. Jules Favre, as indicated by the second article of the convention of the 28th of January. Mr. Gambetta's decree is in violation of that article. Count Bismarck protests against the decree, and declares that only freely elected deputies, as stipulated in the convention, will be recognized by the Germans as representatives of France.

A translation of the convention appeared in The Daily Telegraph yesterday morning, and I have the honor to inclose a copy herewith.

Much has been said in the newspapers about the German terms of peace; but the conditions reported from Berlin a few days since, and generally believed here at the time, are pronounced inaccurate in so far as concerns Lorraine, Poncecherry, and the cession of twenty men-of-war. The demand for a war indemnity of about four hundred millions of pounds will probably be persisted in. Some excitement exists here in consequence of the alleged demand for Poncecherry, it being very properly remarked that the surrender of that settlement cannot be needed to promote "German unity," any more than the cession of Martinique, Guadeloupe, or Corsica.

That peace will result from the armistice, is doubtful. But, after all, the exhausted state of France may lead the people—for they are to decide the question—to come to terms now, rather than go on fighting a hopeless battle, in which they must at last be the losers.

I have, &c.,

BENJAMIN MORAN.

[From the London Daily Telegraph, February 3, 1871.]

FULL TEXT OF THE CONVENTION.—THE OCCUPATION OF THE FORTS.

The following is a translation of the full text of the convention between Count Bismarck and M. Jules Favre, transmitted to us in the original French by our special correspondent at Berlin yesterday :

Convention between M. le Comte de Bismarck, Chancellor of the Germanic Confederation, stipulating in the name of His Majesty the Emperor of Germany, King of Prussia, and M. Jules Favre, minister of foreign affairs of the government of the national defense, both furnished with regular powers, have been determined the following arrangements :

ARTICLE I. A general armistice over all the line of military operations in course of execution between the German and the French armies shall begin for Paris on this very day, and for the departments within the term of three days. The duration of the armistice shall be for twenty-one days, dating from to-day; so that, unless it shall be renewed, the armistice will terminate on the 19th of February, at noon. The belligerent armies will preserve their respective positions, which will be separated by a line of demarcation. This line will commence from Pont Evêque, on the coast of the department of Calvados, and be continued upon Lignéres, in the northeast of the department of the Mayenne, passing between Briouze and Fromental. Touching the department of the Mayenne at Lignéres, it will follow the limit which separates that department from the departments of the Orne and of the Sarthe, to the north of Morannes, and will be continued in such a way as to leave in German occupation the departments of the Sarthe, Indre-et-Loire, Loir-et-Cher, Loiret, and Yonne, as far as a point at which, to the east of Quarréles-Tombes, the departments of the Côte d'Or, the Nièvre, and the Yonne touch each other. Setting out from this point, the tracing of the line will be reserved for an understanding which shall take place as soon as the contracting parties shall be informed as to the actual situation of the military operations which are being executed in the departments of the Côte d'Or, of the Doubs, and of the Jura. In any case the line will pass through the territory composed of these three departments, leaving to German occupation the departments situated to the north, and to the French army those situated to the south, of this territory. The departments of the North and of the Pas de Calais, the fortresses of Givet and Langres, with the territory which surrounds them to a distance of ten kilomètres, and the peninsula of Havre as far as a line drawn from Etretat in the direction of St. Romain, will remain outside the limits of the German occupation. The two belligerent armies and their advanced posts on either side will remain at a distance of at least ten kilomètres from the lines drawn to separate their positions. Each of the two armies reserves for itself the right of maintaining its authority in the territory that it occupies, and of employing the means which its commanders may judge necessary to attain that end. The armistice applies equally to the naval forces of the two countries, adopting the meridian of Dunkerque as the line of demarcation, to the west of which the French fleet will remain, and to the east of which, so soon as they can be warned, will withdraw the German ships of war which find themselves in western waters. The captures which are made after the conclusion, and before the notification, of the armistice, will be restored, as well as the prisoners who may be taken in the interval indicated. The military operations in the territory of the departments of Doubs, Jura, and Côte d'Or, as well as the siege of Belfort, shall continue independently of the armistice, until an agreement shall be arrived at regarding the line of demarcation—the tracing of which through the three departments mentioned has been reserved for an ulterior understanding.

ARTICLE II.—The armistice thus agreed upon has for its object to permit the government of national defense to convoke an assembly, freely elected, which will pronounce upon the question whether the war shall be continued, or on what conditions peace shall be made. The assembly will meet in the city of Bordeaux. Every facility will be given by the commanders of the German armies for the election and the meeting of the deputies who will compose that assembly.

ARTICLE III.—There shall be immediately surrendered to the German army by the French military authorities all the forts forming the perimeter of the exterior defense of Paris, as well as their material of war. The communes and the houses situated outside that perimeter, or between the forts, may be occupied by the German troops as far as a line to be drawn by military commissioners. The ground between this line and the fortified enceinte of the city of Paris will be interdicted to the armed forces of the two sides. The manner of surrendering the forts, and the drawing of the line already mentioned, will form the object of a protocol to be annexed to the present convention.

ARTICLE IV.—During the armistice, the German army shall not enter the city of Paris.

ARTICLE V.—The enceinte shall be disarmed of its guns, the carriages of which will be transported into the forts designated for that purpose by a commissioner of the German army.

ARTICLE VI.—The garrisons (army of the line, mobile guard, and marine) of the forts of Paris shall be prisoners of war, excepting a division of 12,000 men, which the military authorities in Paris will preserve for service inside the city. The troops who are prisoners of war shall lay down their arms, which will be collected in the places designated, and given up according to arrangements made by a commissioner, in the usual manner. These troops shall remain in the interior of the city, of which they will not be allowed to pass the enceinte during the armistice. The French authorities bind themselves to take care that every individual belonging to the army and to the mobile guard shall remain in the interior of the town. The officers of the captured troops shall be designated in a list to be delivered to the German authorities, and at the expiration of the armistice all the combatants belonging to the army confined in Paris will have to constitute themselves prisoners of war to the German army, if before that time peace is not concluded. The officers made prisoners will retain their arms.

ARTICLE VII.—The national guard will retain its arms. It will be charged with the protection of Paris and the maintenance of order. The same will be the case with the gendarmerie and the assimilated troops employed in the municipal service, such as the republican guard, the douaniers and the pompiers, the whole of this category not exceeding 3,500 men. All the corps of franca-tireurs shall be dissolved by ordinance of the French government.

ARTICLE VIII.—Immediately after the signature of these presents, and before the taking possession of the forts, the commander-in-chief of the German armies will give every facility to the commissioners whom the French government will send, whether into the departments or abroad, to take steps for the revictualing, and to bring to the city the commodities which are destined for it.

ARTICLE IX.—After the surrender of the forts, and after the disarmament of the enceinte and of the garrison, stipulated in articles 5 and 6, the revictualing of Paris will be effected freely by transit upon the railroads and the rivers. The provisions intended for this revictualment shall not be drawn from the districts occupied by the German troops, and the French government engages itself to obtain provisions outside of the line of demarcation which surrounds the position of the German armies, except in the case of an authorization to the contrary effect given by the commander of the latter.

ARTICLE X.—Every person wishing to quit the city of Paris must be furnished with regular permits, delivered by the French military authority, and submitted to the risa of the German authorities. Free passes will be granted, in right of their position, to candidates, to the provincial deputations, and to the deputies to the assembly. The free movement of the persons who have received the authorization indicated will be permitted only between six in the morning and six in the evening.

ARTICLE XI.—The city of Paris shall pay a municipal contribution of war amounting to two hundred millions of francs. This payment must be effected before the fifteenth day of the armistice—the mode of payment to be determined by a mixed German and French commission.

ARTICLE XII.—During the armistice nothing shall be taken away from the public objects of value which may serve as pledges for the recovery of the war contributions.

ARTICLE XIII.—The transport into Paris of arms, of munitions, or of articles entering into their manufacture, is forbidden during the term of the armistice.

ARTICLE XIV.—Immediate steps shall be taken for the exchange of all prisoners of war made by the French army since the commencement of the war. For this end the French authorities will hand, as promptly as possible, nominal lists of the German prisoners of war to the German military authorities at Amiens, at Le Mans, at Orleans, and at Vesoul. The liberation of the German prisoners of war will be effected upon the points nearest to the frontier. The German authorities will deliver in exchange, on the same points and in the briefest possible time, to the French military authorities, a like number of French prisoners of war of corresponding grades. The exchange will extend to civil prisoners, such as captains of ships of the German merchant navy, and the civilian French prisoners who have been interned in Germany.

ARTICLE XV.—A postal service for letters not sealed will be organized between Paris and the departments, through the medium of the headquarters at Versailles.

In faith of which, the undersigned have appended to the present convention their signatures and their seals.

Done at Versailles, the 23th of January, 1871.

London, March 8, 1871. (Received March 23.)

SIR: I have the honor to send herewith two copies of correspondence, just presented to Parliament, respecting the departure of Lord Lyons from Paris at the time of its investment by the Germans. His lordship's letter of the 26th ultimo will, no doubt, attract your attention, as it gives his reasons for going to Bordeaux, and his explanation of the motives which induced Mr. Washburne to remain at his post.

PARIS, August 26, 1870. (Received August 27.)

MY LORD: I have the honor to inclose herewith to your lordship, extracted from the "Journal Officiel" of this day, a decree of the governor of Paris concerning the expulsion of persons without the means of subsistence.

PARIS, August 24, 1870.

In virtue of the law of the 9th of August, 1849, on the state of siege.

In virtue of the decree of the 7th instant, by which Paris has been declared in a state of siege.

In virtue of Article 75 of the decree of the 24th of December, 1811, relative to the organization and service of the staff of fortified places, which says:

"In every place in a state of war if the minister or the general gives the order, or if the enemy's troops come within less than three days' march of the place, the governor or commandant is immediately, and without awaiting the state of siege, invested with the necessary authority:

"1. To send away the useless mouths, foreigners and persons pointed out by the civil or military police."

In virtue of the law of the 9th of July, 1852, relative to the dismissal from the department of the Seine of criminals, vagabonds, beggars, and other people addicted to practices dangerous to persons or property,

The governor of Paris decrees as follows:

Article 1. Every individual without the means of subsistence, whose presence at Paris would constitute a danger to public order or to the security of persons and property, or who should do anything likely to weaken or hinder the measures of defense and general safety, shall be expelled from the capital.

Art. 2. Any infraction of the decrees of expulsion will be brought before the military tribunals.

No. 2.

Lord Lyons to Earl Granville.

PARIS, August 26, 1870. (Received August 27.)

MY LORD: In my previous dispatch of to-day I have transmitted an extract from the Journal Officiel, containing an order of the governor of Paris. This document recites a decree of 1811, which authorizes the governor of places threatened by the enemy to send away all "useless mouths," and refers to other enactments of a similar kind; and it orders the immediate expulsion from Paris of persons without means of subsistence, whose presence may be considered dangerous.

The order is already in course of execution, and has already been applied to several English subjects.

The result of this, and of still more stringent measures which are likely to be adopted, will create great distress among numerous British subjects, and place those who have not the means of paying their passage to England in a very awkward, not to say very dangerous, situation. Under the circumstances, I might perhaps take upon myself to direct the consul to provide for the conveyance of these persons to England, under the circular of the 1st of April last. But as the cases are likely to be extremely numerous, I think it right to direct your lordship's attention to the subject without delay.

Probably the most practical way of insuring economy and a satisfactory investigation of the cases of British subjects requiring assistance to go to England under present circumstances, would be to confide to the committee of the charitable fund the management of a sum granted for the purpose.

FOREIGN OFFICE, September 8, 1870.

MY LORD: I have received your excellency's dispatch of the 26th August, representing that great distress might be caused among numerous British subjects, and that those who had not the means of paying their passage to England might be placed in a very awkward, not to say perilous, situation, by a decree issued by the French government on the 24th of that month, ordering the immediate expulsion from Paris of persons without means of subsistence, whose presence might be considered dangerous, which decree was likely to be followed by still more stringent measures. Your excellency further says that, as the cases are likely to be extremely numerous, you think it right, instead of acting under the present authority contained in the circular of the 1st of April last, and directing the council to provide for the conveyance of such persons to England, to call my attention to the matter without delay, suggesting at the same time that the most practical way of insuring economy and satisfactory investigation would be to intrust the committee of the British charitable fund with the management of a sum granted for the purpose of assisting such indigent persons to return to England.

I lost no time in communicating with the board of treasury. But I am only able to-day to inform your excellency that, although in principle the relief of persons who have gone abroad for their own purposes, and who suffer by war or by other general calamities, appears to that department to be a charge rather on private charity than on public funds, yet their lordships do not desire to exclude from consideration the most extreme cases, in which persons unexpectedly thrown out of employment in a foreign country, and obliged by the government to depart, are left absolutely without means, either of their own or from charitable sources.

The board of treasury say, therefore, that they are prepared to sanction the relief from public funds in cases of this kind, where it clearly appears that no other resource is left; and I have, accordingly, to authorize your excellency to give relief in conformity with the views of that department in urgent cases.

No. 4.

Lord Lyons to Earl Granville.

Tours, October 9, 1870. (Received October 12.)

MY LORD: Your lordship did me the honor to inform me that you had received assurances from the Prussian government that the members of the diplomatic body at Paris would receive at the hands of the Prussian authorities all the usual courtesy to which they were entitled, although it was difficult to specify beforehand the particular course which would be adopted.

I observe, however, that in answer to a request conveyed by M. Jules Favre from the diplomatic body remaining in Paris, to be warned in case it should be intended to bombard the town, and given the means of quitting the place, Count Bismarck, in a letter dated on the 26th ultimo, at Ferrières, answers that military considerations forbid his making any communications respecting the time and manner of an attack upon the fortress of Paris.

I cannot conceal from your lordship the anxiety which this letter causes me to feel for the safety of the members of Her Majesty's embassy, whom I have left in Paris, as well as for that of the numerous British subjects who have, I fear, in despite of my warnings, imprudently remained there. As regards these last, your lordship is aware that, both by advice given specially to individuals and by general notices, I did all in my power to induce Her Majesty's subjects to withdraw in time; and that I published in the newspaper and distributed among them a printed caution that those of them who remained after the warnings given would do so at their own risk and peril; and that if they delayed any longer they might not afterwards be able to get away. Notwithstanding my pressing counsels, some remained voluntarily, while others were, from illness or other causes, unable to move. I cannot, therefore, help submitting to your lordship a request that the Prussian authorities, if they really resolve on bombarding Paris, should be pressed to give these inoffensive neutrals an opportunity of previously quitting the place. The funds which were in the hands of the British charitable fund would, I should hope, suffice to pay the expense of removing those who are unable to pay for their own journey; and, in case of need, Mr. Wodehouse might be authorized to act upon the instruction contained in your lordship's dispatch of the 8th ultimo.

But it is, naturally, with regard to the members of the embassy that I feel most uneasiness. Count Bismarck states in his letter that he cannot defer to the opinion of those who regard the interior of the Paris ramparts and redoubts during a siege as a proper place for carrying on diplomatic intercourse. This observation may be, to a certain extent, well founded, so far as it regards those chiefs of missions who, having of their own free will chosen to remain in Paris, ask for special facilities for sending or receiving dispatches; but I submit that it cannot at all apply to a case like that of Mr. Wodehouse, who has staid in Paris by order of his official superiors, in order to give, as long as possible, protection to his fellow-subjects, and to preserve, as far as possible, the archives of the embassy and the government property from injury. Nor can Count Bismarck's objection affect the case of Captain Hore, who was too ill to leave Paris before it was invested. Captain Hore had indeed been for some time previously so seriously unwell as, notwithstanding the zealous efforts he made, to be scarcely able to discharge his duties. During several days before I came away he was confined to his bed in a very critical state, and I was prevented from taking him with me by the declaration of his physicians that he was not in a state to be moved. There are, moreover, servants of the embassy and servants of my own who have been kept in Paris in discharge of their duties.

I trust, therefore, that your lordship will not deem me presumptuous in earnestly requesting that special representations may be made to the Prussian authorities in order to induce them to give the persons belonging to, or employed by, the embassy the means of acting upon the instructions which I left with them to come away if the place should be threatened with bombardment or there should be any other imminent danger.

Earl Granville to Count Bernstorff.

FOREIGN OFFICE, October 14, 1870.

M. L'AMBASSADEUR: On the departure from Paris of Her Majesty's ambassador, he felt it his duty to leave behind him one of the second secretaries of the embassy, Mr. Wodehouse, in order that he might afford, as long as possible, protection to such subjects of Her Majesty, as, from various causes, had not already withdrawn from Paris, and that he might, as far as he was able, preserve the archives of the embassy and other property belonging to Her Majesty's government from injury. Together with these, he directed to remain certain servants attached to the embassy and to himself, for the discharge of their usual duties.

Colonel Claremont, military attaché to the embassy, and Captain Hore, the naval attaché, the latter being wholly incapacitated by illness from leaving Paris, remained behind under the instructions and with the sanction of Her Majesty's ambassador after his departure.

My object in now addressing your excellency is to request you, without loss of time, to bring the case of these public officers and servants, and generally of the remaining British residents, before the King of Prussia, and those acting under His Majesty's orders, whether in a civil or military capacity, and to express the earnest hope of Her Majesty's government that, before the operations at Paris assume a character by which their lives may be endangered, those persons who are in the service of the British government, and residing hitherto in Paris in execution of their public duties, as well as all other inoffensive British subjects, may be allowed an opportunity to quit the place; and Her Majesty's government do not doubt that such a request will readily be acceded to by the King of Prussia and His Majesty's advisers.

MY LORD: With reference to your excellency's dispatch of the 9th instant, I inclose, for your information, a copy of a letter which I have addressed to Count Bernstorff,* requesting him to obtain from the King of Prussia permission for the members of Her Majesty's embassy, together with the servants and other British subjects, to leave Paris.

FOREIGN OFFICE, October 18, 1870.

MY LORD: I transmitted to your excellency, in my dispatch of the 15th instant, a copy of a letter which I had addressed to Count Bernstorff, requesting him to obtain for the members of the British embassy remaining in Paris, and such inoffensive British subjects as might wish to accompany them, permission to withdraw from the French capital before a bombardment.

Count Bernstorff informed me yesterday, as I have stated to your excellency by telegraph, that the permission would be granted, and that a nominal list of the British subjects desiring to avail themselves of it should be drawn up by Mr. Wodehouse.

Count Bismarck said further that he concluded your excellency would communicate with the government at Tours on the subject, which I accordingly requested you at once to do, and to inform me of the result, and, if possible, to make it known at the Prussian headquarters, either directly to Count Bismarck or through Colonel Walker.

In requesting Count Bernstorff to thank Count Bismarck for his compliance with the wishes of Her Majesty's government in this respect, and informing him that I had communicated it to your excellency, I have further said that, as I could only communicate with Mr. Wodehouse through the Prussian headquarters, I should be obliged to Count Bismarck if he would send to Mr. Wodehouse a message from me, apprising him of the consent of the Prussian government, and desiring him at once to prepare and forward to the Prussian headquarters a list of British subjects who might desire to leave Paris; and I told him that your excellency was instructed to communicate with the government at Tours on the subject. I added that, as regards Colonel Claremont, he should follow the course adopted by the military attachés of other countries who may have remained in Paris.

MY LORD: I had this morning the honor to receive your lordship's telegram of yesterday informing me that the Prussian authorities had consented to allow the members of the embassy and other British subjects who should accompany them from Paris to pass the lines of the German army.

I went immediately to the Comte de Chaudordy, and after placing in his hand a memorandum on the subject, begged him to move the government delegation here to do all that depended upon it to facilitate the departure of my countrymen from Paris.

M. de Chaudordy said that he could answer at once for the willingness of the government here to do all in its power; but that, of course, the necessary arrangements must be made at Paris with the government and the military authorities there. If, however, I would compress an instruction to Mr. Wodehouse into a very small compass, he would undertake to send it for me to Paris in a way which he had reason to hope would prove to be both speedy and safe.

I accordingly intrusted to M. de Chaudordy a short letter in cipher, in which I informed Mr. Wodehouse that your lordship had received through the Prussian ambassador in London an assurance that the members of the British embassy and inoffensive British subjects coming out of Paris would be allowed by the German military authorities to pass. I added that it would be necessary that a list of these British subjects should be drawn up by Mr. Wodehouse for communication to the German authorities; and I desired him to settle the arrangements with the French government at Paris, and, if possible, to make the result known to Count Bismarck either directly or through Colonel Walker. I further recommended Mr. Wodehouse to take every means to give notice to all British subjects of this opportunity for them to leave Paris; and I directed him, moreover, to make such arrangements for the safe custody of the archives and of the embassy house and property as should appear to be most advisable under the circumstances. Finally, I desired him to take advantage of any means he might have of communicating with me.

Some hours after I had delivered the letter to Count Chaudordy for transmission to Mr. Wodehouse, I received your lordship's telegram of this day, informing me that you had requested the Prussian ambassador in London to beg Count Bismarck to forward a communication from you to Mr. Wodehouse on the subject of the removal of the members of the embassy and other British subjects from Paris. I trust that the result will be that Mr. Wodehouse will thus receive, in a more certain and regular way than that to which I have been obliged to have recourse, complete instructions from your lordship respecting this matter.

I have the honor to inclose a copy of the memorandum which I gave to M. de Chaudordy.

The Prussian government is ready to allow a free pass to the personnel of the English embassy now in Paris, as well as to the inoffensive British subjects who may wish to accompany them, and a list of whom may be drawn up by Mr. Wodehouse.

Lord Lyons is charged by Lord Granville at once to concert arrangements on the subject with the French government.

No. 9.

Lord Lyons to Earl Granville.

TOURS, October 25, 1870. (Received October 29.)

MY LORD: I have the honor to transmit a copy of a dispatch in which I have inclosed to Mr. Wodehouse copies of your lordship's instructions respecting his withdrawal from Paris, and respecting the relief of British subjects. I hope to have an opportunity of forwarding the dispatch to Mr. Wodehouse by Prince Wittgenstein, the military attaché to the Russian embassy, who is expected daily at Tours on his return to Paris.

I venture to suggest to your lordship's consideration the question whether the mere authority to act upon your dispatch to me of the 8th ultimo conveys beyond a doubt to Mr. Wodehouse sufficient latitude with regard to expenditure in the present emergency.

The permission granted by the Prussian authorities to British subjects to quit Paris appears to be confined to those of whom a list shall be drawn up by Mr. Wodehouse, and who shall withdraw from the place in company with him. Mr. Wodehouse will, therefore, have the arduous and laborious task, first, of taking steps to insure notice of the opportunity coming, if possible, to the knowledge of all the British subjects scattered over Paris; next, of forming a complete list of those who desire to go; then of bringing them all together at a given day and hour; then of making arrangements that they may have means of conveyance through a tract of country in which not only is all communication by railroad impossible, but in which the bridges have been broken down and the ordinary roads obstructed; and lastly, of providing under unusual difficulties for the subsistence of the whole party, until they have passed both the Prussian and French lines, and reached a district in which the ordinary modes of locomotion and subsistence are available.

It is to be observed also that Mr. Wodehouse will probably be unable, at all events at the moment, to count upon any considerable contribution to the expenses, either from the majority of the English leaving Paris or from charitable sources. The great bulk of the English now there are people in a humble class of society, who have been deprived of their livelihood by the consequences of the siege; and even among those in more fortunate circumstances we have reason to suppose that many are in temporary distress from the impossibility of obtaining remittances of money from England.

I would venture, therefore, to suggest that a sum of money adequate to the emergency should be placed at Mr. Wodehouse's disposal. I have said in the dispatch to him that I presume the bankers of the embassy, Messrs. de Rothschild, would make no difficulty in furnishing him with the money necessary; but I cannot be quite sure that this will be the case under present circumstances, and I therefore trust that your lordship will cause measures to be taken to insure his not being exposed to any embarrassment on this head, and, above all, to guard against his being obliged by want of funds to leave behind any one who may desire to come away from the perils of the siege.

It would be difficult to form an estimate of the sum required without a knowledge of various particulars, which I cannot obtain here. Among these are the number of the English who would choose to leave Paris, the route which the military authorities would require them to take, and the price of conveyances and subsistence.

I cannot doubt that the Prussian authorities, having agreed to permit the departure of British subjects, will be willing to facilitate such communications between Her Majesty's government and Mr. Wodehouse as are essential to give effect to that permission, and they will, of course, give Mr. Wodehouse the means of settling with them the necessary arrangements for the journey through their lines.

Your lordship will see that in my dispatch to Mr. Wodehouse I have suggested that Mr. Atlee and Mr. Lascelles, or one of them, might be sent to his assistance. I am, moreover, inclined to think that if the party of English should prove to be very numerons, it might be advisable that he should have at his disposal some person possessing practical experience in arranging and managing expeditions of the kind.

I purpose sending a copy of this dispatch by Prince Wittgenstein to Mr. Wodehouse. I have, &c.,

TOURS, October 25, 1870.

SIR: I inclose for your information and guidance the following papers relative to your own withdrawal and that of other British subjects from Paris:

1. Copy of dispatch from me to Earl Granville of the 9th instant.
2. Copy of dispatch from Lord Granville to me of the 15th instant.
3. Copy of note from Lord Granville to Count Bernstorff, dated 14th instant.
4. Copy of dispatch from Lord Granville to me of 18th instant.

I have, moreover, received a telegram from Lord Granville, in which, in consequence of having received from you information that there was great distress among British subjects, and that some of them, even if a free passage were granted, would be unable to avail themselves of it for want of money, his lordship desires me to authorize you to act on his instruction to me of the 8th ultimo. Consequently, I add a copy of that instruction to the other papers inclosed herein.

I have, in obedience to Lord Granville's orders, addressed myself to the government delegation here, and have been answered that they are quite willing to do all in their power to facilitate the departure from Paris of yourself and all other British subjects who may be desirous of quitting the place; but that, of course, the necessary arrangements must be made with the government and military authorities there. I have, accordingly, to desire you to settle these arrangements with the government at Paris, and, if possible, to make the result known to Count Bismarck, either directly or through Colonel Walker. You should also take advantage of any opportunity you may have of communicating it to me.

You will, naturally, use every means in your power to cause notice of this opportunity of leaving Paris to be brought to the knowledge of all the British subjects left in the place.

You will make such arrangements for the safe custody of the archives, and of the embassy house and property, as may appear to you to be most advisable under the circumstances.

I presume that the bankers of the embassy, Messrs. de Rothschild, will make no difficulty in furnishing you with the money necessary to enable you to carry out Lord Granville's instructions for the relief of British subjects.

You may, perhaps, desire to have some more assistance than you can procure at Paris under present circumstances, in the very arduous and laborious task of giving notice to British subjects, drawing up the list of them, collecting them, and bringing them through the lines of the French and German armies. In that case, Mr. Atlee and Mr. Lascelles, or one of them, might be directed to go to your assistance, and to convey to you, if necessary, money to defray the expenses of the relief and removal of the indigent British subjects. Her Majesty's government would, I feel sure, easily obtain from the German authorities safe-conducts for these members of the embassy.

I hope that you will have the means of making your wishes known to Lord Granville or to me. You need not hesitate to send your dispatches on these subjects to his lordship or to me open, if their passage through the Prussian lines would be thereby facilitated. In a matter of humanity, in which the lives of many of our inoffensive countrymen may be at stake, any formal scruples on this head would be entirely out of place. I shall myself send the present dispatch to you unsealed.

BORDEAUX, December 27, 1870. (Received January 1, 1871.)

MY LORD: I have the honor to submit to your lordship a copy of a letter, dated Paris, November 23, and signed "Pollock," which reached me the day before yesterday. I know nothing of the writer.

The object of the letter is to call attention to the cases of the large number of British subjects who are still in Paris, and who are now desirous of getting away.

Major General Claremont will, no doubt, have been able to give your lordship full information as to the prospect there may be of enabling these British subjects to qu

Paris. So far as my knowledge of the matter goes, I have reason to believe that the obstacles are now caused by the French as much as by the German authorities, and that, in fact, the removal of any considerable number of persons from Paris under flag of truce is necessarily attended by circumstances seriously embarrassing the operations of the besieged garrison.

Your lordship is well aware of the urgency with which I pressed British subjects to leave Paris before I came away myself, and of the distinct notice I gave that those who remained after the warnings they had received would do so at their own risk and peril, and might not be able to get away afterward. Still I venture to recommend the matter to your lordship's attention, and to suggest in particular that an opportunity of leaving the place should certainly be given to neutrals, if there be any immediate danger of its being bombarded.

MY LORD: I have the honor to recall to your excellency's attention that there still remain here about one hundred of Her Majesty's subjects very unwilling prisoners, and to earnestly solicit an early intercession on their behalf.

My personal dread of having to spend Christmas (usually a season of happy family reunion) in this desolate city, decides me to write also to influential friends in the House to lay our unfortunate case before Lord Granville.

Trusting that your lordship's firm representation will suffice to change the present capricious decision of the authorities,

No. 11.

Earl Granville to Mr. Odo Russell.

FOREIGN OFFICE, January 23, 1871.

SIR: I telegraphed to you on the 21st instant, stating that Her Majesty's government were anxious to make arrangements for the safe withdrawal from Paris of such British subjects as might wish to escape from the dangers to which they were exposed by the bombardment; and I requested you to inquire whether permission would be granted to a British diplomatic or consular officer to enter Paris for the purpose of making such an arrangement. I added that, if the requisite permission were granted, there were several courses open, any one of which might be adopted as might seem most expedient; either it might be advisable to send Mr. Wodehouse or Mr. Atlee from England, or a general authority might be given to Count Bernstorff to grant a pass to Versailles to any person named to him; or some Englishman might be found at Versailles or in Paris to whom the task might be confided.

The telegram which I received from you on the 22d, stating that the military authorities refused to permit any one to enter Paris until after the capitulation, made it clear that none of these courses were practicable, except, to a limited extent, that last mentioned; and I therefore telegraph to you to-day to confine yourself to endeavoring to arrange with Mr. Blount for the protection of his fellow-countrymen in Paris, and for extending to them further relief, if the sum now placed at the disposal of the charitable fund should, contrary to expectation, prove insufficient for the purpose of relieving the immediate pressure, both up to and after the capture of the city. I added that I should wish you to inform me without delay of the steps which you might take in the matter.

No. 12.

Lord Lyons to Earl Granville.

BORDEAUX, January 20, 1871. (Received January 29.)

MY LORD: In my dispatch of the 27th ultimo I spoke of the British subjects still in Paris, and suggested that an opportunity of leaving the place should certainly be given to neutrals, if there should be any immediate danger of its being bombarded.

The bombardment has since been actually begun, and, so far as I know, without any previous notice having been given, and without any means having been afforded for neutrals to escape from the city.

I have just been informed by the Italian minister and the Spanish chargé d'affaires here that their governments have been in communication with the Prussian authorities at Berlin on the subject, and have been given reason to expect that the commanders of the German forces will allow each of them to send a diplomatic or consular officer into Paris to make arrangement for the removal of his countrymen. My two colleagues have accordingly determined to dispatch at once secretaries of their legations to Versailles and Paris for this purpose.

The French government here furnishes the secretaries with safe-conducts to secure their passing unmolested through the French lines.

I have thought it right to forward this information to your lordship as speedily as possible by telegraph.

BORDEAUX, January 23, 1871. (Received January 29.)

MY LORD: On the receipt of your lordship's telegram of the day before yesterday I went to the Comte de Chaudordy, and begged him to send at once to the French chargé d'affaires in London instructions to give a letter for the government at Paris and a safe-conduct to any diplomatic or consular officer who might be selected by Her Majesty's government to proceed to the bombarded city to make arrangements for removing British subjects.

M. de Chaudordy promised to send a telegram at once to M. Tissot to this effect. He said that he presumed that the French military authorities would everywhere recognize and respect the safe-conduct from the embassy in London, especially as the bearer of it would be also provided with a letter from the chargé d'affaires to the Paris government. He suggested, however, that it would still be well that the person sent by your lordship should have a safe-conduct from the delegation here if one could be sent to him in time.

I understand that the secretary sent by the Italian minister is to go, in the first instance, to Berlin, while the secretary of the Spanish legation is to endeavor to pass through the French and Prussian lines, and thus reach Versailles by the direct route from this place.

I am myself of opinion that this endeavor will be attended with considerable risk, and that in all probability the Spanish secretary will not gain anything in point of time by attempting to take the direct route.

I may, perhaps, suggest that, in any case, a letter from your lordship to the government at Paris would have very great weight in inducing them to permit the withdrawal of British subjects and to afford facilities for effecting it.

MY LORD: I have the honor to transmit to your lordship herewith a letter which I have written to Mr. Blount, 3, Rue de la Paix, Paris, who has, as your lordship has just done me the honor to inform me, been appointed Her Majesty's counsel in that city. It contains a list of some pressing applications which have been made to me respecting persons and property in Paris, and which I desire to recommend to Mr. Blount's attention.

I shall be much obliged if your lordship will direct the letter to be sent to Paris in the most expeditious manner. It is open, and there is no objection to its being forwarded in that state, and submitted, if necessary, to the inspection of any French or German authorities.

No. 15.

Lord Lyons to Earl Granville.

BORDEAUX, February 26, 1871. (Received March 1.)

MY LORD: I perceive that observations have been made in both houses of Parliament on the fact of my having left Paris in the month of September last, and on the steps which I took to provide for the protection of British subjects there during my absence.

I do not think it necessary to say much here on the first point. I was advised to remove to Tours by M. Jules Favre, and pressed to accompany them to that place by the representatives of the great powers of Europe. I traveled to Tours with the representatives of Austria, Italy, Russia, and Turkey, and we were followed immediately by the Spanish chargé d'affaires, and afterward by the representatives of other powers. In fact, the only chief of a diplomatic mission from any great power who staid at Paris was Mr. Washburne, the United States minister. As representing a nation which punctiliously abstains from taking part in the political affairs of Europe, Mr. Washburne had not the same reasons as representatives of European powers for removing to a place at which he could serve as a means of communication between his Government and the government of France; and as being charged with the protection of North German subjects in France, he was allowed by the German military authorities facilities for correspondence during the siege which were denied to the representatives of other governments. I conceded, at the time, that it was my duty neither to reject the advice of the French minister for foreign affairs, nor to separate myself from my principal colleagues, and I thought it would be, on all accounts, inexpedient for me to allow myself to be shut up in Paris and to be deprived of all speedy and satisfactory means of communicating with your lordship. My subsequent experience has, I confess, confirmed me in these opinions. On the day after I left Paris all communication by road with that place was intercepted, and on the following day the last telegraph wire was cut. The diplomatists who were left in the besieged city were refused by the German authorities positively all facilities for corresponding with their governments otherwise than by letters left open for the inspection of those authorities. My having resided at the seat of the delegation of the government at Tours, and having followed them to Bordeaux, have been accepted by the French as manifest proofs of the desire of Her Majesty's government to maintain intimate and friendly relations with them, while my doing so has afforded Her Majesty's government the readiest and most effectual means of maintaining such relations in fact.

On the question of the provision made by me for the protection of British subjects when I myself left Paris, it may, perhaps, be desirable that I should make some explanation in addition to the reports which I addressed to your lordship at the time. The objections made against the course I took appear to resolve themselves into a complaint that I did not leave Mr. Atlee, the consul, at Paris, instead of or in addition to Mr. Wodehouse, one of the secretaries of the embassy.

What happened was this: When it became apparent that an attack upon Paris was imminent I naturally became desirous of reducing the number of members of the embassy, whom I kept with me there, to the lowest point compatible with the performance of the work. Much of the ordinary business, and in particular the not inconsiderable part of it caused by the passage of Queen's messengers, and the necessity of transmitting without delay dispatches brought by them, was sure to be suspended by the siege; consequently, I thought that the services of two of the members of the chancery might be temporarily dispensed with. It so happened that two of these had wives and families, while the rest were unmarried. I therefore selected, as most proper to send away, the two married men, of whom Mr. Atlee was one.

As your lordship is aware, although Mr. Atlee holds a commission as consul, his principal functions are those of attaché librarian and registrar to the embassy. In ordinary times there are some technical advantages in having a person with the character of consul in immediate connection with the embassy, among which may be reckoned his collecting, on account of Her Majesty's government, consular fees which considerably exceed in amount the consular salary allowances.

Under the circumstances, however, under which my departure took place, there were certainly no special functions which could be better discharged by a consul than by a secretary of the embassy. I had no power to take out of the hands of the committee of the British charitable fund the management of the charitable contributions for the relief of distressed British subjects. I had most certainly no wish to do so. On the contrary, I had the fullest confidence in the members of that committee, whom the most generous motives induced to stay in Paris; and the noble and unwearying devotion with which they have discharged the benevolent duties they undertook have more than justified the high opinion I had formed of them. In fact, the object which rendered the presence of a member of the embassy in Paris desirable was that he should communicate officially with the French government, and exercise an influence with them on behalf of Her Majesty's subjects; and it appeared to me that I should better provide for the attainment of this object by presenting a secretary to the minister for foreign affairs as representative of the embassy than by simply leaving a consul in the town. I accordingly presented Mr. Wodehouse to M. Jules Favre in that capacity. In fact, while Mr. Wodehouse could perfectly well perform all the functions that could be discharged by a consul, he was in a much better position than a consul could have been for communicating efficiently with the minister for foreign affairs or other French authorities.

I was naturally anxious not to expose any of Her Majesty's servants unnecessarily, and I conceived that, by stationing Mr. Wodehouse and General Claremont, the military attaché at Paris, I made the best provision in my power for the protection of the British subjects who remained there.

I left with Mr. Wodehouse orders to come away from Paris himself if the place should be threatened with immediate bombardment; and in that case to do his utmost to obtain a safe passage out for all British subjects. I considered that in such a contingency the protection of any of our countrymen who might still remain could not be transferred to better hands than to those of General Claremont, who, from his intimacy with General Trochu and his large acquaintance among French military men and well-known influence with them, would have peculiar means of befriending and assisting British subjects if actual danger from military operations should be imminent.

As the minister of marine was established at Tours, and as it was manifest that no naval intelligence could be attainable during the siege, I should have brought Captain Hore, the naval attaché, away with me if he had not been too ill to travel.

The orders I left with him were, as your lordship is aware, to rejoin me as soon as his health should admit of his doing so.

Since I left Paris I have had no other active duty to perform in the matter than to endeavor to forward orders from your lordship to Mr. Wodehouse. But I feel confident that your lordship will consider that my whole correspondence with you, both before and since I left Paris, shows that I have been in constant anxiety respecting the British subjects there, and earnestly desirous that every effort should be made for their practicable relief.

I subjoin a list of some of the principal dispatches I have had the honor to address to your lordship on the subject.

SIR: The Senate having advised and consented thereto, the President has ratified the treaty between the United States and Great Britain for the settlement of pending questions between the two countries signed at Washington on the 8th instant, and I now transmit to you by the hands of Mr. Bancroft C. Davis, of Massachusetts, who goes out as bearer of dispatches, the American ratification to be exchanged against that of Her Britannic Majesty, with full power to enable you to effect that object. You will, accordingly, upon the receipt of this dispatch, inform Her Majesty's principal secretary of state for foreign affairs that the treaty has been ratified on our part, and that you are authorized to exchange the ratifications with such persons as may be duly empowered for for that purpose on the part of the British government. When the exchange shall have been effected you will execute jointly with the person appointed on behalf of the government of Great Britain duplicate certificates, similar to those which are inclosed, one of which shall be given to the British government, and the other you will forward to this Department.

As soon as the exchange of the ratifications takes place you will please forward the British ratification to the United States by the hands of Mr. Davis.

London, June 5, 1871. (Received June 20.)

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that his excellency General Robert C. Schenck, accompanied by his family and General Maxwell Woodhull, appointed assistant secretary to this mission, arrived in London on the 3d instant, and that he has this day communicated by note to Lord Granville the office copy of his letter of credence, and taken charge of the legation.

Lord Granville is in Scotland in official attendance upon the Queen, but will return to London in a few days; and it is expected that Her Majesty will arrive at Windsor from Balmoral about the 19th instant. General Schenck's presentation to the Queen cannot well take place before that date unless he should make a special trip to Scotland for the purpose, an event not likely to arise; but he may safely count upon an audience either in London or at Windsor for the delivery of his original letter of credence during the last ten days of this month.

All classes of the British people have given General Schenck a sincere and cordial welcome, and this feeling is more general than has been observed on the occasion of the arrival of a new American minister at this court in the last eighteen years.

In conclusion, I beg to express my best thanks to the President and yourself for having confided to my care the interests of the nation here for so long a period, and for continuing me under General Schenck in the post of secretary of this legation.

 London, June 22, 1871. (Received July 6.)

SIR: Last Friday, the 16th, I sent a telegram informing you that the next day was appointed for the exchange of ratifications of the treaty.

A copy of that telegram is inclosed.

I have the satisfaction to inform you that, having produced and exchanged powers from our respective governments, the formal exchange of ratifications took place, as agreed between Lord Granville and myself, on Saturday the 17th, at quarter past 2 o'clock p. m., at the Foreign Office. I note the exact time and place as marking an interesting and momentous point in the history of the two countries and their governments. Besides Lord Granville and myself, there were present and assisting on our part, Mr. Moran, secretary of legation, and General Woodhull, assistant secretary; and on the other side, Lord Tenderden and Mr. Bergne, of the Foreign Office. No particular ceremony was observed beyond the signing of the certificates of our action. There was, however, an interchange of hearty mutual congratulation that we had completed an act which has not only removed all present serious differences, but established, we hope, lasting peace and better understanding between the two countries.

Mr. Bancroft C. Davis, your bearer of dispatches, who brought to me the American copy of the treaty, will carry back with him, as directed, the British copy. He will sail with it from Liverpool on Saturday, the 24th instant, in the steamer Scotia. He has acquitted himself with faithful attention to the trust you committed to him.

I send with the treaty a copy of the power to Lord Granville exchanged with me, and the certificate of the due execution of our authority.

Victoria, by the grace of God, Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c., &c., &c. To all and singular to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

Whereas, for the better treating of and arranging certain matters which are now in discussion, or which may come into discussion, between us and any other powers and states, we have judged it expedient to invest a fit person with full power to conduct the said discussion on our part: Know ye, therefore, that we, reposing especial trust and confidence in the wisdom, loyalty, diligence, and circumspection of right trusty and right well-beloved cousin and counselor Granville, George Earl Granville, Lord Leveson, a Peer of our United Kingdom, Knight of our most noble order of the Garter, our principal secretary of state for foreign affairs, have named, made, constituted, and appointed, as we do by these presents, name, make, constitute, and appoint him our nudoubted commissioner, procurator, and plenipotentiary, giving to him all manner of power and authority to treat, adjust, and conclude, with such minister or ministers as may be vested with similar power and authority on the part of any powers or states as aforesaid, any treaties, conventions, or agreements that may tend to the attainment of the above-mentioned end, and to sign for us and in our name everything so agreed upon and concluded, and to do and transact all such other matters as may appertain to the finishing of the aforesaid work, in as ample manner and form, and with equal force and efficacy, as we ourselves could do, if personally present; engaging and promising, upon our royal word, that whatever things shall be so transacted and concluded by our said commissioner, procurator, and plenipotentiary, shall be agreed to, acknowledged, and accepted by us in the fullest manner, and that we will never suffer, either in the whole or in part, any person whatsoever, to infringe the same, or act contrary thereto, as far as it lies in our power.

In witness whereof, we have caused the great seal of our United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland to be affixed to these presents, which we have signed with our royal hand.

SIR: I have to inform you that about three weeks since Sir Edward Thornton called upon me at my house in the country, to submit for my consideration, under instructions from his government, draughts of proposed instructions from the respective governments to their ministers at Florence, Berne, and Rio, together with draughts of a proposed note which their representatives were to be respectively instructed to communicate to the governments to which they are accredited. I was at the time of Sir Edward's call seriously ill, and forbidden to attend to business. As soon as I was able to do so, I gave these several draughts my serious consideration and suggested several amendments which, I understand, have received the assent of Lord Granville. I have to-day sent out these instructions to the American ministers at Florence, Berne, and Rio, in form (mutatis mutandis) as shown the inclosed in copy of the instructions to Mr. Partridge, except that the other notes did not contain the postscript which was on the instructions to Mr. Partridge. This postscript was made necessary by the fact that the Emperor of Brazil is at present in Europe. It is not improbable that, on consultation with Lord Granville, it may be deemed advisable to take steps for bringing the subject directly to the notice of His Majesty. In that event you will, should the Emperor be in London, exercise your own judgment as to the steps to be taken; should it be proposed to make the communication on the Continent, you will telegraph for instructions. At the same time, Sir Edward desired to bring to my notice proposed instructions to the British and American ministers at Berlin as to the boundary arbitration, and a form of a note on the part of each government to the government of the Emperor of Germany. These I found to be unexceptionable, and instructions in that sense go out by to-day's mail.

SIR: I transmit to you herewith the draught of a note which you will present to the government of His Imperial Majesty, requesting that His Majesty will be pleased to appoint an arbitrator to form with the arbitrators to be named by the President, by Her Britannic Majesty, by His Majesty the King of Italy, and by the President of the Swiss Confederation, the tribunal of arbitration to which in pursuance of the first article of the treaty signed at Washington on the 8th of May, of which a copy is sent to you herewith, the United States and Her Britannic Majesty have agreed that all the claims growing out of the acts committed by the several vessels which have given rise to the claims generically known as the "Alabama claims" shall be referred.

You will arrange with your British colleague for the simultaneous presentation of your respective notes on this subject.

You will not fail to draw the attention of the minister of foreign affairs, unofficially, to the last clause of the first article, as to the period within which it is hoped that an arbitrator will be named.

I am, sir, your obedient servant.

HAMILTON FISH.

P. S.—It being understood that His Imperial Majesty is now in Europe, a copy of this instruction and of its inclosure will be forwarded to General Scheuck, with instructions to confer with Her Majesty's government, and, if it shall be deemed advisable, in view of the short time remaining for the appointment of an arbitrator, to also take steps to bring the subject there to the attention of His Imperial Majesty.

Draught of note to government of Brazil.

Differences having arisen between the Government of the United States and the government of Her Britannic Majesty, growing out of the acts committed by the several vessels which have given rise to the claims generally known as the "Alabama claims," the high contracting parties, in order to remove and adjust all complaints and claims on the part of the United States, and to provide for the speedy settlement of such claims, have agreed, by the first article of the treaty signed at Washington on the 8th of May, 1871, of which a copy is annexed, to refer all the said claims growing out of acts committed by the aforesaid vessels, and generically known as the "Alabama claims" to a tribunal of arbitration, to be composed of five arbitrators, to be appointed in the following manner, that is to say: One shall be named by the President of the United States; one shall be named by Her Britannic Majesty; His Majesty the Emperor of Brazil shall be requested to name one; His Majesty the King of Italy shall be requested to name one; the President of the Swiss Confederation shall be requested to name one.

The high contracting parties, therefore, reposing entire confidence in the spirit of justice and impartiality which distinguishes His Majesty the Emperor of Brazil, the common friend of the two states, have agreed, in pursuance of the said treaty, to address themselves severally to His Majesty, and to request His Majesty to be pleased to appoint an arbitrator, to form, with the arbitrators to be named by the other powers above named, the tribunal of arbitration, to which reference agreed upon in the first article of the treaty shall be made.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States, having received the orders of his Government to communicate to His Majesty the Emperor of Brazil the agreement thus made on the part of the United States, has been further charged to express the earnest wish of the President of the United States that His Majesty the Emperor will be willing to afford his good offices on the present occasion, and will be pleased to appoint an arbitrator to act in the premises.

The undersigned has the honor to request the [minister of foreign affairs] to lay this communication before His Majesty, and to be pleased to make known to the undersigned His Majesty's determination with regard to the request therein set forth.

SIR: You will have noted the discussion which took place in the House of Commons on Friday last, the 4th instant, on the motion of Sir Charles Adderley for the production of copies of instructions given by Her Majesty's government to their commissioners at Washington. I now send you, in form for preservation, a full report of that debate, taken from the London Times of last Saturday.

I have, &c.,

ROBT C. SCHENCK.

[From the London Times, August 5, 1871.]

Parliamentary intelligence.—House of Commons, Friday, August 4.

THE TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

Sir C. Adderley, in bringing forward this subject, said he was sorry that so important a discussion as he now wished to introduce should come on at such an hour, (nearly half-past 5.) He also greatly regretted the delay which had occurred in that house, having an opportunity of expressing its opinion on the Washington treaty. It was, however, better that the house should express an opinion on that treaty even now than that it should express no opinion upon it at all. If the house were to take no notice whatever of the late Washington treaty, what would be the opinion of the world as to the view taken by this country of that instrument? All that would appear to the world and all that would appear to the arbitrators who were about to arbitrate on the subject, as indicating the feeling of this country in regard to the treaty, would be these three facts—First, that Her Majesty had conferred almost the highest honor on one of the commissioners who negotiated it; second, that the other house of Parliament had refused to indorse a resolution condemnatory of the treaty; and, third, that the House of Commons had apparently given its perfect consent to that treaty by total silence. It would evidently be deemed, from those three facts, by the arbitrators, and by the world at large, that this country thought it had gained a signal triumph and made an extraordinarily good bargain for itself and for its colonies under that treaty, whereas the fact was that this country had made an enormous concession in the interests of peace. [Hear, hear.] Now, it could not be held to be too late to consider that subject in that house, or at least it was equally too late when it was discussed elsewhere; for it was then remarked by one of the highest authorities who took part in the debate upon it in the other house that the treaty was already in honor accepted by this country and signed by Her Majesty's plenipotentiaries.

It was important that the House of Commons should now express some opinion upon that treaty. The arbitration was still before them—the possible burdens thrown on the tax-payers of this country were still before them; and what was still more important, new rules of international and maritime law were established by that treaty, [hear, hear,] and it would be strange if the representatives of a commercial people like ours did not think it was worth while even to give any opinion upon those new rules. [Hear.] In opening the subject he would state, as briefly as he could, the view he took of the conduct of the government in reference to the treaty. He had not one word to say against the commissioners, personally or otherwise. They appeared to have faithfully and efficiently carried out the instructions they received from the government during the course of the negotiations. The circumstances were simply these: At the end of last year, apparently, Lord Granville thought it necessary to instruct Sir Edward Thornton to urge on Mr. Fish, as absolutely necessary for the maintenance of good relations between the two countries, that there should be a conference on the subject of the fisheries. It was proposed that the conference should be held at Washington, by commissioners to be appointed by both governments. In January the subject was opened to Mr. Fish, who, on the part of the President, accepted the proposal on condition that the Alabama claims should be added to the subjects of the conference. Within forty-eight hours Sir Edward Thornton cordially thanked Mr. Fish for so accepting the proposal, and acquiesced in his condition, further adding the claims of British subjects on the United States, and of American citizens against the British government for damages received in war to the subjects of conference. This was agreed to; and the commissioners were immediately appointed. Now, on these preliminaries he ventured to make this remark; he thought it unfortunate that this country was made a petitioner for a conference, the subjects of which were of far more importance to America than to us. The subject of the fisheries, for instance, which country was most interested in its settlement? The country in possession, and whose rights were undoubted to exclude others from the waters, or the country which wished to be admitted to a share of those rights? He did not mean to say that it was desirable the then state of the fishery question should continue. Far from it. After the cessation of the reciprocity treaty the United States fishermen were admitted to those waters upon licenses, but these were so difficult to maintain that their exclusion was enforced by an armed Canadian flotilla. The position of the two parties was reversed when England became the petitioner. If that was the case with reference to the fishery question, how much more so was it the case with the Alabama claim? England had comparatively no interest in the settlement of that question. The claim had already been discredited by the exaggeration of the Americans themselves. The sober, thinking men of America had tacitly admitted that we stood well in the matter, by their refusing the arbitration when it was first offered. He must say, without any reflection on the statesmen of that great country, it was an unfortunate result of their democratic institutions that they must always have some election cry, and no cry was so effective as a cry against England. Could there be a better election cry than this, with reference to which we stood clear in the eyes of the world? He had only one other remark to make in passing. It appeared that, from the moment when the negotiations began, the subject which was added to the terms of the conference—the Alabama claim—became the principal one, and the fishery claim, for which the conference was got, became subsidiary, and assumed a very minor part in the progress of the negotiations. With reference to the treaty itself, he would merely remark as to the personages chosen to nominate the arbitrators, the Americans had certainly no reason to complain of them. The Emperor of Brazil, both by recent events and his position of neighborhood, was not likely to be unfavorable to the Americans; and the President of the Swiss Republic, by the nature of the institutions of his country, was not likely to be antipathetic to the Americans; while the place where the arbitrators were to meet—Geneva—was about as favorable to the Americans as the city where the negotiations were begun—Washington. The claims connected with Canada were, first, the Fenian claims; second, the fishery claims; third, arrangements with regard to trade; and fourth, the arrangement of boundaries. He drew no distinction between Canadian and English interests. They were both imperial and had been treated throughout as one. The understanding throughout the negotiations was that neither interest should be settled without the other. They were to be established or dropped together. The interests, in fact, were identical. To begin with the Alabama claim, its reference to arbitration was not new. It had been proposed for arbitration by the convention signed by Lord Clarendon and Mr. Reverdy Johnson. What were the terms of that convention? “Whether England had fulfilled her obligations at the time the Alabama sailed.” The American Senate refused to consent to that arbitration. Why? Clearly because they foresaw that England was clear; but now America accepted the arbitration. Why? Because of the change made in the terms of reference. The reference now was, whether England, in 1861, had fulfilled her obligations in new and stricter terms drawn up in 1871. The question now was, whether in a matter of mutual obligation new rules should be adopted different from those on which the obligation rested. When the Americans rejected the first arbitration they put themselves in the wrong; and they accepted it on the new terms, hoping to put us in the wrong. It was on these terms that we had consented to refer the claims. It had been said that no rules had been laid down of international law at the time, and therefore it was necessary to put in terms rules by which this arbitration should be guided. But the language of the commissioners in conference struck this ground of defense from under them; because they admitted distinctly that the rules on which the arbitration was proposed did not exist, and were not in force at the time—that the principles on which the arbitration was agreed on were not in force at the time the Alabama sailed.

He did not pretend to enter into the merits of these new rules; he should be glad to have the opinion of the honorable and learned member for Richmond (Sir R. Palmer) on that subject. Different views were taken of these new rules. Some argued they were very good for England for the future, but, curiously enough, the ground on which they said so was because England had generally been belligerent. Now he held that was not true. Others took a very strong view against these new rules, and said they were altogether retrograde and in direct antagonism to international law, and that they would either become a dead letter or a very great hardship on English commerce. But it mattered very little what the merits of the new rules might be for the future; what he asked was, whether it was wise or an act of self-stultification to offer ourselves to be tried on the fulfillment of a mutual obligation by rules different from those on which the obligation itself rested. By the new rules it was stipulated that "due diligence" should be given. Did not that itself mean that what the old principles demanded was not "due diligence"—that the "diligence" demanded by the old principles of maritime neutrality was less than "due?" The change was a restriction of the rules by which we were to be tried, and a chance was given of a verdict being found against us. He believed that even on these stricter rules we should stand clear, and it would be distinctly proved that we fulfilled our obligations. But that did not at all justify the proceedings to which he had alluded. He knew it was said by some that, whether this was an act of stultification or not, it was in the interests of peace—that a nation like this ought to be magnanimous—that it was the highest duty of nations to promote peace—that nothing was so noble as magnanimity, and if England could not afford to be magnanimous what nation could? But there were limits beyond which magnanimity became folly, subjecting the actors to suspicion of want of proper spirit and self-respect. When in the eyes of the world we apparently stood clear to agree to change the standard of right in order to give our accusers the advantage and ourselves the chance of condemnation was an act in which magnanimity passed into folly, and the sublime into the ridiculous. With respect to the other minor claims, namely, those of British merchants on the United States, and the claims of the United States on England for damages during war, there was only one question he had to put, and that was put by Lord Cairns in another place, which had received no answer. That question was why there was a limit put on the treaty to the date of the claim of the British merchant, while no limit was placed to the Alabama and the smaller claims. The claims of British merchants for damage in war must be made between the 13th of April, 1861, and the 9th of April, 1865, which was at least six months before the end of the war. But there was no such restriction on the other side. When the question was put why this difference existed, the only answer was that no doubt the American Government would fairly acknowledge any further claim. But that, he thought, was no satisfactory answer; the question remained to be answered. He now proceeded to the last group of subjects, namely, the Canadian claims: First of all, there were the Fenian claims. It seemed to him there was no possibility of defending the course which government had instructed the commissioners to take on the subject of the Fenian claims. Whatever gave weight to the Alabama claims gave tenfold weight to the Fenian claims. With regard to the Alabama, the question was whether the British government had watched her with due diligence so as to prevent her escape. But it was known that fifty regiments of Fenians were drilling from day to day. Their movements were regularly reported to the American Government, but they always excused themselves from interference with their movements on the grounds of electioneering emergencies. On the other hand, we had stretched the law against ourselves to admit the Alabama claims. It was not the amount of the Fenian claims on which he laid stress so much as on the principle which was involved. The second Canadian claim was as to the fisheries. It was said that Canada had the right of setting aside this treaty; but that was not correct. Canada had only the same right in this respect as the Parliament of the country or the Congress of America had; because the treaty necessitated a certain amount of legislation by each of these powers. The Canadian part of the treaty could not be carried out without the passing and repealing of certain acts. But, at the same time, he must say these fisheries were of enormous value to Canada. Their value had been greatly increased by improvements she had herself carried out. They were great nurseries of seamen destined, he hoped, to become one day a great Canadian navy. That being so, these fisheries ought not to be shared in without adequate payment. The only question, therefore, was as to the terms on which both countries should be admitted to these waters. Licenses would be impossible, and exclusion still more so, and the terms mentioned in the treaty were the only ones upon which an arrangement could be made, viz, that all the seas being open equally to both countries, the difference of value should be estimated between them, and the possessors of the least valuable fisheries should compensate by paying the difference. The Cau-dians would always have an advantage from fishing in their own waters, their trade being already established, besides which they were closer to home. They also had the advantage of superior waters, and that they would not lose by a common right of fishery. Canada, however, seemed to have become blinded by a long-continued controversy until she had identified in her own mind the reciprocity treaty and the fisheries, as if they were inseparable subjects. Good, however, might be done by lookers-on who could take a wider view of the matter, and show that there was no inseparable connection between those subjects, but that, on the contrary, Canada, looking upon her own great fisheries as a means of enforcing free trade, was selling her fisheries for nothing, because free trade was working itself out by a natural process, and the Canadians were certain to obtain it, for some articles were already being freely admitted into the American markets.

Those who put an end to the reciprocity treaty in the middle of the American civil war, when there were no members for the Southern States in Congress, did so, not from protectionist views, but rather from an idea in the minds of the Northern States that the termination of that treaty would so embarrass Canada as to lead to annexation. In that they had been entirely disappointed, for the cessation of that treaty had done infinite good to Canada, having stimulated her to find a large foreign trade independent of the Americans. The trade with America had rapidly increased since the cessation of that treaty, as there were many articles of absolute necessity for which America was dependent on Canada, and America, in imposing duties on these articles, was making her own citizens pay and injuring Canada as little as possible. The Canadians were mistaken in connecting the revival of the reciprocity treaty with the opening of their fisheries, which should stand entirely on its own merits. He was not without hope that Canada would find the terms of the treaty were much more favorable to her than she at first imagined. The money compensation ought to balance the different value of the fisheries, in addition to which the free admission of their fish to the American markets was of such infinite value that it had already reconciled the maritime provinces to the treaty. The dislike to the treaty seemed to be confined to Upper Canada. There were also to be considered the trade arrangements, such as the opening of the St. Lawrence below the 45th parallel of latitude; but that to America was nothing new, beyond its being made a matter of treaty. Again, on the Canadian canals Americans paid only the same duties as the Canadians themselves. Of course, if a war broke out it would be in the power of Her Majesty to close the passage of the St. Lawrence to the Americans. On the other hand, the opening of Lake Michigan to the Canadian merchants was of very great importance, because on the south of that lake was that great emporium of middle America, Chicago, and no greater advantage could be secured to the Canadians than the free navigation of that lake, in addition to which there was the concession of the coasting trade with the ports on those lakes. With respect to the boundaries he had nothing to say, because any dispute was to be settled by arbitration, and to the arbitrators he could offer no objection. With regard to the San Juan boundary, he heard that documents had recently been discovered which would tend to the maintenance of the British claim to that portion of the boundary. On the whole, he was of opinion that the government ought, at all events, to offer some defense of their conduct with regard to the negotiations on these points: First, the mode in which they initiated this conference; secondly, their substitution of the Alabama claims as a primary topic of conference when it was merely an addition to that conference; thirdly, their consent to substitute rules for our trial as to the fulfillment of obligations different from those which were primarily received; fourthly, the obvious inequality of foregoing on our part the similar and much stronger Fenian claims; and, lastly, the limit given to closing the claims of British merchants, whereas no limit was given to the claims against ourselves. On all these points the house should receive information from the government, who ought to defend the instructions they had given to the commissioners whom they had sent to Washington. At the same time the house would, he believed, express a feeling which prevailed throughout the country by saying that, apart from any mistakes in the process of negotiation, it was the cordial and unanimous wish of this country that those negotiations might end in cementing permanent peace and good will between the two countries [cheers] and in removing any irritation or causes of future dispute between two kindred nations, that ought to go hand in hand in promoting the prosperity of the world. [Hear, hear.] However wanting in equity might have been the negotiations on some points, he hoped the mistakes of administration would not hinder kindly relations between these two countries, for such relations would best rest on mutual self-respect. [Hear, hear.] He moved for the production of copies of any instructions given by Her Majesty's ministers to their commissioners at Washington during the negotiations.

Sir Roundell Palmer said it must be satisfactory to the house to find that on the colonial branch, on which the right honorable gentleman was entitled to speak with the greatest authority, the treaty of Washington was entirely approved by him. He was indebted to the right honorable gentleman for having (with the assistance of government) brought this subject forward, because he felt that it would not become the house to separate without devoting some time to a review of this matter. He took the deepest interest in it because he was a member, though a subordinate one, of the government, during whose tenure of office there arose many of the transactions out of which this treaty sprung, and also because he, in common with every British citizen, had a desire that the honor of this country in all public matters might be maintained; that, in all arrangements growing out of all disagreements between this and other countries, there should be taken due measures to obtain security for the future; and also, if it were possible, cordial good will should subsist between ourselves and that great country on the other side of the Atlantic which had sprung from us. [Hear, hear.] On our side that good will had subsisted without interruption, and the difficulty to many of them of forming a sober estimate of these transactions was increased by the wonder how it could be possible that our feeling toward the United States could be misunderstood by them.

There had not been a time at which we were not willing to have made great sacrifices in order to maintain cordial relations with the United States, but no sacrifices were worthy of a great nation or could tend to the maintenance of cordial relations which involved in any degree a sacrifice or compromise of public honor. [Hear, hear.] Nor would it have been consistent with wisdom to enter into any arrangements for the removal of present differences unless regard was had to the future, and there was a likelihood of their containing securities against future interruption. Regarding, in the first place, the considerations connected with our national honor, he did not regard that honor as compromised by what had been done, but, even taking the low ground of the honor of the government, of which he was a member during the American war, he could not agree that its honor or credit had been compromised, for had he thought it had been, he could not have expressed his acquiescence in the arrangements which had been made. He believed that that government did nothing during that critical period but what was honorable and upright. That which had been made one of the main subjects of criticism was, to his thinking, one of the most satisfactory points of the treaty; viz, that while consenting to certain rules for the future, and allowing them to be applied as rules of judgment with respect to the past, we had guarded ourselves against being supposed to admit that if it should appear to any arbitrator that, being tried by those rules, our conduct was at that time in any respect wanting, we had distinctly declined to admit that those rules were laid down as rules of international obligation between ourselves and the United States at the time of the transactions, so that even if an award on those principles could be made against us, it stood on record that we had not admitted anything derogatory to our honor as to our having been at that time under any such obligations as between nation and nation. He desired to place before the house his view of the transactions which had led on the part of this country to the arrangement in question. If the present moment was not favorable to a complete appreciation of our conduct, he did not doubt that history would do justice to it, for there never was, in his opinion, a more honest, fair, true, or consistent neutrality professed or observed by any nation than that which we observed during the American civil war. [Hear, hear.] It should be remembered that nations were represented by their governments, and in a free nation there would be various feelings and interests, and great freedom in the expression of opinion. Englishmen did not impute ill-will or wrong to the United States because there might appear in the newspapers or circulate in society language which seemed to be inconsistent with a kindly feeling, because they knew well how to distinguish between the nation and the freedom of individuals composing it, and they hoped the same judgment would be applied to them. Tried by this test, the course taken by the government was, from first to last, one of strict, honorable, and loyal neutrality. The first thing they did was to issue a proclamation of neutrality for the purpose of making it understood that we meant to submit to the exercise of belligerent rights on the part of the United States against those of our citizens who might be found guilty of running a blockade or of introducing contraband of war, and, at the same time, of warning our citizens that they would be subject to those penalties. So far from that being an unfriendly act, the moment the war actually broke out it was a duty that we owed, both to the Americans and ourselves, to issue such a proclamation. To say that we were not to recognize the civil war as a fact, and to make it known that we acknowledged the rights of war when they were asserted, was difficult for us to understand. [Hear, hear.] Yet, for a long time that was made the head and front of our offending, but it had now disappeared from the category of imputations. The next step of the government was to issue rules against the use of our ports and waters as places of hostile operations. We would not allow any ships to remain for more than a limited time in our ports, nor would we allow any pursuit or attack to be initiated in our waters, or prizes to be brought in, or supplies of coal or other articles to be obtained except within the narrow limits which international hospitality prescribed. The government thus prevented our ports from being used as a basis of hostile operations. The next question was whether we should recognize the blockade of the whole sea-board of the Union, there being a great difficulty in maintaining it and numerous questions having been raised as to its validity. Other neutral powers on the Continent had been angry when we had established blockades in former years, and they were much dissatisfied with the decisions of our prize courts in enforcing them. Some of them refused to recognize the blockade of the American ports with its unavoidable infirmities, especially in the early part of the war, but England declined to adopt that course, and stated that she would, when a neutral, abide by those rules which she had laid down for others when she was a belligerent. That war lasted a considerable time, and both in this house and out of it, on the Continent of Europe as well as in this country, overtures and suggestions were made for the recognition by us of the South, which had established its own government. [Hear.] Those suggestions were steadily resisted by our government, and in every public act the government not only maintained an attitude of neutrality honorably and with integrity, but they did so in as friendly a spirit as was consistent with the nature of that neutrality toward both the branches of that great country which we were sorry to see at variance with each other, and whose reconciliation was the thing we most desired. Our law with regard to ships was founded on the precedent of the United States, and was an improvement thereupon, for one of the ablest of American writers (Mr. Beales,) who was not friendly toward us in controversy, admitted the great defects of their law in comparison with ours.

It should be remembered that during the progress of the war our government made overtures to the Government of the United States for a revision of the neutrality laws of both countries, and those overtures were received with courtesy, and even with an expression of satisfaction, but with the distinct statement on the part of the Government of the United States that they did not see how our law could be improved. Really, therefore, they did not call upon us to make an alteration of our law, because they thought their law, which was of inferior stringency, was sufficient, and when pressed by Spain, in 1818, to make their own law more stringent, they declined to do so. The law of the United States was inferior to ours in this cardinal point—that it coupled the arming of ships within the jurisdiction with the fitting out of them in such a manner that it would be hardly possible for them to stop an unarmed ship. The Alabama, for instance, would not have been an offender against the United States law according to any ordinary principles of construction, and certainly she could not have been stopped under the detaining clauses of the statute, because she went out unarmed and received her armament elsewhere. The United States, therefore, thought our law was sufficiently stringent, and they did not press us to alter it, although our government, if they had thought it insufficient, would have been anxious to change it—a thing it would not have been easy to do—and for the proposal to have been made in Parliament without being carried would not have improved the situation of affairs. Neutrality laws were evidence of what both countries admitted to be the measure and limit of their obligation, and it was not to be supposed that the United States, having made their original law in 1793 or 1794, and their present law in 1817, when the war between Spain and Portugal was going on, considered that any obligation rested upon them to go beyond that form of law. We did not conceive that anything in our foreign enlistment act rested upon international obligation; we conceived that it rested upon our own legislation, and that it was designed to enable ourselves the better to vindicate and enforce within our own jurisdiction our own neutrality; and there could be no doubt that the United States took the same view of the matter. We did not for a moment say that the United States had not a right to call upon us bona fide to put in force our own law for the preservation of our neutrality; we distinctly admitted they had that right; but we said they had it upon the footing of persons asking us to enforce our own laws, and not upon any footing prior to, paramount to, or superior to our own laws; that they must seek to have that law enforced as all other laws were enforced, according to our own system of jurisprudence, and that it must be applied in cases where evidence was forthcoming, where juries and judges would say—or where at least there was a fair probability they would say—it had been infringed. We could not suppose they would imagine it was their right to ask us to act arbitrarily, as if we were not a people governed by Parliament and by laws. In this state of things we recognized their right to call upon us bona fide to the best of our power, by every means which the law gave us, to stop proceedings of this kind, the fitting out of these ships. We undertook to do this by diplomatic negotiations which were made between our government and the United States; we at all times professed our determination to enforce our own law according to the construction put upon it by our own law officers; and the construction put upon it at that time, though undoubtedly very questionable, was that most favorable to the United States, which made the arming of ships within this jurisdiction not essential here as it seemed to be under the United States act, but which considered the fitting out of a ship for warlike purposes as sufficient to warrant interference. The rule that a vessel must be specially adapted, wholly or in part, for warlike uses within the jurisdiction was very much in controversy when it came into court in the Alexandra case, and two judges declared that the large and beneficial construction of the law on which we had always acted was right, two that it was wrong, and the judgment of the court, in point of form, was with those who thought it wrong. Nevertheless, the government being advised that the larger and more favorable view was the right view, always acted upon it. He mentioned this because the rule which was now adopted, even though it might not coincide with the view some lawyers took, did coincide with the view the government took of the measure of our own obligations. We stopped altogether five ships, and it was a total mistake to suppose that in the case of the two rans there was any assumption of power beyond the law, because the government acted on evidence which they thought to be sufficient. In the cases of the Georgia and Shenandoah, nothing was done within this jurisdiction, and no information was given to the government. The Shenandoah was not even suspected by any one in this country, and it was not until she got into Portuguese waters that she received her armament. As to the Alabama, she was officered by Americans and was armed at the Azores, but here she was equipped as a ship destined for the merchant service. On the 23d of June, 1862, Mr. Adams gave Earl Russell information, unaccompanied with evidence, and the government made inquiries and could learn nothing. Without proof of the destination of the belligerent, there was no case which could be acted upon. Mr. Adams then obtained a considerable body of evidence, which he sent to Earl Russell, who submitted it to the law officers of the Crown on the Saturday evening, so that they did not get it until Monday morning; their opinion that it was sufficient was not received until Tuesday morning, and that morning the vessel went away. Of course the law officers of the Crown would attend to urgent business on Sundays, but in this case the papers were not sent to their offices until late on Saturday evening, and, in the ordinary course, Sunday intervened before they received them; but there was as much diligence as was ordinarily exercised in legal matters for the government, as well as for private persons, and there was sufficient to show that the government acted with good faith. As to what followed, when ships were in the hands of belligerents, we did exactly what the United States would have done under similar circumstances, and we did not allow the ships to enter any of our ports.

While the arbitration was pending it would not become him to enter into detail so much as he otherwise might have done as to the concurrence of the authorities of the United States themselves in the principles upon which hitherto we had acted. It could not be wondered that, if we thought it a matter of national honor to act when we were neutrals on the principles we evinced as belligerents, we should expect the United States when they were belligerents to act on the principles they avowed as neutrals; and had they done so this controversy would not have been so long kept alive. All their authorities on jurisprudence, notably Wheaton, had held that the fitting out of armed ships in neutral territory for a belligerent was lawful, and during the French revolutionary war no one thought of holding the United States responsible for captures on the high seas, not brought into their own ports, of privateers which the French had fitted out in the most remarkable manner in the ports of the United States, most openly, and in defiance of the legal sovereignty of the United States themselves. The idea of holding them responsible for the prizes brought into the ports of the United States was never advocated; and even as to them they declined to be responsible for their restitution, when they had been brought in before a particular day in 1793, on which notice was given to the French minister that he was not to be permitted to use the ports of the United States any longer. As to all brought in before, they declined responsibility, and our government did not press it; as to all after, they undertook to restore them; and in cases in which it was admitted proper diligence had not been used, it was afterward agreed by treaty to make compensation. Between 1815 and 1818 there was a controversy between Spain and the United States with respect to ships fitted out in the ports of the United States which had committed depredations on the ships of Spain during her wars with her colonies, and uniformly the United States maintained that they were not responsible for the captures made by those ships, that their obligation was to enforce their own law upon sufficient evidence, and that failing the production of it they were not responsible. The controversy closed in 1819 with a treaty which involved the cession of Florida, and by which all claims on both sides were waived without prejudice to the attitude the United States had assumed. A similar controversy between the United States and Portugal was carried on from 1816 to 1850, and over and over again the United States refused to refer any such claims to commissioners, saying that there was no responsibility for acts done beyond their jurisdiction, even by their own citizens, and although the ships had been armed in their own ports. Surely this country could not be considered as acting otherwise than in a spirit of bona fide neutrality when it uniformly professed to adhere to that measure of obligation which the United States had laid down for themselves. He maintained that Lords Russell and Clarendon were perfectly justified, in the first instance, in declining to go into arbitration; they were only doing the very thing which had been done by the United States in the controversy with Portugal as recently as 1850. The real truth of the matter was that this country did not like to be at variance with the United States. Whatever might be the measure of our obligation, whatever the legal view of it, this country most deeply regretted that ships had escaped from our shores and committed depredations on the commerce of the United States, [hear,] and we preferred to waive a strict examination of the question on legal and international grounds in order to get a settlement of it which should bring security for the present and peace and good will for the future. Those were the feelings with which Lord Stanley negotiated the treaty with Mr. Reverdy Johnson; and when that step had been taken it became manifestly impossible to go back. While he did not wish to say a word against the treaty which Lord Stanley negotiated, which fairly expressed the sentiments and wishes of the country, he had no hesitation in saying that he greatly preferred the present proceeding. ["Order, order."]

It was now turned 10 minutes to 7 o'clock, when, by the standing orders, the debate could not proceed, and

Colonel Wilson Patten rose to suggest that, considering the importance of the subject and of the speech, and that it was so desirable to preserve the continuity of both, the debate should be resumed at 9 o'clock.

Mr. Baillie Cochrane had no objection to postpone the motion which stood first in his name if he were promised one hour on Tuesday at 2 o'clock.

Mr. Gladstone could not give the desired pledge, and

The Speaker made the order for resuming the debate the first after supply.

Mr. Gladstone moved that the house, at its rising, should adjourn to 12 o'clock on Saturday, which was agreed to, and it was stated that no supply would be taken, but that the bill relating to the judicial committee of the privy council would be considered.

The sitting was suspended at 7 o'clock.

The house re-assembled at 9 o'clock.

THE TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

On the order of the day for going into committee of supply, Mr. Eastwick, Mr. Baillie Cochrane, and Sir W. Lawson, who had notices on the paper which were entitled to precedence, yielded to an appeal of Mr. Cardwell and Mr. Gladstone, and allowed the debate, which had been interrupted at 10 minutes to 7 o'clock, to be resumed, on condition that an opportunity would be afforded next week for bringing on their respective motions.

Sir Roundell Palmer said that when the sitting was suspended he was endeavoring to express what he felt on the subject of the arrangements between Lord Stanley, then secretary for foreign affairs, and Mr. Reverdy Johnson for a general arbitration of the questions in dispute between the two countries. He confessed that Lord Russell, the illustrious man under whom he had the honor to serve, and on whom fell a great part of the responsibility for the affairs to which reference had been made, was, in his opinion, perfectly justified in declining to go to arbitration at all. That was a course exactly similar to that which had been taken by the United States when a similar question arose between the United States and Portugal. He did not, therefore, himself share in the prevalent feeling of satisfaction at the arrangement made by Lord Stanley and Mr. Reverdy Johnson. It appeared to him to be attended with such considerable risk of unsatisfactory results that, as far as he was concerned, he would have preferred that matters should remain in the position in which they stood under the previous administrations of Lord Russell and Lord Palmerston. His reasons were these: In the first place, he would never have been a willing party to any arbitration whatever of any point which seemed to him to involve the honor of this country or the good faith of the government. [Hear, hear.] There were matters fit for arbitration, but this was not one. Every country was answerable for its own honor, and no referee whatever ought to be called in to determine questions of that kind. That was equally true with regard to questions of good faith. Of course it was not the intention of Lord Stanley to refer any question of honor to arbitration. But in such a reference as that to which he and Mr. Reverdy Johnson agreed, it was manifest that if there had been an unfavorable award against this country, it would have been capable of being represented as affecting the honor and good faith of this country. [Hear.] All matters were left entirely at large; there was no question, from the proclamation downward, which had been in difference between the two countries which was not involved in that reference, and whatever award might have been made either party would have been at liberty to place its own construction upon it. Arbitration between nations was a very good thing, and certainly we, as a nation, were bound to take that view, seeing that at the time of the declaration of Paris we concurred in a proposition that it was desirable to refer to arbitration all international disputes which would admit that kind of solution. But such international references had their disadvantages as well as their advantages. It was extremely difficult to find an arbitrator or arbitrators of whose absolute, rigid, judicial impartiality there could be no reasonable degree of doubt. He did not at all decline to follow his right honorable friend opposite in some observations he had made as to the particular powers chosen as arbitrators in the present case. He was perfectly ready to admit that they were as trustworthy, honorable, and capable as any arbitrators that could be chosen in the whole civilized world. [Hear, hear.] But of all such high arbitrators this must be said, that they could not enter without a certain degree of bias upon the consideration of certain great public questions. We and the United States were the two great maritime powers of the world; we could not possibly find as arbitrators any power like ourselves. In one respect that would tend to impartiality of decision, but in other respects there would be a risk of encountering a current of opinion different from that which has prevailed between the two countries parties to the arbitration, and possibly there might be an unconscious bias of political interest arising from the point of view which the powers called in to arbitrate might naturally regard similar questions. Bearing that in mind, he would never have been a willing party to making any reference whatever to a form of international arbitration which could possibly result in an award which might be regarded by the world at large, or by the other party, as affecting the honor and the good faith of this country. That appeared to him a great objection to an arbitration simply at large, such as that agreed upon by Lord Stanley and Mr. Reverdy Johnson. There was another consideration of less importance, which, however, deserved to be mentioned. The elements of the question then proposed to be referred to arbitration were not at all limited or defined. It would have been competent for the arbitrators to have awarded against us upon any of the numerous grounds vaguely involved in the whole matters in dispute. For instance, if they thought that we ought not to have issued any neutrality proclamation, and they were not bound to give their reasons for the award. He did not fear on that point, because his impression had always been that while we were really clear on the main points we were a thousand times more clear on that. [Hear, hear.]

But the matter would have been attended with this inconvenience, that whichever way the award was given, whether for us or against us, nobody would have known the principles upon which it was founded. Suppose the award were in our favor, what might have followed? How would that party in the United States which had been irritated themselves, and had constantly fomented irritation against Great Britain, have regarded an award unfavorable to them? They might have said: "The arbitrators have determined that what was done in Great Britain was right in international law. Very well; then it is not necessary to use due diligence to prevent ships of war from being fitted out and armed to operate against the commerce of a belligerent power, for we assert that Great Britain did not use due diligence." The result, therefore, might have been to exonerate us from responsibility and pecuniary liability, but at the same time to establish it as a rule among nations that whether they had neutrality laws, such as the United States, and we had or not, governments were not under any sort of obligation towards each other to use due diligence to prevent the fitting out and armament of ships of that description. Such a view as that would not have tended to satisfactory relations between the two countries, for if in the case of a war in which Great Britain was involved, those who had participated in the irritation against us wished to connive at ships like the Alabama being fitted out against our commerce, the award would not in the least have stood in the way of such a disposition; nay, it would rather have led to its more open indulgence. It seemed to him that this country, if it were to have its own will and its own way, would never go to war at all, feeling that war was a great crime and a great wickedness. [Hear, hear.] That being so, he did not look forward to frequent wars on the part of this country. But that very feeling was likely to involve us in the disagreeable alternative either of having to go to war or of submitting to such affronts and insults that our most honorable men and wisest statesmen would consider that war was the lesser evil. Suppose that in the background, then, that great country, the United States, which ought to be our friend, was in such a frame of mind as to be inclined to ally itself with our opponents, or not to be very active in enforcing the neutrality laws against its own citizens, what would be the result? We knew what it had been in the case of Spain and Portugal, to which he had already referred. Therefore a decision favorable to us might leave us in no respect better off with regard to security than we were before. By that mode of arbitration, it should be observed that no rule as to the future would be agreed upon between the two countries. Whatever was vague and disputable in international law before would remain so still. On the other hand, if the award were against us, it would have laid down no rules whatever, and the United States would have been quite entitled, if it suited their convenience, to stand on the letter of their laws and say in our case, as they did in that of Spain and Portugal before: "We shall put the laws in force whenever we have sufficient information and proof of the facts, but we are not obliged to make a better or stronger law than we have already." This country became irrevocably committed to the principle of arbitration on this subject, both by the action of Lord Stanley and the subsequent action of Lord Clarendon, members of two successive governments representing both the great parties in this country. He expressed no opinion whether the course they adopted was wise or unwise. But when that course was adopted it was totally impossible for the government to avoid repeating the offer of arbitration which they had made on the subject before. Mr. Fish said a removal of the differences which arose during the rebellion in America was essential to the restoration of cordial and amicable relations between the two governments. It would have been mere mockery to deal with the fishery question and other things and to omit to include this when we were told we never could have a restoration of amicable relations unless this was included.

The first question was whether Her Majesty's government should have insisted on the renewal of the Reverdy Johnson treaty. Was it reasonably possible for them to do so? Could it be supposed that the United States would, without modification, agree to the very thing which they had rejected? He apprehended the house would agree with him that it was desirable that arrangements should be made to give the greatest possible amount of security for a good understanding for the future, to insure us against acts of retaliation in case we should be at war, and thereby prevent other countries from supposing that in case of war between us and them the United States would commit acts of retaliation on our commerce. If we had obtained that for the future we had got a very excellent thing, which we should not have got under the arrangement made by Lord Stanley with Mr. Reverdy Johnson. The manner in which these rules were worded had the appearance of a thing which in point of fact was impossible—namely, the creating for the future by an agreement between two nations of new rules of international law. We might make rules binding between the two nations which, in case the world adopted them, would no doubt become established rules of international law, but so long as they rested on a contract only between the two nations, they would be binding only on the two nations. He should have liked the phraseology of these rules if it had been different from what it was. But it should be remembered that to negotiate a treaty at Washington was a different thing from negotiating a treaty at London. With regard to forms of expression, the American commissioners had an advantage, because they were at home and could at once communicate with their government, whereas the British commissioners, owing to the delay which would occur in communicating by letter with Her Majesty's government, would not think it worth while to oppose the introduction of forms of expression insisted upon by the American commissioners. The first rule was that a "neutral government is bound to use due diligence to prevent the fitting out, arming, or equipping within its jurisdiction of any vessel which it has reasonable ground to believe is intended to cruise or to carry on war against a power with which it is at peace, and also to use like due diligence to prevent the departure from its jurisdiction of any vessel intended to cruise or carry on war as above, such vessel having been specially adapted, in whole or in part, within such jurisdiction, to warlike use." That appeared to him to be a very good rule. What was meant by "due diligence?" He supposed it was meant that a neutral should use all the means in its power. It had been objected that the latter part of the rule departed from the former because it did not repeat the words "has reasonable grounds to believe;" but that, he thought, was a very ill-grounded criticism. "Like due diligence" implied the words "has reasonable ground to believe" used in the former part of the rule, and there was no necessity to repeat those words. We, by our present foreign enlistment act, had ample powers to prevent the fitting out, &c., of such a vessel as was referred to in this rule, and the United States must pass a bill as stringent as that which we passed last session. He had no doubt they would. With regard to the second rule, he confessed when he first read it he was somewhat alarmed. He thought it was expressed with a degree of vagueness which might be dangerous, and which might be extended to things which he did not think it possible the commissioners could have meant. The second rule is this, that "a neutral government is bound not to permit or suffer either belligerent to make use of its ports or waters as the base of naval operations against the other, or for the purpose of the renewal or augmentation of military supplies or arms or the recruitment of men." On this point he had been fortunate enough to elicit from the right honorable gentleman at the head of the government, in reply to a question he put to him on the 13th of June last, a most satisfactory answer, to the effect that this second rule was understood by Her Majesty's government and by the British and American commissioners as applying solely to vessels cruising or carrying war against a belligerent, and not to the case of military supplies or arms exported for the use of a belligerent from neutral ports or waters in the ordinary course of commerce. The right honorable gentleman had proceeded further to state that the President of the United States himself understood the rule in that sense, and would be the first not only to admit and allow, but to contend for, that construction of it. In the face of such an assurance on the part of the great states which were parties to this treaty it would be unbecoming for him to criticise the vagueness of the language in which the rule was couched, and without doubt this construction of it would be clearly laid before those foreign powers who were to be asked to accede to it. The third rule, being a mere corollary of the other two, required no separate comment. As far as these rules applied to the future, therefore, we had gained the assurance of a good and useful understanding between the two nations, which would go far toward repaying us for any pecuniary loss which we might possibly sustain in consequence of the award being founded upon these rules, instead of upon the principles of international law which were actually in existence at the time of the escape of the Alabama. The future observance of these rules to which foreign nations were to be asked to accede would tend to promote a good understanding between all the powers, and to preserve the peace of the world. In dealing with the question of the retrospective application of these rules to the matter in dispute he apprehended that it was to be expected that the United States would not have agreed to be bound by them in the future unless we had assented to their operation being made retrospective, and, therefore, in his judgment it was worth our while to run the risk of having to undergo a pecuniary sacrifice in order to insure their adhesion to these rules. The terms of the treaty gave us this further advantage, that they distinctly set forth that for the sake of securing a good understanding between the two countries we agreed to be bound by conditions that were not in existence at the time when the cause of dispute arose. But, after all, the United States had a right to call upon us to execute in good faith our municipal law, and there was not such a very great difference between our municipal law and the language of these rules. The language of the first rule only differed from that of the 7th section of our own foreign enlistment act, which was in force at the time, by introducing the words to the effect that vessels which come within the ban were those which had been specially adapted in neutral ports in whole or in part to warlike uses. It was perfectly true that Lord Chief Baron Pollock and Baron Bramwell, as well as other great legal authorities, had thought that these words did not convey the true meaning of our foreign enlistment act, which, in their opinion, was intended to apply only to those vessels which should be armed completely and which left our waters in a condition to commence hostilities. But this had never been the opinion of the government, who, following the view taken by Barons Channell and Pigott, thought that the act would apply in cases in which vessels might not be completely armed and equipped, but merely adapted for war. Therefore, the application of this rule retrospectively was not so violent a change in our obligations as might have been supposed at first sight.

The other rule, as interpreted by the right honorable gentleman at the head of Her Majesty's government and by the minister of the United States, corresponded in like manner with the 8th section of our foreign enlistment act. It dealt with the renewal or augmentation of warlike equipments of belligerent vessels. The clause in the old foreign enlistment act applied only to ships actually in the war service of a belligerent power at the time when their equipment was augmented, whereas this rule extended also to ships intended to be used for the purpose of war service. Indeed, he maintained that these rules corresponded with each other, and did not go beyond the obligation we imposed on ourselves by our municipal law. Looking at all the circumstances, he was well content to acquiesce in and accept the recent arrangement with all its imperfections. [Hear.] He did not propose to go into all those matters which his right honorable friend opposite had touched upon with much more authority in regard to the colonial aspect of the question, but he might remark that he agreed with his right honorable friend that it was a blemish that the demands of Canada against the United States for the damage done by Fenian raiders should not have been included in the treaty. [Hear.] He was the more anxious to say this because the demands of the United States against Canada in reference to the landing of certain confederates at St. Albans were not only complied with, but anticipated by the spontaneous action of the Canadian legislature, which at once voted the money necessary to make good the losses. The United States might, he thought, feel on calm consideration that the principle of the reference we agreed to make applied at least as forcibly to the Fenian raids. Nevertheless, if from the arrangement which had been entered into permanent peace and good will were brought about between two great countries, he was willing to pay a greater price for such a result than we should have to pay under this treaty. [Hear, hear.]

Sir S. Northcote felt it was impossible for him to add anything to the arguments advanced by his honorable and learned friend the member for Richmond in favor of the general principle and provisions of the treaty, and with regard to other questions raised by his right honorable friend, (Sir C. Adderly,) it might appear more proper that he should leave it to Her Majesty's government to answer questions and dispose of objections which came rather within their cognizance than within the cognizance of an individual member of the late high commission. Still, there were two considerations which induced him to trespass for a short time on the attention of the house. First of all, he desired to express a hope that his right honorable friend would not press the motion, because he could say, from his own experience in the conduct of the negotiations, that although there existed a not inconsiderable amount of correspondence between Her Majesty's government and the commissioners, it would not in his opinion be advantageous to any one that that correspondence should be given to the world. It was thought desirable on all accounts that the negotiations should be conducted with that freedom which was only possible among those who knew that their communications with one another would be private. The questions the commissioners had to deal with were of the most delicate character. They affected the good relations between two great powers, and had given rise to much misunderstanding in times past. In order to settle them permanently, and bring about the establishment for a long time to come of thoroughly amicable relations between the two countries, it was desirable that the commissioners should communicate among themselves in the freest and most unreserved manner, and that they should embody their conclusions in the form of documents which really represented the substance of all that passed, but which abstained from raising questions of an irritating character. In order to maintain a thorough good feeling between the two countries it was better, he felt convinced, that the matter should remain as at present, and that the public of England and America should see the result at which the commissioners had arrived without going into all the questions raised and discussed in the course of the negotiations.

It had been remarked in discussions out of doors and in another place that, according to the correspondence and protocols laid on the table, the British commissioners appeared to have done nothing but assent to whatever was proposed by the American commissioners. This, however, was not at all the case. Long and animated discussions occurred on every point that was raised. Indeed, it often happened that days elapsed before an understanding was arrived at, and it would surely be most unwise and unnecessary to renew the battles which had been fought in the State Department at Washington. [Hear, hear.] All that was necessary to be known was the general course of the negotiations and the arguments which were finally adopted. The government, he believed, were prepared to give explanations on any point which might be raised, but he thought it undesirable to lay upon the table of the house correspondence of a confidential character. He seized this opportunity of saying, on his own part and on the part of the other commissioners who were not officially connected with the government, that there was substantially no difference of opinion between them on any of the important points of the negotiations, and, therefore, it was not to prevent its being known, that they were overruled in any manner by Her Majesty's government, that he thought the production of the correspondence inexpedient. Undoubtedly the position of a commissioner like himself who was not officially connected with Her Majesty's government was one of some delicacy. Having undertaken the office, it would have been exceedingly difficult and improper for him to set up private and individual opinions, except in matters of extreme importance and urgency, in the way of thwarting the arrangement that had to be made; and therefore it might be assumed that, the responsibility lying on the government, the commissioners were not all in accord as to the arrangement that was effected. Speaking, however, for himself, although he did not mean to say there might not have been points on which there was a slight difference of opinion, he must state that he never found himself in a position of that kind. He cordially accepted and heartily rejoiced in the arrangement in which he had taken a part. [Hear, hear.] If he ventured to refer to the saying that this was a treaty of which every one was glad but no one proud, he only did so for the purpose of saying that he was, at all events, the exception which proved the rule. He would go further, and say that he hardly understood the frame of mind of the persons who made use of that expression, for if it meant that the treaty was one we ought to be ashamed of no person ought to be glad that it was concluded. If the treaty contained anything derogatory to our national honor we ought not to be glad but extremely sorry that it had been entered into. He believed, however, that in its main outlines the treaty was one which the national honor, in the true sense of the term, not only justified but demanded. [Hear.] It must not be supposed that he arrogated to the commission any of the credit which more properly belonged to Her Majesty's government, who were responsible for the arrangements. [Hear.] His right honorable friend had complained that a limit of time had been introduced with regard to the claims of British subjects, whereas there was no limit of time with regard to the Alabama claims. Now, it was perfectly true that the claims of British subjects were limited to certain dates, which were intended to correspond with the period of the American civil war; but with regard to the claims arising out of the acts of the Alabama and other vessels of the same class, there was no necessity whatever for introducing any limit of time, because by mentioning particular vessels the class of claims was sufficiently defined. [Hear, hear.] If the treaty had spoken of the claims of British subjects generally, many claims of a miscellaneous character might have been sent in which there was no object in including in the arbitration. The claims arising out of the acts of the Alabama and other vessels were most clearly defined in the treaty. The honorable member for Richmond had remarked that the previous conventions left many points vague and introduced a number of claims which we could never have admitted. They were left so vague, indeed, that it would have been possible under those claims to have raised a number of questions which this country was not willing to submit to arbitration. They might have raised questions with regard to what they called England's premature recognition of belligerency, and the consequential damages arising from the prolongation of the war, and with regard also to other questions which this country could not have admitted. Instead of this being the case, however, the treaty, as actually concluded, narrowed the questions at issue very closely by confining the reference solely to losses growing out of the acts of particular vessels, and so shutting out a large class of claims upon which the Americans had heretofore insisted. He contended, therefore, that the high joint commission had upon this point worked substantial advantage rather than injury to this country. His right honorable friend had made it a ground of complaint that the commission gave precedence to the Alabama claims over the question of the Canadian fisheries; but this complaint was based upon a misconception of the facts of the case. It was true that the commission grew out of a proposal to refer the question of the fisheries to a commission, but as a fact all the questions then at issue between the two countries were included in the reference, and a reference to the protocols would show that the fisheries question was first dealt with, and the general principle on which it was settled was decided upon. [Hear, hear.] The question of the manner and time in and at which the negotiations were commenced was one on which it was more proper that the government should speak than himself, but he might say he was perfectly satisfied, from what he heard while in America, that Her Majesty's government did wisely in taking the opportunity that offered of commencing the negotiations which had resulted in the treaty now under discussion. Her Majesty's government could not have honorably withdrawn from the original offer to refer to a commission the question of how the matters in dispute could best be settled. The Americans naturally felt that to accept the limits of the reference originally proposed by England would have left unsettled several questions which they desired to have set at rest, for the sake not of their own country merely, but in the interests of peace all over the world. [Hear, hear.] This view was, in his opinion, sound at bottom, though it had been stated, from time to time, in language calculated to irritate and offend certain classes of people in this country. It would not have been satisfactory to patch up this particular quarrel on a basis unlikely to afford a permanent settlement, and he therefore regarded the treaty which had resulted from lengthened negotiations as one with which all parties concerned ought to feel satisfied. The treaty not only opened the door for the settlement of a difficult and disagreeable question, but laid the foundation of important principles of international law which would hereafter prove of benefit not to England only but to the whole world. [Hear, hear.] Without doubt the consciousness that if England became engaged in a war her commerce would or would not be seriously injured by predatory incursions on the part of other states, and especially of America, would weaken her position in the eyes of the world and render her less able to speak with authority in the councils of nations. [Mr. C. Bentinck.—"No, no."]

If his honorable friend said that it was of no importance for England, when speaking in the councils of Europe to be able to point to America as being on friendly terms, there could be no argument between them. [Hear, hear.] It might be that England would be perfectly able to defend her commerce, but her position would be much more strong if she was on friendly terms with the United States, and no other nation could expect or hope to construct and arm in America vessels of the Alabama class to be used against English commerce on the high seas. [Hear, hear.] Another and very strong reason why there ought to be perfect friendliness between England and America was that this country desires to develop her great colonial empire. [Hear, hear.] No part of the British Empire was more strongly interested in the maintenance of friendly relations between England and America than was the Dominion of Canada, which would derive more advantages from the conclusion of the treaty than any other part of the Queen's dominions. At the present moment Canada was organizing and spreading herself over an enormous and sparsely-populated area, a process which required, above everything else, confidence, peace, and time. Canada lay on the frontiers of a country which, however well-disposed toward England, had a restless and energetic people, but he did not think any American statesman believed otherwise than that it was the interest of his country for Canada to flourish, and that an attempt at annexation would result in no good to America. If jealousy and bad feeling arose between England and the United States, Canada would be the first portion of this empire to feel it. England might, perhaps, in such a case, be able to defy the power of America to injure her dominions at home, but the trade, commerce, navigation, and credit of Canada would suffer at once, and therefore it was in the interest of peace between the two nations that the uncomfortable feeling which had unhappily existed should be terminated. Now, he would ask, how were the interests of Canada affected by the concessions made with respect to the fisheries? The fact that the British Empire was made capable of admitting the United States fishermen to these fisheries in itself proved that Canada was rightly in possession of them. And in return for these concessions Canada gained what she greatly wanted, a market for her fish. [Hear, hear.] When, therefore, it was said that Canada complained of the provisions relating to this matter, he believed that these complaints did not come from the fishing provinces, [hear:] and to show that this question was regarded very differently in America, he might mention the circumstance that a petition presented by the fishermen of Gloucester, in Massachusetts, complained that those portions of the treaty were all favorable to the Canadian fishermen, and unfavorable to the fishermen of the United States. General

Btler, too, who certainly did not usually mince matters, had denounced this bargain as one that was bad for the United States. Therefore, what had happened was simply what happened in most bargains, both sides wanted more than they could get, and consequently declared that they had the worst of it. [Cheers.] But it was said, "What you have really failed to do is this, you have given away our fisheries, and have failed to get for us what we value far more than money, the reciprocity treaty?" But free trade was a point in which both Canada and America were far behind ourselves. They found that the renewal of the reciprocity treaty as it stood was a point which would not be conceded. Were they then, because they could not obtain this renewal, to sacrifice an arrangement which was clearly to the interest of all concerned? One thing, too, was certain, that they were more likely to obtain for Canada a reduction of duties levied upon articles admitted into the United States markets by allowing things to work for themselves than by insisting upon the renewal of the reciprocity treaty, because the Americans would naturally have argued, "If England and Canada are so exceedingly anxious to get this treaty, and if they are ready to make us concessions of a kind which we admit to be valuable for the sake of getting it, there must be something very good to them in this bargain, and if good to them it must be bad for us." He believed, however, that in course of time, and as these great states developed and obtained more power in the councils of the nation, they would carry the doctrine of free trade for their own benefit, and the benefits which would result from free trade would a few years hence be obtained for Canada without her being called upon to give any compensation at all in return. [Hear, hear.]

He felt perfectly convinced that they were acting directly in the interests of Canada herself in not pressing this question prematurely, and in directing the attention of Canada to that which was really of primary importance to her—namely, the consolidation of her dominion, the maintenance of peace with her neighbor, and the completion of her great lines of communication by river, by canal, and by railway. [Hear, hear.] His honorable and learned friend had commented upon a certain amount of ambiguity appeared to exist in the wording of the second rule, and in these arrangements there was, no doubt, some confusion occasionally, owing to the difficulty of telegraphic communication. But the question whether this rule was open to the interpretation put upon it by his honorable and learned friend was raised in America before the treaty was confirmed by the Senate. The matter was fully discussed and considered, and it was concluded that the intention of the rule was clearly to limit it to the case of naval operations. But, although the intention was clear in the arrangement effected between this country and the United States, if they were to invite other nations to accede to those rules, it would, of course, be of importance that no room for doubt should be left as to the meaning of the rule, and he believed he was correct in saying that negotiations had already been opened by Her Majesty's government with the United States which would effectually secure this object. He was perfectly convinced that the spirit in which this treaty had been offered and negotiated by England, and had been accepted and negotiated by America, was one of the utmost friendliness and cordiality, and that throughout America there was but one feeling on the general question involved in this treaty, and that was a feeling of satisfaction that a cause of difference which might, under other circumstances, have developed into something unpleasant, and even threatening, had been put an end to. [Cheers.] They heard, from time to time, incautious language used here with regard to that great nation, and, undoubtedly, in America extraordinary language was occasionally employed in the public journals and elsewhere with regard to England, but he altogether denied the statement that no cry was so popular in America as a cry against England. [Hear, hear.] What the Americans desired was that we should treat them not as they had been somewhat sarcastically termed as spoilt children, but on the same footing as other great nations, like France and Germany, [cheers,] and the peculiar susceptibility which the Americans displayed at anything which they regarded as contumelious or disparaging in the attitude of England towards that country as contradistinguished from the feeling with which they regarded a similar attitude on the part of other nations, was in itself a proof that they regarded us with exceptional affection and not with exceptional hostility. [Cheers.] There never was a time when it was more important for the maintenance of the great position of England in the councils of Europe and of the world, and for the development of the great colonial empire of England, to the importance of the consolidation of which some were, perhaps, not sufficiently alive, that we should maintain a thoroughly good understanding between all the branches of the Anglo-Saxon race. There never was a moment when we had a greater opportunity, and at which a greater responsibility rested upon us than this moment, and he firmly believed that the treaty of Washington, although it might be open to captious observations, and might possibly contain some real defects, was, as a whole, a great step in the promotion and toward the attainment of this desirable end. [Cheers.]

Mr. Gladstone, mentioning the period of the session as an apology for following the right honorable gentleman opposite, said he was desirous of making, without further delay, such observations as the occasion seemed to call for on his part, and he was glad they would be of an agreeable character. His right honorable friend the member for Staffordshire had been the critic of the Washington treaty, and, subject to some exceptions, even his judgment upon it had not been very unfavorable; and he gave a very emphatic and weighty opinion that Canada in particular had reason to congratulate herself on the result of the negotiations. After the powerful and masterly argument of the honorable and learned member for Richmond, it was unnecessary for him to enter into the question at large, and, carefully avoiding such an attempt, he wished to say, with respect to the period of the American war, how extremely just the remarks of his honorable and learned friend had been. We lived in times when the duties of neutrals were gradually becoming more and more delicate and difficult; of all neutral countries our position was most delicate and difficult, from the extent and complications of our foreign relations, which formed so large a proportion of our national activity; and we knew from anxious and painful experience in the past, as we must anticipate for the future, that whatever uprightness of intention we might have, and however assiduously we might guard ourselves, it would not be possible for us to escape being suspected when causes of conflict occurred. In the case of the war between France and Germany, nobody could suppose that there was any bias on our part toward one side or the other, and yet we failed to give that satisfaction which we honestly endeavored and desired to give. He did not wish to imply that in the case either of those countries or that of America he complained of complaints which were the natural results of excitement on the part of men engaged in desperate conflict, and of the delicate nature of the questions with which neutrals had to deal, and he believed that uprightness of intention and due and reasonable care would secure avoidance of quarrel and ultimately in time of peace a general acknowledgment of our impartiality. There were many circumstances which would account for the sensitiveness of the United States, and on the part of the British government there were many plain, palpable, and undeniable facts which would convince any impartial man not only of our desire to maintain neutrality, but of our desire to make extraordinary efforts with that object. Some of these circumstances had been referred to by the honorable and learned member for Richmond, and others, from their nature, it would be hardly generous or fair to refer to. There were, however, one or two which had never been fully noticed in this country, and which it was only fair to Lord Russell and to the government of that day, and to Great Britain as a nation, to bear in mind. One had relation to a matter happily settled in the negotiations in which the right honorable gentleman opposite had borne so distinguished a part. It would be remembered that in 1860 we offered to settle the San Juan difficulty by arbitration, but no answer was ever returned to our proposal. During the civil war in America, had there been any ungenerous disposition on our part, we had a favorable opportunity, and he had almost said a fair one, for it would have been a natural exercise of an undoubted right of pressing for an answer to our proposal, and how difficult would have been the position of the American Government if it had been disposed to refuse. Although there was no other mode in which the question could be settled, our proposal was allowed to stand over from the autumn of 1860, and until after the conclusion of the civil war. Was it possible to conceive a more emphatic instance of a fair and liberal disposition on the part of the government of this country? Another instance which it was worth mentioning was connected with the flotilla which was built in this country for the government of China. That flotilla was intended to be manned by British officers and crews, and it was so manned; it was found difficult to arrange the relations between the British naval force and the official persons of the government of China; the government of China determined, as they were perfectly entitled to do, to break up that flotilla; and although we had no responsibility for that flotilla, and the vessels were of little value to the British navy, for fear the slightest whisper should go forth, or the slightest suspicion should arise that the vessels, when cast upon the market of the world, had been so cast upon it with a view to their purchase by the confederates, to be used against the United States, the government of this country at once determined to be the purchasers of those vessels. He affirmed that the history of nations offered no more remarkable instance of a disposition to give the largest interpretation to the obligations of neutrality; and if the fortunes of that war had been different, if the confederates had established their independence, and if they had called us to account, although our answer might have been good, we should not have confronted them with the same conscientiousness that we could now confront the Government of the United States. When the present government came into office, they committed our foreign relations to the charge of Lord Clarendon, a statesman of great ability, long experience, singular cordiality, and charming manners. Our relations with the United States was the first question to which he addressed himself; and, notwithstanding his contrast of the arbitration then proposed with that now agreed upon which had been made by the honorable and learned member for Richmond, the house would feel that Lord Clarendon judged wisely in taking up the labors of Lord Derby. The wish of Lord Clarendon and of his government was frustrated by the refusal of the American Senate—a refusal which we all much lamented at the time, and on which comments might be made; but, however disposed we might be to be critical with respect to the refusal of the Senate and the nature of the representations laid before it, we might dismiss them from our minds in face of the treaty we had to consider. Although it was important in the interests of Canada that there should be a settlement of the fisheries question, it was still more important to the interests of the United States; but, without determining that it might be said of nations as of individuals that, when two had a difference, whichever had the greatest interest in settling it, that nation deserved praise which was most ready to promote a settlement. With respect to the Alabama claims, after what had happened, it was impossible for us to undertake the initiative; but having, as we had, these other matters open and requiring settlement, it was a great advantage that by pressing negotiation upon the fishery and the colonial questions we were able to relieve the American Government from what he believed they might themselves feel to be a false position. It was difficult for the Americans, while it was impossible for us, to propose negotiations upon the Alabama claims; but the proposal which it was open to us to make with respect to colonial questions at once removed the difficulty from the path of the American Government, and enabled them to take upon themselves a responsibility they would otherwise probably have been unwilling to assume, and to put all these controversies in the way toward a peaceful and satisfactory solution. His right honorable friend complained of the Alabama question having been thus treated in a certain sense as a secondary and collateral phase of a government question; and why not? It was the main question, and it formed a sine qua non in the minds of the Americans to the settlement of any of the other questions, and the desire of the Americans to settle the Alabama claims became an effective instrument in the hands of the British negotiators for obtaining on behalf of our colonies better terms than it would have been possible otherwise to obtain. Another point raised by his right honorable friend was one on which he admitted that he was not able to make so satisfactory an answer, he meant the Fenian claims. [Hear, hear.]

It would have been just and fair if those claims had been included in that great settlement, but it was not to be supposed that, because they were not so included, they had therefore ceased to exist. The Fenian claims remained in all their validity, and it was the duty of Her Majesty's government to see that the just interests of Canada growing out of those transactions in her relations with the United States were not disparaged. The reason why those claims were not included in the present settlement was simply because they were unable to include them, and because they did not think it right to abandon the whole of those extensive arrangements because they could not bring within their scope that single and comparatively limited point. There was one matter in respect to which his right honorable friend gave to his criticisms for once almost a declamatory tone. His right honorable friend said the reference now to be made to an arbitrator amounted to this—whether in 1861 England had fulfilled rules which only came into existence in 1871; and he added that, though magnanimity might be a good thing, yet they were changing the standard of right and passing almost from the sublime to the ridiculous. The answer to that was supplied by the speech of his honorable and learned friend, (Sir Roundell Palmer,) who had pointed out, with the utmost clearness and force, that there were two kinds of duties devolving on neutrals, viz, those arising from international and those arising from municipal law. He accepted what had fallen from his honorable and learned friend without deduction any more than without addition when he showed that the principles embodied in the first of the rules in the treaty of Washington were the very principles for which the executive of this country contended in our courts, and therefore it was not too much for the American Government to expect that the British should be prepared to act upon them in ultimately settling the controversy with regard to the Alabama question. No doubt a great concession had been made to America, but that concession had lain in this, that we had consented to go to arbitration as to our conduct in the administration of our own municipal law. That, undoubtedly, might be called stretching, somewhat, at least, the measure of strict necessity in respect to the fulfillment of international duties; but was there anything unreasonable in that principle? It was conducive to peace. He did not see that it involved disparagement to honor. As far as regarded the specifications contained in those rules, his honorable and learned friend had shown that they had added nothing to the claim which the American Government was already able to establish against them out of their own mouths, while they had obtained the basis of that most important understanding and covenant between the two countries for the regulation of the future which he trusted would ultimately harden and widen into an extension of international law for the benefit of the world. There had been in some minds a supposition that that arbitration was a phantasm conjured up by them to cover, with decent forms, a foregone conclusion. On the part of Her Majesty's government he begged most emphatically to disclaim any such idea or intention that arbitration would be a real, an honest, an energetic, though, no doubt, a friendly contention. All the resources, as he trusted, of argument, of knowledge, and of legal skill would be used for the purpose of establishing the upright conduct of England, and her fulfillment of her international duty; and the same, he doubted not and he hoped, would be done on the part of America. The two countries would enter into it as a perfectly real, though amicable, contest, subject only to this condition—that, as they were bound by honor, they would, either of them, cheerfully accept the result, whatever it might be. He observed with the utmost satisfaction the spirit of dispassionate calm with which the whole matter had been considered in this country; there had been, on the one hand, a free development of those friendly and fraternal feelings which he trusted the English race in England would always entertain toward the English race in America. With extended and improved communications, we were by degrees attaining a condition which the old vulgar error about the feelings of America toward us might be dispelled. His right honorable friend (Sir S. Northcote) had given them an ample and, as he believed, a most just description of the sentiments entertained on the other side of the water; and coming as it did from his right honorable friend, he trusted it would have a great effect in assisting the beneficial process going forward in this country, which was rapidly becoming undeceived with regard to the existence of prejudice and antipathies, which on many occasions had, perhaps, been by us too lightly assumed to prevail among the great body of the American people through our having before our eyes peculiar phenomena in regard to certain portions of that people—phenomena painful to ourselves, but not less painful, he believed, to the bulk of intelligent Americans than to us, those intelligent Americans having some reason to feel, too, that the true root of the hostile feelings cherished in America, but not by America, toward England did not lie on their side of the water, but originated in the unhappy condition of a portion of the United Kingdom itself. Therefore the more that beneficial settlement was examined the more he believed the people of this country would arrive at the conclusion that without the slightest disparagement of honor, without any risk other than that which every man who engaged in a controversy ought to be disposed to face—viz, the risk of having it decided against him, if so it should be—that treaty had laid the foundation of future advantage in the administration and action of international law, and had likewise, by removing the last of all serious causes of dispute between those two great countries, done much toward the accomplishment of the great work of uniting them in the ties of affection where they were already bound by the ties of interest, of kindred, of race, and of language, thereby promoting that strong and lasting union between them which was in itself one of the main guarantees for the peace of the civilized world. [Cheers.]

Mr. Baillie Cochrane said that after the eloquent peroration which had just been addressed to the house, any one who rose to differ from the right honorable gentleman must incur the odium of not sufficiently estimating the value of the blessings of peace. But, although no one set a higher value upon them than he, he also valued the honor of the country, and thought that even such a treaty as this might be purchased too dearly. From the papers which had been furnished to the house he thought he could make out a strong case against the government, under whose instructions the commissioners had acted, and after reading those papers he was astonished either that commissioners should have been found to sign such a treaty, or that the House of Commons should approve it. Only three short papers had been presented to the house, and he regretted that the whole of the correspondence was not published, for it might have thrown some light on the extraordinary proceedings at Washington. He desired to know in what position this country stood with respect to the American Government, what we had gained and what we had sacrificed, and whether this country stood higher in the opinion of Europe in consequence of the negotiation of this treaty. It should be remembered that the demand for this high commission emanated from England, for in the first place Sir E. Thornton communicated with Mr. Fish, proposing simply to bring before a commission the question of the fisheries. To that Mr. Fish replied that the President desired the re-adjustment of other claims, without which the proposed high commission would fail to re-establish a lasting friendship between the two governments. The answer of the government was that all other claims, both of British subjects and citizens of the United States, arising out of acts committed during the civil war, should be referred to the commission. The right honorable gentleman said that the Alabama claims were more important than the fisheries; but how did he reconcile that with the fact that the fishery claims were the only ones brought before the American Government in the first instance? With reference to the protocols of the conference, the right honorable gentleman had said that the first question submitted to the conference was that of the fishery claims, but there was not a single word about that in the protocols. The first claim made by the Americans was for $14,000,000 for the injury done to their commerce by the Alabama and other cruisers. Then the American commissioners desired that the British commissioners should place on record an expression of regret by Her Majesty's government for the depredations which had been committed by those vessels, and it was next stated:

“Although Great Britain had from the beginning disavowed any responsibility for the acts of the Alabama and the other vessels, she had already shown her willingness, for the sake of the maintenance of friendly relations with the United States, to adopt the principle of arbitration, providing that a fitting arbitrator could be found.”

The right honorable gentleman had said there was no reference to arbitration, but here was the offer. It was added :

"The American commissioners expressed their regret at the decision of the British commissioners, and said further that they could not consent to submit the question of the liability of Her Majesty's government to arbitration unless the principles which should govern the arbitrator in the consideration of the facts could be first agreed upon. The British commissioners replied that they had no authority to agree to a submission of these claims to an arbitrator with instructions as to the principles which should govern him in the consideration of them. They said that they should be willing to consider what principles should be adopted for observance in future."

That showed that the principles laid down were not to be retrospective. Then—

"The American commissioners replied that they were willing to consider what principles should be laid down for observance in similar cases in future, with the understanding that any principles that should be agreed upon should be held to be applicable to the facts in respect to the Alabama claims."

This was on the 8th of March, and the commissioners telegraphed for instructions, but it did not appear that anything more was done until the 3d of April. On that date—

"The British commissioners stated that they were instructed by Her Majesty's government to declare that Her Majesty's government could not assent to the proposed rules as a statement of principles of international law which were in force at the time when the Alabama claims arose, but that Her Majesty's government, in order to evince its desire of strengthening the friendly relations between the two countries, and of making satisfactory provision for the future, agreed that, in deciding the questions between the two countries arising out of those claims, the arbitrator should assume that Her Majesty's government had undertaken to act upon the principles set forth in the rules which the American commissioners had proposed."

On the 5th of April the American commissioners, referring to the hope which they had expressed on the 8th of March, inquired whether the British commissioners were prepared to place upon record an expression of regret by Her Majesty's government for the depredations committed by the vessels whose acts were now under discussion; and the British commissioners replied that they were authorized to express, in a friendly spirit, the regret felt by Her Majesty's government for the escape, under whatever circumstances, of the Alabama and other vessels from British ports, and for the depredations committed by those vessels. He considered that proceeding exceedingly humiliating to this country. Then the claims of British subjects arising out of the civil war were brought forward. The nature of those claims was perfectly clear; but, with something like an ironical insult to the British commissioners, the American commissioners said that they supposed they were right in their opinion that British laws prohibit British subjects from owning slaves; they therefore inquired whether any claim for slaves, or for alleged property or interest in slaves, can or will be presented by the British government, or in behalf of any British subject, under the treaty now being negotiated, if there be in the treaty no express words excluding such claims. Was it possible that they could suppose that the English proprietors in Canada were slave-owners? The British commissioners replied that by the law of England British subjects had long been prohibited from purchasing or dealing in slaves, not only within the dominions of the British crown, but in any foreign country, and that they had no hesitation in saying that no claim on behalf of any British subject for slaves or for any property or interest in slaves would be presented by the British government. It was plain that the American commissioners were only laughing at the British commissioners. At the conference of the 26th of April the British commissioners again brought before the joint high commission "the claims of the people of Canada for injuries suffered from the Fenian raids. They said that they were instructed to present these claims, and to state that they were regarded by Her Majesty's government as coming within the class of subjects indicated by Sir Edward Thornton in his letter of January 26, as subjects for the consideration of the joint high commission." The American commissioners replied that they could see no reason to vary the reply formerly given to this proposal, and the British high commissioners said that, under these circumstances, they would not urge further that the settlement of these claims should be included in the present treaty, and that they had the less difficulty in doing so as a portion of the claims were of a constructive and inferential character. But now the right honorable gentleman said that it was intended to bring forward these claims at a future period, though the British commissioners gave them up. He did not believe that anybody reading the papers could say that anything had been obtained from the American commissioners, and it appeared that everything was sacrificed on the part of the English. When all this was done it was represented that peaceful relations had been established with America, but peace might always be obtained with any country by accepting humiliating terms. In the case of the reciprocity treaty the British commissioners asked most humbly that it might be restored in principle, but the American commissioners declined altogether to negotiate on the basis of that treaty. He contended that in these negotiations England had been subject to insult, an humble apology had been made to America, and Canada had been deeply injured. The right honorable gentleman said that Canada approved the Washington treaty, but he could see nothing in the papers to that effect, though it might be that, in consequence of the formation of the Dominion, the interests of the smaller states were sacrificed to those of the greater. He could not help feeling that the proceedings of the commission had only resulted in degradation to this country.

Mr. Anderson did not intend to enter upon the general merits of the treaty, or he could show that the first ground of complaint, that this country was too ready to acknowledge the Confederate States as belligerents, was a most unjust accusation, for the American Government themselves acknowledged the confederates as belligerents by the very act of blockading the southern ports. He wished to know why the 9th of April had been fixed upon as the date on which all British claims were to cease and determine. For his own part he must charge the commissioners with having failed to look sufficiently after the claims of British subjects. At the period which they assented to as being the end of the civil war no less than three confederate armies were in the field, and there was in the interval a great destruction of property, some of which, no doubt, belonged to the people of this country. There was, in his opinion, very little reason to suppose that the commissioners had not been imposed upon in the matter, and, indeed, in all cases of diplomatic negotiations with the United States we seemed to get the worst of the bargain.

Mr. Rathbone contended that it was of the greatest importance to this country, since the treaty of Paris, that the precedent of the Alabama should be canceled. It was besides, in his opinion, a proof of very bad citizenship that a man should, by fitting out such a vessel, imperil the peace of the country to which he belonged. The government, in his opinion, had earned the gratitude of the country by appointing the commission, and especially for having nominated as one of its members the right honorable baronet the member for North Devon.

Mr. Whalley commented on the fact that while the prime minister stated that the claims on account of the Fenian raids were still open, and that it was competent for the Canadian government or our own to press them, it appeared from the paper which the honorable member for the Isle of Wight had read that those claims had been given up by the commissioners. The Canadians fully understood that the Fenian raids were merely part of a system acted on by a power which had exercised and still continued to exercise great influence over states. That influence was at the root of the Alabama question. The whole object of the organization to which he referred was to foment and create war. The deliberate action of the Roman Catholic hierarchy was directed to produce dissension between America and this country, and one advantage from enforcing the claims on account of the Fenian raids would be that it would enable the Americans to emancipate themselves from the influence to which he had referred.

The motion for the production of the correspondence was then withdrawn.

THE TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

To the Editor of the Times—SIR: Permit me to request the insertion of the following rectification of certain points in your generally excellent report of my remarks in the debate on the Washington treaty, on which I should wish what I said to be quite accurately understood.

1. When Lord Palmerston's government, in 1863, made overtures to the Government of the United States for a revision of the neutrality laws of both countries, Mr. Adams stated (as the conversation was recorded at the time by Lord Russell) that the Government of the United States "did not see how their own law" (not, as it stands in the report, "our law") "on that subject could be improved." Mr. Adams himself reported his own words as being that his Government thought their own law "of very sufficient vigor."

2. I did not say that the Alabama was "equipped as a ship destined for the merchant service," but that she was built here to order, as an article of merchandise, and was not so equipped as to be capable of hostilities when she sailed from this country. I added the dates of the communications, upon that subject, between Mr. Adams and Lord Russell. A month elapsed between Mr. Adams's first communication on the 23d of June, 1862, and the transmission by him to the Foreign Office of any evidence in support of it, which was not done till the 22d of July, the board of customs being in the meantime unable to obtain any information on the cardinal point of the destination of the ship. Only one of the depositions sent by Mr. Adams on the 22d of July contained really material evidence on this point. Two more depositions were sent (with Mr. Collier's opinion of the 23d of July) in another letter from Mr. Adams, dated the 24th of July, which was not received at the Foreign Office till Saturday, the 26th. On Monday, the 28th, these papers were considered by the law officers of the Crown; on the same evening their report was made, and it was in Lord Russell's hands early on the 29th. Orders were then immediately sent to Liverpool to stop the vessel, but on the same day he escaped.

3. I did not say, with respect to the Alabama and other vessels, after they had passed into the hands of the belligerents, that "we did not allow these ships to enter any of our ports," which would have been contrary to well-known facts, nor did I speak of what the United States "would have done" under similar circumstances. The sentence on that subject should stand thus :

"As to what followed, when ships were in the hands of belligerents, we did exactly what the United States had done under similar circumstances. When any ship had once been commissioned as a public ship of war by a belligerent power over whom we had no jurisdiction, no proceedings or inquiry having previously been held within our jurisdiction as to that ship, we did not consider ourselves bound or entitled to refuse to allow her, like other ships bearing a similar commission, to enter any of our ports."

4. I did not refer to Wheaton, or other American authorities, as saying generally that "the fitting out of armed ships in neutral territory for a belligerent was lawful." I referred to the American jurists anterior to the civil war as generally laying down the doctrine that commercial dealings in ships of war, as in other contraband, were not prohibited by international as distinguished from municipal law; and I referred particularly to a passage in Wheaton's History of International Law, in which he treats it as a clear proposition that the sale and delivery of armed vessels by neutral citizens within neutral territory, to a belligerent power, is lawful jure gentium.

5. In speaking of the transactions of 1793-'94, I said that "the idea of holding the United States responsible for the prizes 'not' brought into their ports was never advocated; and, even as to those which were so brought in, they declined," &c.

I remain, sir, your obedient servant,

ROUNDELL PALMER.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
London, August 9, 1871. (Received August 21.)

SIR: I send you herewith, as of public interest and for further reference, the leading article on the debate on the treaty of Washington which took place, on the 4th instant, in the House of Commons, to wit, that of the Times of the 5th instant and those of the Standard, Morning Post, and Telegraph of the 7th instant.

I have, &c.,

ROBT. C. SCHENCK.

[From the London Times, Saturday, August 5, 1871.]

When the first debate was held in the House of Lords on the treaty of Washington we felt bound to agree with Lord Russell and Lord Salisbury, in opposition to Lord Granville and Lord Cairns, that it is desirable Parliament should have the opportunity of pronouncing an opinion on treaties while that opinion can still affect the result. We thought it would be a practice inconsistent with the spirit of the constitution that the ratification of a treaty should be delayed until Parliament had had a reasonable time to consider it, and refused if both houses of Parliament should condemn it. Some of the most important engagements ever entered into by the British government received no sanction from the country or its representatives, and have, in consequence, been periodically attacked with the argument, not only plausible, but just, that they were imposed on the nation by the indiscretion of a ministry. Every one admits that Parliament has a right to interfere in matters which so deeply concern the country, and every one must acknowledge that this interference ought to be something more than a futile railing against the government after the mischief is done. The Queen's plenipotentiaries receive their full powers to negotiate in her name, and to sign as if her own hand were set to the draught of the treaty; but this act of the executive government does not morally bind the nation, which may know nothing of it, though, in fact, it may entail upon us liabilities involving, perhaps, great political danger or immense sums of money, and lasting for generations. In the case of the treaty of Washington accident gave the appropriate opportunity. The treaty was prematurely published, and was not ratified for more than a month afterward, so that the House of Lords were able to discuss the subject, and the Commons had ample opportunity of discussing it. Considering the novelty and importance of the principles established and the procedure instituted, it must be a comfort to those who negotiated the treaty that they will be able to point to the approval of one house and the silence of the other. There can, indeed, be no doubt that the House of Commons has given the consent that is implied in silence, and that the debate originated by Sir Charles Adderley yesterday in a weary house, at the end of the session, and when the subject has passed from the domain of practical politics, was a purposeless discussion which will possess little public interest.

We have already given our opinion on the treaty of Washington. We believe it to be a useful and honorable treaty, which will bring to a close a wearisome dispute, and make the relations of England and the United States more satisfactory than they have been for years. That it is a diplomatic triumph or even a record of great diplomatic skill no one will pretend. On one point the British commissioners made an error which at once provoked criticism. They agreed upon rules for the conduct of neutrals which are, no doubt, substantially just, but which had not been fully recognized by existing international law, or admitted by the British government during the war. Our commissioners thought it right to place on record, in the text of the treaty, that the Queen's government could not admit these rules to be principles of international law which were in force at the time when the claims arose, but agreed that the arbitrators should assume Her Majesty's government to have undertaken to act upon the principles set forth in these rules. Whatever opposition the treaty provoked in England was almost wholly due to this paragraph. However, the British public is not disposed to quarrel about phrases, and, as we observed when the treaty was first discussed, these principles of international law which are now solemnly established by the agreement of the two first maritime powers of the world are eminently favorable to England. When we think of the unsettled state of Europe and the passions which are raging under the pacified exterior of the Continent, when we find that nation after nation is being armed in mass, we cannot be sure that any rectitude of purpose or moderation of policy will preserve us from war. Should such a calamity fall upon us, it will be an inestimable advantage that the duties of neutrals have been interpreted in the strictest sense by the nation which has the greatest opportunity of injuring us, and which has hitherto throughout its history prided itself on its independence of action and its disregard of conventionalities.

This point, on which, no doubt it is permissible to criticise the treaty, was put by Sir Charles Adderley yesterday with a certain force. He said that the Americans had rejected the former treaty because the terms of the reference to arbitration then were "whether England had fulfilled her obligations at the time the Alabama sailed; and that is, whether she had acted according to the code then accepted among nations. At present, America accepted arbitration because the terms of the reference were changed. The reference now is whether England in 1861 had fulfilled her obligations in new and stricter terms drawn up in 1871. "The question," says Sir Charles Adderley, "is whether in a matter of mutual obligation new rules should be adopted different from those on which the obligation rested." For the reasons we have given we think that this concession ought not to condemn the treaty. The manner in which the negotiation was extended from the fisheries to the Alabama question was certainly singular, inasmuch as it made the greater matter subsidiary to the less, and gave a place among the commissioners on a concern of imperial interest to the Canadians, who had originally been chosen for their knowledge of a merely local question. But when the offer came from the American Government to resume negotiations on the Alabama claim it would have been the greatest of blunders to refuse on a point of form. We could not ourselves propose a new negotiation after Mr. Sumner and the Senate had so ceremoniously rejected a treaty the details of which had been mainly suggested by their own Government. But when the offer came from their side, and the Queen's ministers had the opportunity of bringing to a close the Alabama dispute and all the other outstanding disputes between the two countries, it would have been inexcusable to say that Canadian questions must stand alone. As a matter of fact, the Canadian commissioners were very able men, and rendered good service even beyond their own domain.

Sir Charles Adderley is an authority on colonial subjects, and it may be presumed to follow him into their intricacies, but he fails to convince us that the interests of the dominion suffered in the hands of the commissioners. With regard to the Fenian depredations, we have no wish to deny that compensation for them is morally due, and as much is admitted by Mr. Gladstone himself; but the American commissioners, from the first, declared they had no power to enter on the question. Our government was no doubt aware that, considering the state of parties in the Union and the strength of the Irish faction, the President could not venture to sanction such a concession, and the alternative was to waive the point or to break off the negotiations. Sir Stafford Northcote maintains that the Canadians had no reason to complain of the treaty, and we are disposed to agree with him. The reciprocity treaty has not been re-established, but it must be remembered that the financial system of the United States is at this moment unsettled. The battle for protection has yet to be fought, but the champions of free trade are marshalling their forces and preparing for the attack. A reciprocity treaty on the old terms may be useless after a few years when the larger reciprocity of unrestricted commerce with all the world may become a principle of American finance. On Canadian as well as other subjects, a spirit of mutual concession was exhibited in the meetings at Washington, and we have the testimony of Sir Stafford Northcote that the British commissioners maintained the points which they thought of real importance. A notable proof of this is the absence from the treaty of all reference to the Queen's proclamation of neutrality, which the American Government had declared to be a wrongful recognition of the confederates as belligerents, involving England in indefinite liabilities for everything that afterward occurred.

The debate had the happy effect of drawing from Sir Roundell Palmer a speech of great ability on the conduct of England as a state during the American war. The British government has been so well and so successfully defended, and its honor and uprightness have been at length so fully admitted by the Americans themselves, that further argument may seem unnecessary. But for an effective summary of the chief points of our case, Sir Roundell Palmer's speech is invaluable. Not only did England do her own duty as a neutral, but by her example she prevented others from acting on opinions unfavorable to the then struggling federals. A part of his speech not less interesting is that in which he compares the arrangements made by Lord Stanley and Mr. Reverdy Johnson with the stipulations of the present treaty. According to Sir Roundell Palmer, Lord Stanley submitted to arbitration the honor and good faith of this country, an error so great that it would have been better to leave the dispute altogether unsettled. "All matters were left entirely at large; there was no question, from the proclamation downward, which was not involved in that reference, and, whatever award might have been made, either party would have been at liberty to place its own construction upon it." The present treaty, at any rate, allows the arbitrator to take away only our money, and not our good name. Mr. Gladstone defended the government against the not very serious attacks of the enemy, and Sir Charles Adderley withdrew his motion. It had been for the production of papers; but Sir Stafford Northcote justly observed the correspondence of the commissioners with the home government was confidential, and freedom in the conduct of negotiations is only possible among those who know that their communications with one another will be considered private. So the motion was withdrawn, and we trust no further fault will be found with the treaty of Washington.

It is not difficult to understand the readiness of a government never famed for parliamentary courtesy—and which has not scrupled during the present session to postpone week after week and month after month discussions likely to be "inconvenient" to Mr. Gladstone's interests, if not to the public service—to make or find time for the consideration of Sir C. Adderley's motion on the Washington treaty. The debate in the upper house had somewhat damaged the ministry; that in the Commons has been altogether favorable to them. In the first place, it has been postponed to a period of the session at which the attendance is scanty, and at which party spirit, however hot, is chilled by the fear of prolonging weary and useless sittings; and the time elapsed since the conclusion of the treaty has calmed the irritation felt by no small number of impartial Englishmen at its terms, and allowed the public to grow indifferent. In the next place, the presence of Sir S. Northcote as a member of the commission made anything like a party attack impossible, and secured the government against such a damaging comment from the leader of opposition as they would otherwise have apprehended. Again, the line taken by Sir C. Adderley was peculiarly advantageous to ministers. He approves that portion of the treaty upon which his authority and experience, as late under secretary for the colonies, would have given especial weight to his censure; and he so framed his motion as to make its withdrawal, on the appeal of Sir S. Northcote, a foregone conclusion. The house of commons will never insist on the production of confidential papers. Further, the judgment of the neutrals in the House of Lords was against the government; the only eminent man who holds a somewhat similar position in the Commons—Sir R. Palmer—delivered the best speech of the debate of Friday afternoon in favor of the treaty. Altogether, therefore, the ministry have gained by the discussion, and, as we think, undeservedly; for though we have always deprecated any condemnation of the treaty in Parliament, as likely to deprive us of the principal benefit for which we have made such large sacrifices and concessions, we cannot but think that the price we have paid for reconciliation with America was higher than it would have been if a manlier premier than Mr. Gladstone and a stronger minister for foreign affairs than Lord Granville had had the conduct of English policy.

Sir C. Adderley, as we have said, approves the settlement of the fisheries question as highly advantageous to the Canadians. His argument rests upon the ground that the fisheries must necessarily be thrown open to the Americans, whereas our right and power to exclude them in toto are indubitable, and that the attempt to obtain the renewal of the reciprocity treaty in exchange was a double mistake: first, because it tended to make Americans fancy that we had something to gain by free trade at their expense; second, because free trade must soon be established by their own free will, without any price on our part; and it would be a pity to give up the fisheries except for a real equivalent. The only weak point of this latter argument appears to us to lie in the doubt whether Canada will get a real equivalent. The Americans deny pro forma that the colonial fisheries are worth more than their own; and, though the fact that they persist in haunting the colonial waters proves the contrary, we have some doubts as to the result of the commission which is to weigh the comparative value of the fisheries reciprocally thrown open, and order compensation accordingly. But the point of chief interest to every one, except, perhaps, the people of the maritime provinces of the dominion, is the Alabama arbitration. Sir C. Adderley put the objection to this part of the treaty with great force and clearness. "America," he says, "rejected a former offer of arbitration, because it left our conduct to be tried by the standard of international law in force at the time, upon which she knew we must be acquitted; she accepts arbitration now, because the treaty enacts that our conduct shall be judged by a new standard of international law devised for the first time in 1871." This is quite true. But we think that both Sir C. Adderley himself and all who followed him in the debate missed the real answer to it. America never would or could consent to an arbitration based on the international law of 1861, because really, though not, perhaps, nominally, her contention has all along been that that law had, under the changed circumstances of the age, become unjust and inadequate; a mere screen for violations of its substantial and primary principle, that neutral harbors and lands shall not be made the base of hostile operations. And as we have from the first practically admitted that on this point the Americans are right, that the rule was defective and must be amended, it does not seem altogether inconsistent on our part to allow ourselves to be judged by that which we admit ought to have been the law. Of course it would have been better had America renounced a claim for damages founded on such a concession. Had she said "by the law as it was my claim for actual redress must, of course, be limited; but you owe me moral reparation if, by the judgment of an impartial tribunal, you failed to act up to the law by which, as you allow, the conduct of nations ought to be regulated." But as she, confused by the manner in which her diplomatists have mixed up remonstrances based on their theory of our national duty, with appeals to our municipal law, has thought fit to embody her demand for reparation in the form of a suit for damages, it hardly becomes us to refuse the particular form of amends she has required. Again, it must be remembered that England did even at the time admit that the standard of public law now laid down was that to which we meant to conform. We did exert ourselves to the utmost to prevent vessels, unarmed, but supposed to be intended for war, from leaving our shores. What we agree to, then, is only to adopt as the standard of our liability what we made, in fact, the standard of our conduct. Sir R. Palmer showed, with all his usual eloquence and clearness, how much we did to enforce the rules of law by which we are to be judged. He shows that we stopped several vessels, under circumstances precisely similar to those of the Alabama; and that, save the Alabama, no vessel of whose intentions the American envoy had any suspicion escaped from our shores to break the law of nations as now interpreted; for the Florida entered a confederate port as a merchantman, and received her commission there before she sailed as a confederate man-of-war. Therefore, our case is this; that, according to the old code, we did more for the North than we ought to have done; that, according to the new code, we failed, by a few hours, to stop the first vessel that ever attempted this peculiar evasion of international right, but that we did stop every one of her successors of whose intention we had any sort of notice. Is it possible, then, for a candid arbitrator to pronounce that we did not show "due diligence"? If sentence be given against us, it must be on account solely of the subsequent admission of the Alabama to our colonial ports. And it is here that the real objection to the concession made by the commissioners appears to us to lie. As the law of nations then stood we could not refuse admission to our ports to a commissioned confederate vessel, and if we are condemned under the new rules for not refusing, we shall suffer wrong—wrong to which we shall have made ourselves voluntarily liable. Nevertheless, as Sir R. Palmer remarks, by consenting to be tried by a new standard of law, we gain this advantage, that a judgment given against us does not impugn our honor or our fidelity to our actual obligations, while in any event it is better that the judgment of the arbitrators should be pronounced on definite grounds, and should not, as under the Johnson-Clarendon convention, be open to various interpretations at the humor of the disputant parties or of others who might refer to it as a precedent. Had we been acquitted by the arbiters under that convention, America might, and would, in all probability, have interpreted the acquittal as the legislation of such cruises as that of the Alabama; whereas now, be the verdict what it may, the law of nations is settled for the future, and settled in a sense favorable to English interests.

The exclusion from the treaty of the claims of Canada for reparation on account of the Fenian raids was condemned or regretted by every single speaker, including the prime minister himself. But we need not waste words upon it now. We are told that the Americans desire us to treat them as a grown-up nation and not as spoilt children. If so, they cannot but regret the conduct of their Government on this point. For, in the first place, it puts them flagrantly in the wrong before the whole civilized world; in the next, it is a point which England certainly would not have conceded to any other power, and which no other power would have asked; and finally, the grounds on which this claim was excluded from the arbitration are of a kind on which no true and honest American can reflect with satisfaction. General Grant refused to do us the very same common and simple justice that we were at the same moment doing to America, because the Irish immigrants were so powerful that no American party dared offend them. If Americans can endure to plead such an excuse we need not hesitate to accept it.

One word in conclusion. The debate in general was conducted with great dignity and good feeling; and in dealing with the reparation to be made for the deeds of the Alabama, liberals as well as conservatives remembered the precedents, English and American, for the part taken by her builders, the state of English feeling, the dubious condition of the law, the fact that Mr. Laird had been advised that he was within it, and above all, the obligation imposed upon him by the present policy of the country not to vindicate her conduct by arguments which must give bitter offense to Americans. There was but one exception to this rule. Mr. Rathbone, if not misrepresented, took occasion to make a severe and very ungenerous attack on a man who, for the reason above given, could not answer him. Mr. Rathbone is no hot-headed youth, no ignorant demagogue; he must have been perfectly aware that it behooved Mr. Laird to be silent; he must have been well aware that at least one of the ministers who listened to him from the treasury bench has been guilty of acts quite as questionable as the building of the Alabama, with which Mr. Rathbone's friends, if not himself, warmly sympathized; and he had no right to indulge his party feelings, as a liberal and a Northern sympathizer, at the expense of a foe whose hands were tied. We say his party feelings—for had he been actuated, as he doubtless believed, simply by a sense of public duty, he would have included sundry political friends of his own in his censures. We are bound to say that his attack was as unjust in substance as it was ungenerous in occasion, but even had Mr. Laird been as much to blame as Mr. Rathbone thinks, and had his offense been without the abundant precedents which excuse it, such language, at such a time, would have been wholly unjustifiable.

Although hours are of value at this period of the session, it cannot be said that the greater portion of Friday afternoon and evening was misapplied in the discussion of the treaty of Washington. It is true, that treaty is now a thing of the past, and that even the adverse opinion of the House of Commons would not prevent the arrangement which we have made with the United States being religiously fulfilled; but at the same time it would scarcely have been decorous that a treaty establishing no inconsiderable change in international law, and entailing no small sacrifice on the part of this country, should have been concluded without eliciting some expression of opinion from the lower house of Parliament. Within a short time after the return to this country of the royal commissioners charged with the negotiation of the treaty, its subject-matter was discussed in the upper house, and by a decisive vote that chamber declared its approval of the manner in which our long-standing difference with the United States was put in train of being finally and satisfactorily arranged. It was then pointed out, as indeed was manifest to all who were acquainted with the history of the "Alabama claims," that the government of this country had considerably modified the attitude they held, and the language they employed, when Mr. Adams, the American minister at the Court of St. James, first demanded, on the part of the Government of Mr. Lincoln, satisfaction for the depredations committed by the Alabama and her sister cruisers. Sir Roundell Palmer was the chief law adviser of the Crown when the claims were first advanced, and in the recent debate in the House of Commons, he has no doubt reconciled much that was apparently inconsistent in our former treatment of this question, and has placed on its true footing the settlement finally assented to. It is unquestionable that the attitude assumed by the government of Lord Palmerston, when Earl Russell was at the Foreign Office, was one for which we had precedents in the conduct of the United States when pressed under precisely similar circumstances by Spain, and subsequently by Portugal, for compensation for depredations committed on the shipping of those powers, by privateers which issued from American ports. It is also true that the construction put by the English government on the then foreign enlistment act, was identical with that put by American judges and jurists on the act of Congress on which our statute was modeled. But, as Sir Roundell Palmer observed, "the real truth of the matter is, that this country does not like to be at variance with the United States. Whatever might be the measure of our obligations, whatever the legal view of it, this country most deeply regretted what had occurred, and we preferred to waive a strict examination of the question on legal and international grounds, in order to get a settlement which should bring security for the present and peace and good will for the future."

Expediency, as distinguished from strict justice, was taken for a guide by the government of which Lord Stanley was the foreign minister; and although, when the Reverdy Johnson treaty was rejected by the United States Government, we might have fallen back on our strict rights, the liberal administration, which succeeded to office in this country, rightly followed in the footsteps of their predecessors, and addressed themselves to the task of settlement with the exclusive object of healing a serious difference and laying down rules to prevent its recurrence.

And it must be allowed that, as a set-off against the unquestionable sacrifice which we make by the treaty of Washington, we secure the inestimable gain of establishing—certainly between ourselves and the United States, and most probably universally, by the early adoption by other maritime powers—rules of international law whose observance will go far to diminish the not unfrequent risks of misunderstandings between neutrals and belligerents. The essential fault of the treaty which it had been the intention of Lord Stanley and Mr. Reverdy Johnson to conclude was that it simply provided for the settlement of the particular claims then advanced by the Government of the United States, without making any provision for the avoidance of similar misunderstandings in future; and those who entertain the opinion that the former treaty would have been preferable to that made at Washington will find some difficulty replying to the objections taken to it by Sir Roundell Palmer. If the decision of the arbitrators had been in our favor, the ill-feeling which had arisen in the United States would have remained unabated, and, in the event of our being engaged in war with European power, the United States, accepting the construction put upon our act, would not improbably have encouraged in their ports similar evasions of the principle of the foreign enlistment act to those of which they had fruitlessly complained. On the other hand, if the decision of the arbitrators had been against us, the United States might still have maintained their original construction of their obligations under the act of Congress, and treated any complaints advanced by us at a future time as they had treated those made on former occasions by the Spanish and Portuguese governments. In other words, the issue has now been dealt with on a broad, comprehensive basis, and with a view not merely to the satisfaction of an existing difference, but the protection of our future interests. The only consideration which could exist for a departure from the line taken by Earl Russell eight years ago in the dispatch in which, on the part of Her Majesty's government, he refused to entertain the claims advanced by the American Government, must rest on the creation of some guarantee that for the future the Government of the United States will undertake the same obligations they seek to exact upon us, and this guarantee is afforded by the treaty of Washington.

The main difficulty which has always stood in the way of reconciling desired changes in international law with the municipal law of particular states, has, in the present instance, been to a great extent overcome.

Although the sovereign may by treaty agree with the executive of another state that, as between the two powers, certain rules of international law shall obtain, that agreement must be entirely subsidiary to the municipal law. In this country the Crown, lords, and commons constitute the legislative power, and it would therefore be incompetent for the sovereign to impose on the country international obligations at variance or inconsistent with the known laws of the realm; and if she attempted to do so by treaty, they would be inoperative. In like manner, in the United States the legislative power rests with the President and Congress, and consequently the President and Senate, with whom the power of making treaties resides, could not override the general law by stipulations inconsistent with it.

Now, in our case, we, in the first instance, completely remodeled our foreign enlistment act, and then the government assented by the treaty of Washington to certain rules which, by the aid of the new statute, may be enforced by the tribunals of the country; but up to this time no change has been made by Congress in the American foreign enlistment act, and it is undoubtedly true that, if no change were made, the obligations entered into by the Executive of the United States by the recent treaty would be inoperative. In the event of our being at war, and cruisers being obtained by our enemies from American ports, under circumstances similar to those under which the Alabama quitted English waters, the American Government would be powerless to put a stop to the practice. Accordingly it will be necessary for Congress to pass act similar to our own, in order to enable the Executive to observe in good faith the stipulations into which it has entered.

That such an act will be speedily passed we have a right to expect, and indeed we entertain no doubt that Congress will fulfill the engagement which has been impliedly contracted in its name; but until this course is taken, that security which we look for at the hands of the Americans will not be afforded, nor will the price of the sacrifice we have made be duly paid.

[From the Daily Telegraph, Monday, August 7, 1871.]

Those among our countrymen who are well acquainted with the United States are sometimes lost in wonder that Englishmen of cultivation and thoughtfulness should betray such ignorance and indifference, regarding all topics which affect our relations with the great republic, as we had to note in the debate of Friday last, on the Washington treaty. The "long session" of 1871 is already identified in the minds of English politicians with the abolition of purchase in the army, the introduction of vote by ballot, or the state visit to Ireland of the Prince of Wales and his brother and sister. If an intelligent man who has never left the shores of England were asked to name the public measures by which Mr. Gladstone is most likely to gain immortality, he would probably instance the disestablishment of the Irish church, the abolition of army purchase, or some other act of purely domestic legislation. None, however, who have studied history with advantage, can fail to be well aware that the measures which have most deeply affected the commonwealth of England have not unfrequently passed through Parliament without notice or comment. The biographer of that strange and brilliant being, Charles Townshend, tells us that never was there so languid a debate on so vital a topic as when, in 1765, George Grenville made the famous proposal to tax North America, by introducing to Parliament his fatal stamp act. No other debate of the last century is read to-day with such mournful interest as that in which Charles Townshend spoke of the Americans as "children planted by our care and nourished by our indulgence;" provoking from Colonel Barré the angry retort that they were "children planted not by your care, but by your oppression—they fled from your tyranny to a then uncultivated land." The politicians of all countries are too ready to imagine that everything which is close to their eyes, and is long and loudly debated, must necessarily be of gigantic magnitude. They resemble children who, gazing upward at night, find it impossible to believe that the moon is not the largest of all the heavenly bodies. But the man who extends his range of vision, and contrasts the position of Great Britain—reconciled, as she now is, to her transatlantic children—with the position in which she stood only six short months ago, will not be disposed to damn with faint praise the treaty of Washington, or to regard it as a measure of which everybody is glad and nobody proud. "That it is a diplomatic triumph," testily observes one of our contemporaries, "no one will pretend." Yet no treaty to which England has ever been a party, in her thousand years of history, was fraught with more advantages to mankind than the treaty of Washington. We do not claim, on behalf of Lord Ripon and his colleagues, that they out-finessed or out-manuevered their American collaborateurs. In 1871, happily, a "diplomatic triumph" means a very different thing from what the words implied when mendacious tricksters like Talleyrand or Pozzo di Borgo tried conclusions across a board of green cloth. But we emphatically assert that, long and distinguished as we hope the public career of Lord Ripon and Sir Stafford Northcote will be, no prouder words will be inscribed in their memorial than, "One of the framers of the treaty of Washington."

In order rightly to estimate the significance of that great instrument of reconciliation, let us briefly call to mind what were the probabilities of success before the high commissioners of Great Britain, when they landed at New York in the beginning of last March. We must not forget the annual message which the President of the United States communicated to Congress in December last. Although it excited little public attention at a moment when Paris was beleaguered by the Prussians, that document was undoubtedly one of the most pronounced state papers that ever issued from the head of a great nation. President Grant animadverted, in very outspoken terms, upon the "unneighborly and unfriendly" conduct of Canada in regard to the fishery dispute, and proceeded to speak, with an acerbity scarcely dignified, of the still unadjusted Alabama claims. "The time is probably not far distant," he continued, "when the European political connection with this continent will cease;" and he advised that the policy of the United States should be so shaped as to accord with that coveted end. Six months ago it was the scarcely concealed hope of every ordinary American politician that England would, in transatlantic phrase, "foot the balance" of the Alabama claims by withdrawing her flag from the North American continent. It was useless for Englishmen to affirm that they claim no feudal ownership over a reluctant province, but that the Union with the British Crown is maintained by the Canadians, the Nova Scotians, New Brunswickers, and British Columbians themselves. Despite the ignorance which on both sides of the Atlantic prevailed as to the subjects in dispute and also despite, the minatory language employed in December by President Grant there were two men—Sir Edward Thornton and Mr. Secretary Fish—who deemed the moment propitious for an attempt at reconciliation. It would be unjust to deny that not a few Englishmen, well acquainted with the American sentiment, did not share the hopes of the British minister at Washington. In like manner most of the Washington politicians sneered at Mr. Fish for having brought the five British high commissioners across the Atlantic to no purpose. Mr. Sumner, for example, made no concealment of his conviction, during the whole of March and the first half of April, that the negotiations of the joint high commission would “resemble one of those rivers in Africa which have no mouth, but which, flowing away from the sea, are lost among infinite deserts of sand.” It would be absurd, therefore, to ignore the fact that Sir Edward Thornton ran some risk when he invited the home government to send British commissioners to Washington, and that Mr. Gladstone and Lord Granville ran a still greater risk when they lent a favorable ear to Sir Edward Thornton’s invitation. The characteristic courage in which Mr. Gladstone so far emulates his great master, Sir Robert Peel, was never more markedly displayed; nor has it failed to reap a rich reward. And although the treaty thus owes its origin to Sir Edward Thornton and to a Canadian statesman now resident in London—Sir John Rose—while Mr. Gladstone and Lord Granville deserve high praise for their courage in adopting the views of their transatlantic advisers, only the ignorant or the most prejudiced would assert that the treaty itself is “no diplomatic triumph.” The somewhat lengthened sojourn in Washington of four Englishmen so conciliatory, so intelligent, and honest as Lord Ripon, Sir Stafford Northcote, Professor Bernard, and Lord Tenterden, smoothed away every difficulty; and the happy result was a treaty which will write its name deeper on the page of international history than that of Utrecht or of Vienna.

For these reasons, the short debate in the House of Commons on Friday will not probably be read hereafter without surprise, as one of many which indicate the shortsightedness of statesmen. Out of the nine speakers who took part, three only appeared to have a just perception of the value of an international instrument which will probably convert the year 1871 into the great diplomatic date of the present century. Even Mr. Gladstone spoke as if on the defensive about a treaty which will not possibly be the most beneficial and best-remembered measure of his life. It is desirable that Englishmen who grumble over the concessions which Lord Ripon and his colleagues made “for the sake of peace,” should remember what, in the same interest, Mr. Fish, General Schenck, and the American commissioners gave up. For the sake of a comparatively trivial payment in money, they abandoned what to three-fifths of the American nation seemed the most precious of possessions—the treasured hope of revenge. Sir Charles Adderley began the discussion with a regret that England should have sued as a petitioner in a matter which was more important to the United States. Has he reflected upon the misapprehension which these words imply? To a nation so rich and powerful as the great republic, what could it signify whether less than £3,000,000 were added or not added to a debt which at the close of the war exceeded £500,000,000? President Grant could not have more thoroughly gratified a majority of his countrymen, when, on his accession to office in 1868, the war passions were still unallayed, than by paying the losses charged to the Alabama and her sister pirates, and including the amount in the national debt, with an intimation that he or his successors would, at the right moment, hold England responsible. In such a case, the very smallest war in which England was engaged would have meant also war with the United States. It may not be generally known, that during the English expedition against King Theodore, some American politicians urged that envoys should be sent to obtain letters of marque from the Abyssinian savage. But for his inaccessibility, and for the fact that he owned no ports, the sea might have been covered with Americo-Abyssinian Alabamas. Against the recurrence of such a danger, Lord Ripon, and Sir Stafford Northcote have guaranteed us. But those achievements are matters of detail. The grand result of the negotiations at Washington is, that English and American statesmen have joined, with the deliberate approval of the two powerful countries, in laying the basis for a system of arbitration which may hereafter save wars more gigantic and more wasteful than any we have yet witnessed; and that they have also initiated such a method of improving the relations between foreign states as may develop a genuine international law. Thus, whatever may be the opinion of cotemporaries in 1871, we believe that in 1971 the treaty of Washington will be regarded as England’s greatest diplomatic triumph during the nineteenth century.

Washington, August 11, 1871.

SIR: Shortly before Sir Edward Thornton sailed for Europe, he suggested the name of Count Corti, the Italian minister to this Government, as the commissioner under Article XII of the treaty of May 8, 1871, to be named by the President of the United States and Her Britannic Majesty conjointly. He stated that this suggestion was made on his own responsibility, without the instruction of his government. The President accepted the suggestion, and agreed to name Count Corti, on his part, if the British government proposed it. Sir Edward subsequently informed me that his government approved the nomination, and he went to Newport, where the Count is passing the summer, and on the eve of his sailing for England telegraphed to me that the Count consented to serve on the commission if his government would approve. I have had no other official communication on the subject, and as the time is advancing within which the joint appointment must be made, I have sent to Mr. Marsh the telegram of which a copy is inclosed. It was submitted to Mr. Pakenham before it was dispatched, and a copy of it was given to him.

Inclosed herewith is a copy of a telegram sent to you on the 9th instant.* The President has appointed Mr. Charles Francis Adams the arbitrator to be named by him under Article I of the treaty on the Tribunal of Arbitration to meet in Geneva, and you were aware before you left the United States that he had appointed Mr. J. C. Bancroft Davis, the Assistant Secretary of State, the agent on the part of the United States to represent this Government generally in all matters connected with the arbitration. These appointments have not yet been officially made public; that of Mr. Davis has been unofficially authorized to be announced. It is probable that both will be authoritatively made public very shortly.

If the British government will give you the name of the arbitrator appointed in their behalf, you will at once announce to them the appointment of Mr. Adams.

If they are not prepared, or not willing to name the arbitrator on their part, you will exercise your own judgment in communicating the appointment of the American arbitrator.

The appointment of Mr. Davis you may communicate at once. The President has also named Mr. Robert S. Hale, of New York, as the agent of this Government to attend the commissioners to be appointed under the Article XII of the treaty. This appointment you will communicate to Her Majesty's government.

A copy of the answer is also inclosed.

I also send herewith a report from the Times of the 12th instant, of Lord Granville's announcement in the House of Lords on the 11th instant, of the appointment of the lord chief justice of England as arbitrator, and of Sir Roundell Palmer as counsel for Great Britain under the above-mentioned treaty.

[From the London Times, August 12, 1871.]

Parliamentary Intelligence—House of Lords, Friday, August 11.

The lord chancellor took his seat on the woolsack at 5 o'clock.

PETITIONS.

The earl of Shaftesbury presented petitions from Bridport and Framlingham for the repeal of the contagious diseases acts.

THE ALABAMA CLAIMS.

Lord Redesale asked whether the question as to the right of the United States to persevere in their demand for an indemnity on account of the Alabama claims since the reconciliation of the Southern with the Northern States would be distinctly raised before the arbitrators, inasmuch as the damage for which such indemnity is claimed was inflicted by the Southern States, who now joined in the application. He reminded their lordships that on his putting a question earlier in the session it was stated that the point had not been raised previously, and that it was too late to bring it before the commissioners. He hoped it would now be taken up, for the acts of the Southern States having been condoned by the Northern States, it was contrary to every principle of justice that the former should claim compensation for the damages inflicted by themselves.

Earl Granville replied that it would be inconvenient to discuss the nature of the case to be laid before the arbitrators, but it would, doubtless, be satisfactory to the noble lord and to the house to know what steps had been taken in the matter. The drawing up of the case had been confided to the noble and learned lord on the woolsack, who would be assisted by Lord Tenterden and Professor Bernard, the two men in England most thoroughly acquainted with all the facts. He was happy to say also, that besides the advantages to be derived from the legal advisers of the government, Sir Roundell Palmer had consented to act as our counsel on the occasion. Sir Roundell had shown great public spirit in accepting this task, at a great personal sacrifice. He would also superintend every detail of the case. As to the particular point raised by the noble lord, the government would, of course, not omit to urge any point which they could fairly and honorably urge, while abstaining from putting forward any point which did not appear to them or their advisers founded in reason.

THE LORD CHIEF JUSTICE OF ENGLAND AND THE ALABAMA CLAIMS.

Earl Granville, before moving the adjournment of the house, desired to make a statement which he had no doubt their lordships would hear with pleasure. He was happy to state that he had just received a letter from the lord chief justice of England to the effect that that most learned judge (Sir Alexander Cockburn) had consented to act as arbitrator in the case of the Alabama claims. [Hear, hear.]

Their lordships adjourned at 25 minutes after 6 o'clock.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

SIR: On the 10th instant General Schenck received your telegram of the 9th, (a copy of which is herewith inclosed,) instructing him to inform Lord Granville by note that the President had named Judge James S. Frazer, of Indiana, as commissioner under the XIIth article of the treaty of Washington, and also authorizing him to see his Lordship and say that instructions had been telegraphed to Mr. Marsh to obtain the consent of the Italian government to Count Corti's acting as third commissioner under the treaty, and to request him, if he should see fit, to give instructions to the British minister in Italy to make a similar and contemporaneous request.

General Schenck at once wrote to Lord Granville, announcing the selection by the President of Judge Frazer, and his lordship replied on the 14th instant, expressing his thanks for the communication, and saying that Mr. Russell Gurney, recorder of London, had been appointed Her Majesty's commissioner under the same article of the treaty.

I have the honor to inclose copies of both these notes.

General Schenck did not succeed in obtaining an interview before leaving London with Lord Granville, in relation to the second instruction in your telegram of the 9th instant; but I saw his lordship at the Foreign Office at 3.40 p. m., on 15th instant, and brought the subject to his notice. He said that Sir A. Paget had been instructed to propose Count Corti; but that when he communicated this to Mr. Marsh, that gentleman had received no advices on the subject from Washington. Subsequently he obtained instructions, and Her Majesty's government have received information that the two ministers have already acted on their similar instructions, and requested the consent of the Italian government to Count Corti acting as the third commissioner.

I telegraphed the substance of this reply to you yesterday afternoon, and now transmit herewith a copy of that message.

SIR: With reference to your No. 42 to General Schenck, I have the honor to state that Her Majesty's government publicly announced in Parliament, on the 11th of August, the appointment of Sir Alexander Cockburn, Bart., the Lord Chief Justice of Queen's Bench, as arbitrator under Article I of the treaty of Washington, and communicated this fact verbally to me through Lord Enfield on the 30th ultimo. At that date the commission of Sir Alexander had not been signed by the Queen, nor had the appointment been announced in the Gazette, but on the 15th of the month a telegram was sent to Mr. Pakenham instructing him to make known the appointment to you. It is not customary to make such announcements to foreign governments by note until after the appointments are gazetted, and hence the delay in this case; but the selection of Sir Alexander was communicated to me without hesitation. I accordingly notified Lord Granville by letter that the President had appointed Mr. Charles Francis Adams as the arbitrator to be named by him, and I now have the honor to send herewith a copy of that note. I also transmit a copy of his lordship's reply, in which he announced the appointment of Sir Alexander Cockburn by Her Majesty the Queen in a similar capacity.

As directed, I promptly communicated to Lord Granville by note the appointment of Mr. J. C. Bancroft Davis as agent on the part of the United States under Article II of the treaty, and now send copies of my letter, and of his lordship's acknowledgment thereof.

I also inclose copies of my note announcing to Lord Granville the appointment of Mr. Robert S. CORRESPONDENCE WITH THE BRITISH LEGATION AT WASHINGTON.

*Mr. Fish to Sir Edward Thornton.*DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, April 29, 1871.

SIR: Information has reached this Department that the Canadian engineers engaged in constructing a wagon-road from Fort Garry to the Lake of the Woods have located a considerable portion of it, including its termination at a harbor in the Lake of the Woods, within territory belonging to the United States, the monument marking the northwestern limit of the United States above the 49th parallel of latitude being upward of seven miles north of the termination.

I will be obliged by your causing an inquiry to be made as to this alleged encroachment upon the jurisdiction of the United States, with a view, in the event that the statement is correct, that the work may be discontinued.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 29th ultimo relative to the information received by you, that a portion of a wagon-road which is being constructed by Canadian engineers from Fort Garry to the Lake of the Woods has been located within territory of the United States. I have forwarded a copy of your note to the Governor General of Canada, and have requested his excellency to cause inquiries to be made into the matter and to furnish me with the information he may obtain.

As soon as I shall receive it, I will not fail to communicate it to you.

*Mr. Fish to Sir Edward Thornton.*DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 8, 1871.

SIR: As several articles of the treaty which has been signed this day, relating to the admission of citizens of the United States to fish within the territorial waters of Her Britannic Majesty on the coasts of Canada, Prince Edward Island, and Newfoundland, cannot come into full operation until the legislation contemplated in that instrument shall have taken place, and as it seems to be in accordance with the interest of both governments, in furtherance of the objects and spirit of the treaty, that the citizens of the United States should have the enjoyment of that liberty during the present season, I am directed by the President to express to you his hope that Her Majesty's government will be prepared, in the event of the ratification of the treaty, to make on their own behalf, and to urge the governments of the Dominion of Canada, of Prince Edward Island, and of Newfoundland, to make for the season referred to, within their respective jurisdictions, such relaxations and regulations as it may respectively be in their power to adopt, with a view to the admission of American fishermen to the liberty which it is proposed to secure to them by the treaty. The Government of the United States would be prepared at the same time to admit British subjects to the right of fishing in the waters of the United States, specified in the treaty; but as the admission into the United States, free of duty, of any articles which are by law subject to duty cannot be allowed without the sanction of Congress, the President will, in case the above suggestion meets the views of the British government, recommend and urge upon Congress at their next session that any duties which may have been collected on and after the 1st day of July next on fish-oil and fish, (except fish of the inland lakes and of the rivers falling into the same, and except fish preserved in oil,) the produce of the fisheries of the Dominion of Canada and of Prince Edward Island shall be returned and refunded to the parties paying the same, if a similar arrangement is made with respect to the admission into the British possessions of fish-oil and fish, (with the like exception,) being the produce of the fisheries of the United States.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of yesterday's date, and to inform you in reply that I have been authorized by Earl Granville to state that in the event of the ratification of the treaty signed yesterday, Her Majesty's government will be prepared to recommend to the governments of the Dominion of Canada, of Prince Edward Island, and of Newfoundland, that the provisional arrangement proposed in your note above mentioned, with regard to the right of fishing by United States citizens on the coasts of those British possessions and by British subjects in the waters of the United States, described in Article XIX of the treaty, shall take effect during the coming season, on the understanding that the ultimate decision of this question must rest with the above-mentioned colonial governments, who would be asked to grant the immediate and certain right of fishing within the territorial waters of those colonies, whilst the return of the import duties on fish from the 1st of July next promised by the United States is prospective and contingent on the action of Congress.

No. 223.

Sir Edward Thornton to Mr. Fish.

WASHINGTON, May 24, 1871. (Received May 24.)

SIR: In compliance with an instruction which I have received from Lord Granville, I have the honor to inform you that in consequence of some differences which are pending between Great Britain and the republic of Liberia, Her Majesty's government made proposals for the adjustment of those differences, and for the settlement of the question of the limits of the northwestern boundaries of that republic.

Inclosed is a copy of a dispatch addressed by Lord Granville in October last to the President of Liberia, which conveys proposals for the mode of settlement of the above questions. You will perceive that in the event of any differences arising between the commissioners for settling the boundary question, it is proposed to submit the disputed points to the arbitration of a commissioner appointed by the Government of the United States. The Liberian government has since signified to Her Majesty's government its acceptance of the proposals made by the latter, and I am consequently instructed to ask the Government of the United States if it will be good enough to depute an officer to attend the commissioners appointed by both parties to meet at Monrovia, and to act as arbitrator in case of any disagreement between them.

It will give Her Majesty's government much pleasure if the Government of the United States will consent to accept the task of arbitrator in this question through one of its officers on whose impartial judgment it can rely, and whose expenses will, of course, be defrayed jointly by the British and Liberian governments. Copies of the necessary papers and maps will be eventually forwarded to Monrovia for the use of the commissioners, and Lord Granville would be glad to know, in case the Government of the United States should kindly accede to the request of that of Her Majesty, when the officer whom it may depute for this duty will be able to proceed there.

I have, &c.,

EDWARD THORNTON.

FOREIGN OFFICE, October 31, 1870.

SIR: I have carefully considered the papers which you left with me, consisting of copies and originals of deeds relating to the cession to Liberia of certain territories to the northward of the present recognized boundary limits. I beg leave to return them to you herewith.

I can only repeat what I have stated at our interviews, that it is impossible for Her Majesty's government to decide upon the validity of deeds, most of which they know to be disputed, upon an ex parte statement and without hearing the counter-statements and evidence which the chiefs interested may desire to produce, and I must therefore adhere to my opinion, that the question can only be satisfactorily solved by a commission of inquiry on the spot.

Her Majesty's government have not failed to give their careful consideration to the suggestions that you have made to them for the settlement of this question, and shortly before your arrival in this country they had received a proposal from the government of the Emperor of the French to join in an inquiry into the territorial claims of Liberia, and the communications which took place thereupon have led to the delay that has occurred in my reply to the communications of your government. Recent events in France will however probably prevent the French government from carrying out their intention of associating themselves in the proposed inquiry, and it remains therefore to consider how Her Majesty's government can best meet the wish of Liberia for a settlement of the question. I wish, in the first place, shortly to explain the views and feelings of Her Majesty's government upon this subject, which seems to have been partly misunderstood, in order to assure you of the spirit in which they will enter into such an inquiry as I have indicated.

You are aware that they are prepared to extend their recognition of the Liberian boundary limits so as to include the Sagaree territory, which was admitted by the commission of 1863 to be proved to belong to Liberia.

It is therefore the claim of Liberia to the whole line of coast lying northward of this limit, between the Manna and Young Rivers, which provokes discussion and question. Within these limits the right of trading is the only interest which England possesses, except to the extreme northwest, in the neighborhood of the Shebar River, where her claims in some measure clash with those of Liberia, but this includes but a small portion of the district in dispute, and in the other portions England has no territorial pretensions.

There would therefore be no objection on the part of England at once to recognize the sovereignty of Liberia over the greater portion of these countries were it not that some of the native chiefs have repudiated the alleged cession of their territories and have denied that Liberia has any legal claim to them, and Her Majesty's government are therefore unwilling to hand over, these chiefs, with whom treaties have been concluded and faithfully observed, against their wishes and upon insufficient evidence of title, to the jurisdiction of Liberia, and they maintain that the justice of the Liberian pretensions can only be satisfactorily established by a strict and impartial investigation upon the spot into the title deeds upon which she rests her claims, and into any evidence against their validity that may be produced by the native chiefs.

The commission which met in 1863 for this purpose failed to accomplish its object, because the Liberian commissioners refused to allow the testimony of the native chiefs to be admitted as evidence against the title deeds which were produced on the part of Liberia or to join in any inquiry on the subject, but Her Majesty's government are unable to understand why the Liberian government have objected to an examination on the spot of the evidence on which they rest their claims, which, if they are well founded, would establish their justice and expose the weakness of the conflicting statements of the native chiefs and the frauds which you allege to be practiced by them in the sale of their lands.

Her Majesty's government consider that the Liberian government should withdraw this objection and agree to the examination of all the evidence that may be adduced on either side, and if they consent to do so, I beg to assure you that the instructions to the British commissioners will be dictated by a spirit of strict impartiality and a desire to recognize the claims of Liberia wherever they are proved to be just and well founded.

Her Majesty's government must, however, exclude from further consideration the claims arising out of the case of the Elisabeth, and the plunder of the property of British subjects in the Mannah River district.

Whether or not the pretensions of Liberia to the sovereignty of the district in question are proved to be well founded, the fact will remain the same that Her Majesty's government had frequently warned the Liberian government that they could not recognize their claim to this territory without further investigation; but, in defiance of these warnings, the Liberian government chose to prejudge the question by taking the law into their own hands, committing outrages to which it was impossible passively to submit, and which left Her Majesty's government no option but to pursue the course which they eventually took to obtain reparation. I can assure you, however, that these measures were taken with the greatest reluctance, and that the officer intrusted with the mission was strictly enjoined so to conduct his proceedings as to wound as little as possible the dignity of Liberia; but, for these reasons, Her Majesty's government cannot permit this question, which they consider as settled, to be re-opened, and, although I have no wish to press unduly upon your government for the payment of the compensation at a moment when the finances of Liberia are in a disorganized condition, I must point out to you that the solemn obligation which your government contracted in this case must be fulfilled as soon as possible, and that Her Majesty's government cannot consent to any modification of its terms.

As regards the question of appointing a British consul to reside in Liberia, which your government has often pressed upon the attention of Her Majesty's government, I regret to state that the British trade with the republic, hampered as it is by the restrictions imposed by the Liberian law of 1863, is not, at present, of sufficient importance to warrant the creation of such an appointment, but if the Liberian government think fit to relieve foreign trade from these restrictions and to adopt a more liberal commercial policy, leading to the extension and increased importance of British trade, Her Majesty's government will then be happy to entertain the proposal.

In conclusion, I beg leave to inclose the draft of a note containing the basis of an agreement as to the terms upon which a joint commission of inquiry might be appointed, and while cordially reciprocating the wishes you have expressed for the cultivation of the most friendly feelings between Great Britain and Liberia, I would point out to you that this can be best attained by a prompt and honorable settlement of all questions in dispute between our two governments.

I am, &c., &c.,

GRANVILLE.

To President ROYE.

Draught of proposals for the settlement of the Liberian boundary question.

Her Majesty's government, being desirous of putting an end to the present uncertainty regarding the correct boundary limits of Liberia, and having been in communication with the government of Liberia respecting the best means of arriving at a common understanding upon the subject, have agreed to the following proposals for the settlement of the question :

1. As the British government, while agreeing to recognize the actual limits of the republic as comprising the coast-line between Cape Palmas, to the south, and the south bank of the river Solyman, to the northwest, cannot admit, without further inquiry, the claims advanced by Liberia to the line of coast northward of this boundary, lying between the Solyman and Shebar rivers :

2. As some of the native chiefs within these limits have denied the alleged cession of their territories to Liberia, and repudiated her claims to them, the British government propose that a joint commission, consisting of two British and two Liberian commissioners, shall be appointed to investigate, on the spot, the disputed claims of Liberia, and to define her boundary limits.

3. The commissioners shall be fully empowered to inquire into the validity of the title-deeds that the Liberian commissioners may produce in support of their claims, and to entertain all and any evidence to the contrary that the native chiefs and other claimants may desire to submit to them.

4. The decision of the commissioners is to be considered as final and absolute, and, in the event of any disagreement between them, the points in dispute shall be left to the arbitration of the United States, who shall, if necessary, be invited to send out an officer to the commission.

5. The commissioners are to limit their inquiry strictly to the question of boundaries, and are not to entertain any other subject of discussion.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, June 24, 1871.

SIR: Much anxiety is expressed and made known to this Department on the part of those concerned in the mackerel fishery near the coasts of the British provinces, the season for which is about to open. Though aware that they cannot yet technically claim the privileges and immunities promised to them in the treaty of Washington, they were in hopes that, through the forbearance of Her Majesty's authorities and those of the colonies, they might no longer be subjected to the annoyances to which they have hitherto been liable. You are aware that I have had reason to share in those hopes. Believing, as I firmly do, that if they should be disappointed, much irritation would be occasioned, which it is desirable should be avoided, and apprehending that the legislation on the part of the United States, stipulated for in the treaty, might otherwise at least be retarded, I pray you again to move the respective imperial or colonial authorities, that nothing practicable or reasonable may be omitted which might tend to the result desired.

If you should think favorably of this request, you will pardon me for adding that it is highly important that it should be complied with as soon as may be convenient.

No. 225.

Sir Edward Thornton to Mr. Fish.

WASHINGTON, June 26, 1871. (Received June 27.)

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 24th instant, and to assure you that as far as the action of Her Majesty's naval officers or of those of the Canadian government is concerned, there is no cause for anxiety to citizens of the United States engaged in the fisheries in the neighborhood of the British provinces, so long as they may respect the laws upon the subject now in force. The tenor of the instructions issued to those officers both by Her Majesty's government and by that of the Dominion are of the most liberal nature, and though they continue to hold the opinion that under the treaty of 1818 United States fishermen are prohibited from frequenting colonial ports and harbors for any other purposes but for shelter, repairing damages, purchasing wood, and obtaining water, such prohibition will not be enforced during the present season, and they will be allowed to enter Canadian ports for the purposes of trade, and of transshipping fish and procuring supplies, nor will they be prevented from fishing outside of the three-mile limit in bays the mouth of which is more than six miles wide.

It is to be hoped, however, that citizens of the United States will, on their part, contribute to the prevention of untimely collisions, by refraining from encroaching, for the purpose of fishing, upon those waters from which, by the treaty of 1818 and by the laws of Great Britain and Canada, they are excluded, until the legislation for insuring to them the privileges and immunities agreed upon by the treaty of the 8th ultimo shall have been carried out.

Copy of a report of the honorable the Privy Council, dated June 22, 1871.

The committee have had under consideration the memorandum dated June 22, 1871, from the honorable the minister of public works, on the dispatch from the British minister at Washington, respecting certain alleged encroachments by the Canadian engineers in locating a wagon-road from Fort Garry to the Lake of the Woods, including the termination of it, within territory belonging to the United States, and they respectfully report their concurrence in the recommendation made in the said memorandum, and advise that the same be approved and acted upon.

Memorandum.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS,
Ottawa, June 22, 1871.

The undersigned has had submitted for his report a dispatch from the British minister at Washington forwarding for your excellency's information a letter from Mr. Fish, Secretary of State for the United States of America, in which complaint is made that "the Canadian engineers engaged in constructing a wagon-road from Fort Garry to the Lake of the Woods have located a considerable portion of it, including its termination, at a harbor in the Lake of the Woods within territory belonging to the United States, the monument marking the northwestern limit of the United States above the 49th parallel of latitude being upward of seven miles north of the termination."

The undersigned has also had submitted for his information a dispatch from his honor the lieutenant governor of Manitoba, dated March 27, 1871, (No. 136,) bringing to your excellency's notice an alleged mistake by the commissioners who placed and determined the site of the monument which serves to indicate the northwest angle of the Lake of the Woods, pointing out the inconvenience of that portion of the boundary line which runs due south from the said monument to the 49th parallel of north latitude, and submitting for your excellency's consideration the opportuneness of bringing the whole subject before competent authorities for rectification and adjustment.

A report from Mr. Dawson, superintending engineer of the Red River route, accompanied by partially explanatory maps, dated May 23, 1871, states that "the road leading from Fort Garry to the Lake of the Woods has its termination close to the extreme westerly point of the northwest angle, and that the engineers engaged in locating it have no knowledge of any part of it being within the territory of the United States."

From these documents it is inferred that the site of a certain monument placed as a basis to determine the exact point taken at the northwest, has been mistaken for the northwest angle itself; and, consequently, that the alleged encroachment of Canadian engineers upon United States territory may be explained to the satisfaction of all the parties interested.

Pending further inquiry and survey, about to be made by the engineers of the Red River route, and the production of more perfect maps of the region surrounding the Lake of the Woods, the undersigned has the honor to recommend: That the Department of State, at Washington, be requested to furnish a sketch showing where the alleged encroachment has taken place, and the exact locality of the monument at the northwestern limit of the United States of America to which reference is made in Mr. Fish's letter, or that it be left to the joint commission who are to settle the boundary line between the United States and Manitoba to ascertain and re-mark the northwest angle.

Respectfully submitted.

Minister of Public Works.

*Mr. Davis to Mr. Pakenham.*DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, August 9, 1871.

MY DEAR MR. PAKENHAM: Dennis C. Murphy, master of the Lizzie A. Tarr, of Gloucester, has stated, under oath, facts in regard to the action of Her Majesty's naval officers toward him on the Newfoundland coast which lead me to apprehend that they are not acting in accordance with wishes and instructions of Her Majesty's government, so far as we are able to judge of those wishes and instructions from the correspondence which has taken place since the conclusion of the treaty of Washington.

The facts stated are that, on the 7th of June last, the Lizzie A. Tarr, being bound on a fishing voyage to the Banks, entered Lambley Harbor, Grand Jarvis, Newfoundland, to buy bait. She was boarded by a boat from the British war steamer Danæ, and was ordered to leave, and refused the privilege of purchasing fresh bait. Captain Murphy inquired as to the authority of such action, but got no reply. He avers that then the British officers tripped the seine then in the hands of English fishermen, and let out the herring, so that no bait could be sold, saying to the fishermen, "What are you doing? If I catch you selling bait to Yankees I will cut up your seine. Where are you to get bread next winter?" Captain Murphy then left the harbor, but as the wind began to blow and rain commenced, he went back for shelter. A boat from the Danæ was lying in wait for him. The officers came on board and showed him a written order from the captain to seize the Lizzie A. Tarr, against which Murphy protested, claiming the right of shelter, but was required to agree in writing to go out at daylight. Murphy declares that this action caused a delay of three weeks, and a loss to all concerned of not less than $2,000.

I would be glad if you would bring the case to the attention of the proper authorities, with a view to the adoption of a more friendly and hospitable treatment of our fishermen, if such conduct shall prove to have been manifested as is reported by Captain Murphy.

Faithfully, yours,

J. C. B. DAVIS,

Protocols of conference between the high commissioners on the part of the United States of America and the high commissioners on the part of Great Britain.

I.—PROTOCOL OF CONFERENCE BETWEEN THE HIGH COMMISSIONERS ON THE PART OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND THE HIGH COMMISSIONERS ON THE PART OF GREAT BRITAIN.

WASHINGTON, February 27, 1871.

The high commissioners having met, their full powers were respectively produced, which were found satisfactory, and copies thereof exchanged, as follows:

ULYSSES S. GRANT, President of the United States of America, to all who shall see these presents, greeting:

Know ye that, reposing special trust and confidence in the integrity and ability of Hamilton Fish, Secretary of State; Robert C. Schenck, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Great Britain; Samuel Nelson, an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States; Ebenezer R. Hoar, of Massachusetts, and George H. Williams, of Oregon, I have nominated and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, do appoint them jointly and severally, to be Commissioners on the part of the United States, in a Joint High Commission between the United States and Great Britain; hereby empowering them, jointly and severally, to meet the Commissioners appointed or to be appointed on behalf of Her Britannic Majesty, and with them to treat and discuss the mode of settlement of the different questions which shall come before the said Joint High Commission, and the said office to hold and exercise during the pleasure of the President of the United States, for the time being.

In testimony whereof I have caused these letters to be made patent, and the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed.

Given under my hand at the city of Washington, this tenth day of February, in the [SEAL.] year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-one, and of the independence of the United States of America the ninety-fifth.

U. S. GRANT.

By the President:

HAMILTON FISH,
Secretary of State.

VICTORIA, REG.—VICTORIA, by the Grace of God, Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c., &c., &c., To All and Singular to whom these Presents shall come, Greeting:

Whereas for the purpose of discussing in a friendly spirit, with Commissioners to be appointed on the part of our Good Friends The United States of America, the various questions on which differences have arisen between Us and Our said Good Friends, and of treating for an Agreement as to the mode of their amicable settlement, We have judged it expedient to invest fit persons with Full Power to conduct on Our Part the discussions in this behalf:—Know Ye, therefore, that We, reposing especial Trust and Confidence in the Wisdom, Loyalty, Diligence, and Circumspection of Our Right Trusty and Right Well-beloved Cousin and Councillor George Frederick Samuel Earl de Grey and Earl of Ripon, Viscount Goderich, Baron Grantham, a Baronet, a Peer of Our United Kingdom, President of our Most Honourable Privy Council, Knight of Our Most Noble Order of the Garter, &c., &c.; of Our Right Trusty and Well-beloved Councillor Sir Stafford Henry Northcote, Baronet, a Member of Parliament, Companion of Our Most Honourable Order of the Bath, &c., &c.; of Our Trusty and Well-beloved Sir Edward Thornton, Knight Commander of Our Most Honourable Order of the Bath, Our Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Our Good Friends The United States of America; of Our Trusty and Well-beloved Sir John Alexander Macdonald, Knight Commander of Our Most Honourable Order of the Bath, a Member of Our Privy Council for Canada, and Minister of Justice and Attorney-General of our Dominion of Canada; and of Our Trusty and Well-beloved Mountague Bernard, Esquire, Chichele Professor of International Law in the University of Oxford; have named, made, constituted, and appointed, as We do by these Presents name, make, constitute, and appoint them Our undoubted High Commissioners, Procurators, and Plenipotentiaries:—Giving to them, or to any three or more of them, all manner of Power and Authority to treat, adjust, and conclude with such Minister or Ministers as may be vested with similar Power and Authority on the part of Our Good Friends The United States of America, any Treaties, Conventions, or Agreements that may tend to the attainment of the abovementioned end, and to sign for Us, and in Our Name, everything so agreed upon and concluded, and to do and transact all such other matters as may appertain to the finishing of the aforesaid work in as ample manner and form, and with equal force and efficacy, as We Ourselves could do, if Personally Present:—Engaging and Promising upon Our Royal Word, that whatever things shall be so transacted and concluded by Our said High Commissioners, Procurators, and Plenipotentiaries, shall be agreed to, acknowledged, and accepted by Us in the fullest manner, and that We will never suffer, either in the whole or in part, any person whatsoever to infringe the same, or act contrary thereto, as far as it lies in Our Power.

In Witness whereof We have caused the Great Seal of Our United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland to be affixed to these Presents, which We have signed with Our Royal Hand.

Given at Our Court at Windsor Castle, the Sixteenth day of February, in the Year of Our Lord One Thousand Eight Hundred and Seventy One, and in the Thirty Fourth Year of our Reign.

It was proposed by the British high commissioners that Mr. Fish, Secretary of State of the United States, should preside.

The United States commissioners stated that, although appreciating the proposal, they did not consider it necessary that a president should be named.

The high commissioners, on the suggestion of Mr. Fish, requested Lord Tenterden, secretary to the British high commission, and Mr. Bancroft Davis, Assistant Secretary of State of the United States, acting as secretary to the United States high commission, to undertake the duties of joint protocolists.

The high commissioners then agreed that the subjects for discussion should be those mentioned in the following correspondence which had taken place between the two governments:

SIR: In compliance with an instruction which I have received from Earl Granville, I have the honor to state that Her Majesty's government deem it of importance to the good relations which they are ever anxious should subsist and be strengthened between the United States and Great Britain, that a friendly and complete understanding should be come to between the two governments as to the extent of the rights which belong to the citizens of the United States and Her Majesty's subjects, respectively, with reference to the fisheries on the coasts of Her Majesty's possessions in North America, and as to any other questions between them which affect the relations of the United States towards those possessions.

As the consideration of these matters would, however, involve investigations of a somewhat complicated nature, and as it is very desirable that they should be thoroughly examined, I am directed by Lord Granville to propose to the Government of the United States the appointment of a joint high commission, which shall be composed of members to be named by each government; shall hold its sessions at Washington, and shall treat of and discuss the mode of settling the different questions which have arisen out of the fisheries, as well as all those which affect the relations of the United States towards Her Majesty's possessions in North America.

I am confident that this proposal will be met by your Government in the same cordial spirit of friendship which has induced Her Majesty's government to tender it, and I cannot doubt that in that case the result will not fail to contribute to the maintenance of the good relations between the two countries, which I am convinced the Government of the United States, as well as that of Her Majesty, equally have at heart.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

EDWARD THORNTON.

HON. HAMILTON FISH, &c., &c.

2. Mr. Fish to Sir Edward Thornton.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 30, 1871.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of January 26, in which you inform me, in compliance with instructions from Earl Granville, that Her Majesty's government deem it of importance to the good relations which they are ever anxious should subsist and be strengthened between the United States and Great Britain, that a friendly and complete understanding should be come to between the two governments as to the extent of the rights which belong to the citizens of the United States and Her Majesty's subjects, respectively, with reference to the fisheries on the coasts of Her Majesty's possessions in North America, and as to any other questions between them which affect the relations of the United States towards those possessions; and, further, that as the consideration of these questions would involve investigations of a somewhat complicated nature, and as it is very desirable that they should be thoroughly examined, you are directed by Lord Granville to propose to the Government of the United States the appointment of a joint high commission, which shall be composed of members to be named by each government; shall hold its sessions at Washington, and shall treat of and discuss the mode of settling the different questions which have arisen out of the fisheries, as well as all those which affect the relations of the United States toward Her Majesty's possessions in North America.

I have laid your note before the President, who instructs me to say that he shares with Her Majesty's government the appreciation of the importance of a friendly and complete understanding between the two governments, with reference to the subjects specially suggested for the consideration of the proposed joint high commission, and he fully recognizes the friendly spirit which has prompted the proposal.

The President is, however, of the opinion that without the adjustment of a class of questions not alluded to in your note, the proposed high commission would fail to establish the permanent relations and the sincere, substantial, and lasting friendship between the two governments which, in common with Her Majesty's government, he desires should prevail.

He thinks that the removal of the differences which arose during the rebellion in the United States, and which have existed since then, growing out of the acts committed by the several vessels which have given rise to the claims generically known as the Alabama claims, will also be essential to the restoration of cordial and amicable relations between the two governments. He directs me to say that should Her Majesty's government accept this view of the matter, and assent that this subject also may be treated of by the proposed high commission, and may thus be put in the way of a final and amicable settlement, this Government will, with much pleasure, appoint high commissioners on the part of the United States, to meet those who may be appointed on behalf of Her Majesty's government, and will spare no efforts to secure, at the earliest practicable moment, a just and amicable arrangement of all the questions which now unfortunately stand in the way of an entire and abiding friendship between the two nations.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir, your obedient servant,
HAMILTON FISH.

Sir EDWARD THORNTON, K. C. B., &c., &c., &c.

3. Sir Edward Thornton to Mr. Fish.

WASHINGTON, February 1, 1871.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 30th ultimo, and to offer you my sincere and cordial thanks for the friendly and conciliatory spirit which pervades it.

With reference to that part of it in which you state that the President thinks that the removal of the differences which arose during the rebellion in the United States, and which have existed since then, growing out of the acts committed by the several vessels which have given rise to the claims generically known as the Alabama claims, will also be essential to the restoration of cordial and amicable relations between the two governments, I have the honor to inform you that I have submitted to Earl Granville the opinion thus expressed by the President of the United States, the friendliness of which, I beg you to believe, I fully appreciate.

I am now authorized by his lordship to state that it would give Her Majesty's government great satisfaction if the claims commonly known by the name of the Alabama claims were submitted to the consideration of the same high commission by which Her Majesty's government have proposed that the questions relating to the British possessions in North America should be discussed, provided that all other claims, both of British subjects and citizens of the United States, arising out of acts committed during the recent civil war in this country, are similarly referred to the same commission. The expressions made use of in the name of the President in your above-mentioned note, with regard to the Alabama claims, convince me that the Government of the United States will consider it of importance that these causes of disputes between the two countries should also, and at the same time, be done away with, and that you will enable me to convey to my government the assent of the President to the addition which they thus propose to the duties of the high commission, and which cannot fail to make it more certain that its labors will lead to the removal of all differences between the two countries.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

EDWARD THORNTON.

Hon. HAMILTON FISH, &c., &c., *&c.*4. Mr. Fish to Sir Edward Thornton.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, February 3, 1871.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 1st instant, in which you inform me that you are authorized by Earl Granville to state that it would give Her Majesty's government great satisfaction if the claims commonly known by the name of the "Alabama claims" were submitted to the consideration of the same high commission by which Her Majesty's government have proposed that the questions relating to the British possessions in North America should be discussed, provided that all other claims, both of British subjects and citizens of the United States, arising out of acts committed during the recent civil war in this country, are similarly referred to the same commission.

I have laid your note before the President, and he has directed me to express the satisfaction with which he has received the intelligence that Earl Granville has authorized you to state that Her Majesty's government has accepted the views of this Government as to the disposition to be made of the so-called "Alabama claims."

He also directs me to say, with reference to the remainder of your note, that if there be other and further claims of British subjects, or of American citizens, growing out of acts committed during the recent civil war in this country, he assents to the propriety of their reference to the same high commission; but he suggests that the high commissioners shall consider only such claims of this description as may be presented by the governments of the respective claimants at an early day, to be agreed upon by the commissioners.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir, your obedient servant,
HAMILTON FISH.

Sir EDWARD THORNTON, K. C. B., &c., &c., &c.

The commissioners further determined that the discussion might include such other matters as might be mutually agreed upon.

The meeting of the high commissioners was then adjourned to the 4th of March.

The American commissioners produced the following further full power, under the seal of the United States, authorizing them to conclude and sign a treaty:

ULYSSES S. GRANT, President of the United States of America, to all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

Know ye that whereas, by my power, bearing date the 10th day of February last, Hamilton Fish, Secretary of State, Robert C. Schenck, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Great Britain, Samuel Nelson, an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, Ebenezer R. Hoar, of Massachusetts, and George H. Williams, of Oregon, were authorized to meet the commissioners appointed, or to be appointed, on behalf of Her Britannic Majesty, and with them to treat and discuss the mode of settlement of the different questions which should come before them;

And whereas that meeting and discussion have taken place, and the said mode of settlement has been agreed upon:

Now, therefore, I, Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States, do hereby appoint the said Hamilton Fish, Robert C. Schenck, Samuel Nelson, Ebenezer R. Hoar, and George H. Williams, jointly and severally, plenipotentiaries for and in behalf of the United States, and do authorize them, and any or either of them, to conclude and sign any treaty or treaties touching the premises, for the final ratification of the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, if such advice and consent be given.

In witness whereof I have caused the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed.

Given under my hand at the city of Washington, the second day of May, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-one, and of the Independence of the United States of America the ninety-fifth.

[SEAL.]

By the President:

HAMILTON FISH,
Secretary of State.

U. S. GRANT.

This full power was examined by the British commissioners and found satisfactory.

The joint high commissioners determined that they would embody in a protocol a statement containing an account of the negotiations upon the various subjects included in the treaty, and they instructed the joint protocolists to prepare such an account in the order in which the subjects are to stand in the treaty.

The conference was adjourned to the 4th of May.

STATEMENTS.

ARTICLES I TO XL.

At the conference held on the 8th of March the American commissioners stated that the people and Government of the United States felt that they had sustained a great wrong, and that great injuries and losses were inflicted upon their commerce and their material interests by the course and conduct of Great Britain during the recent rebellion in the United States; that what had occurred in Great Britain and her colonies during that period had given rise to feelings in the United States which the people of the United States did not desire to cherish toward Great Britain; that the history of the Alabama, and other cruisers, which had been fitted out, or armed, or equipped, or which had received augmentation of force in Great Britain, or in her colonies, and of the operations of those vessels, showed extensive direct losses in the capture and destruction of a large number of vessels, with their cargoes, and in the heavy national expenditures in the pursuit of the cruisers, and indirect injury in the transfer of a large part of the American commercial marine to the British flag, in the enhanced payments of insurance, in the prolongation of the war, and in the addition of a large sum to the cost of the war and the suppression of the rebellion, and also showed that Great Britain, by reason of failure in the proper observance of her duties as a neutral, had become justly liable for the acts of those cruisers and of their tenders; that the claims for the loss and destruction of private property which had thus far been presented amounted to about fourteen millions of dollars, without interest, which amount was liable to be greatly increased by claims which had not been presented; that the cost to which the Government had been put in the pursuit of cruisers could easily be ascertained by certificates of Government accounting officers; that in the hope of an amicable settlement, no estimate was made of the indirect losses, without prejudice, however, to the right to indemnification on their account in the event of no such settlement being made.

The American commissioners further stated that they hoped that the British commissioners would be able to place upon record an expression of regret by Her Majesty's government for the depredations committed by the vessels whose acts were now under discussion. They also proposed that the joint high commission should agree upon a sum which should be paid by Great Britain to the United States in satisfaction of all the claims and the interest thereon.

The British commissioners replied that Her Majesty's government could not admit that Great Britain had failed to discharge toward the United States the duties imposed on her by the rules of international law, or that she was justly liable to make good to the United States the losses occasioned by the acts of the cruisers to which the American commissioners had referred. They reminded the American commissioners that several vessels, suspected of being designed to cruise against the United States, including two iron-clads, had been arrested or detained by the British government, and that that government had in some instances not confined itself to the discharge of international obligations, however widely construed, as, for instance, when it acquired, at a great cost to the country, the control of the Anglo-Chinese Flotilla, which, it was apprehended, might be used against the United States.

They added that although Great Britain had, from the beginning, disavowed any responsibility for the acts of the Alabama, and the other vessels, she had already shown her willingness, for the sake of the maintenance of friendly relations with the United States, to adopt the principle of arbitration, provided that a fitting arbitrator could be found, and that an agreement could be come to as to the points to which arbitration should apply. They would, therefore, abstain from replying in detail to the statement of the American commissioners, in the hope that the necessity for entering upon a lengthened controversy might be obviated by the adoption of so fair a mode of settlement as that which they were instructed to propose; and they had now to repeat, on behalf of their government, the offer of arbitration.

The American commissioners expressed their regret at this decision of the British commissioners, and said further that they could not consent to submit the question of the liability of Her Majesty's government to arbitration unless the principles which should govern the arbitrator in the consideration of the facts could be first agreed upon.

The British commissioners replied that they had no authority to agree to a submission of these claims to an arbitrator with instructions as to the principles which should govern him in the consideration of them. They said that they should be willing to consider what principles should be adopted for observance in future; but that they were of opinion that the best mode of conducting an arbitration was to submit the facts to the arbitrator, and leave him free to decide upon them after hearing such arguments as might be necessary.

The American commissioners replied that they were willing to consider what principles should be laid down for observance in similar cases in future, with the understanding that any principles that should be agreed upon should be held to be applicable to the facts in respect to the Alabama claims.

The British commissioners replied that they could not admit that there had been any violation of existing principles of international law, and that their instructions did not authorize them to accede to a proposal for laying down rules for the guidance of the arbitrator; but that they would make known to their government the views of the American commissioners on the subject.

At the respective conferences on March 9, March 10, March 13, and March 14, the joint high commission considered the form of the declaration of principles or rules which the American commissioners desired to see adopted for the instruction of the arbitrator, and laid down for observance by the two governments in future.

At the close of the conference of the 14th of March the British commissioners reserved several questions for the consideration of their government.

At the conference on the 5th of April the British commissioners stated that they were instructed by Her Majesty's government to declare that Her Majesty's government could not assent to the proposed rules as a statement of principles of international law which were in force at the time when the Alabama claims arose, but that Her Majesty's government, in order to evince its desire of strengthening the friendly relations between the two countries, and of making satisfactory provision for the future, agreed that in deciding the questions between the two countries arising out of those claims, the arbitrator should assume that Her Majesty's government had undertaken to act upon the principles set forth in the rules which the American commissioners had proposed, viz:

That a neutral government is bound, first, to use due diligence to prevent the fitting out, arming, or equipping, within its jurisdiction, of any vessel which it has reasonable ground to believe is intended to cruise or carry on war against a power with which it is at peace; and also to use like diligence to prevent the departure from its jurisdiction of any vessel intended to cruise or carry on war as above, such vessel having been specially adapted, in whole or in part, within such jurisdiction, to warlike use.

Secondly. Not to permit or suffer either belligerent to make use of its ports or waters as the base of naval operations against the other, or for the purpose of the renewal or augmentation of military supplies or arms, or the recruitment of men.

Thirdly. To exercise due diligence in its own ports or waters, and as to all persons within its jurisdiction, to prevent any violation of the foregoing obligations and duties.

It being a condition of this undertaking, that these obligations should in future be held to be binding internationally between the two countries.

It was also settled that in deciding the matters submitted to him the arbitrator should be governed by the foregoing rules, which had been agreed upon as rules to be taken as applicable to the case, and by such principles of international law, not inconsistent therewith, as the arbitrator should determine to have been applicable to the case.

The Joint High Commission then proceeded to consider the form of submission and the manner of constituting a tribunal of arbitration.

At the conferences on the 6th, 8th, 9th, 10th, and 12th of April the Joint High Commission considered and discussed the form of submission, the manner of the award, and the mode of selecting the arbitrators.

The American commissioners, referring to the hope which they had expressed on the 8th of March, inquired whether the British commissioners were prepared to place upon record an expression of regret by Her Majesty's government for the depredations committed by the vessels whose acts were now under discussion; and the British commissioners replied that they were authorized to express, in a friendly spirit, the regret felt by Her Majesty's government for the escape, under whatever circumstances, of the Alabama and other vessels from British ports, and for the depredations committed by those vessels.

The American commissioners accepted this expression of regret as very satisfactory to them and as a token of kindness, and said that they felt sure it would be so received by the Government and people of the United States.

In the conference on the 13th of April the treaty articles I to XI were agreed to.

ARTICLES XII TO XVII.

At the conference on the 4th of March it was agreed to consider the subjects referred to the joint high commission by the respective governments in the order in which they appeared in the correspondence between Sir Edward Thornton and Mr. Fish, and to defer the consideration of the adjustment of "all other claims, both of British subjects and citizens of the United States, arising out of acts committed during the recent civil war in this country," as described by Sir Edward Thornton in his letter of February 1, until the subjects referred to in the previous letters should have been disposed of.

The American commissioners said that they supposed that they were right in their opinion that British laws prohibit British subjects from owning slaves; they therefore inquired whether any claim for slaves, or for alleged property or interest in slaves, can or will be presented by the British government, or in behalf of any British subject, under the treaty now being negotiated, if there be in the treaty no express words excluding such claims.

The British commissioners replied that by the law of England British subjects had long been prohibited from purchasing or dealing in slaves, not only within the dominions of the British crown but in any foreign country; and that they had no hesitation in saying that no claim on behalf of any British subject, for slaves or for any property or interest in slaves, would be presented by the British government.

Referring to the paragraph in Sir Edward Thornton's letter of January 26, relating to "the mode of settling the different questions which have arisen out of the fisheries, as well as all those which affect the relations of the United States towards Her Majesty's possessions in North America," the British commissioners proposed that the joint high commission should consider the claims for injuries which the people of Canada had suffered from what were known as the Fenian raids.

The American commissioners objected to this, and it was agreed that the subject might be brought up again by the British commissioners in connection with the subjects referred to by Sir Edward Thornton in his letter of February 1.

At the conference on the 14th of April the joint high commission took into consideration the subjects mentioned by Sir Edward Thornton in that letter.

The British commissioners proposed that a commission for the consideration of these claims should be appointed, and that the convention of 1853 should be followed as a precedent. This was agreed to, except that it was settled that there should be a third commissioner instead of an umpire.

At the conference on the 15th of April, the treaty articles XII to XVII were agreed to.

At the conference on the 26th of April the British commissioners again brought before the joint high commission the claims of the people of Canada for injuries suffered from the Fenian raids. They said that they were instructed to present these claims and to state that they were regarded by Her Majesty's government as coming within the class of subjects indicated by Sir Edward Thornton in his letter of January 26, as subjects for the consideration of the joint high commission.

The American commissioners replied that they were instructed to say that the Government of the United States did not regard these claims as coming within the class of subjects indicated in that letter as subjects for the consideration of the joint high commission, and that they were without any authority from their Government to consider them. They therefore declined to do so.

The British commissioners stated that, as the subject was understood not to be within the scope of the instructions of the American commissioners, they must refer to their government for further instructions upon it.

At the conference on the 3d of May the British commissioners stated that they were instructed by their government to express their regret that the American commissioners were without authority to deal with the question of the Fenian raids, and they inquired whether that was still the case.

The American commissioners replied that they could see no reason to vary the reply formerly given to this proposal; that in their view the subject was not embraced in the scope of the correspondence between Sir Edward Thornton and Mr. Fish under either of the letters of the former; and that they did not feel justified in entering upon the consideration of any class of claims not contemplated at the time of the creation of the present commission, and that the claims now referred to did not commend themselves to their favor.

The British high commissioners said that under these circumstances they would not urge further that the settlement of these claims should be included in the present treaty, and that they had the less difficulty in doing so, as a portion of the claims were of a constructive and inferential character.

ARTICLES XVIII to XXV.

At the conference on the 6th of March the British commissioners stated that they were prepared to discuss the question of the fisheries, either in detail or generally, so as either to enter into an examination of the respective rights of the two countries under the treaty of 1818 and the general law of nations, or to approach at once the settlement of the question on a comprehensive basis.

The American commissioners said that with the view of avoiding the discussion of matters which subsequent negotiation might render it unnecessary to enter into, they thought it would be preferable to adopt the latter course, and inquired what, in that case, would be the basis which the British commissioners desired to propose.

The British commissioners replied that they considered that the reciprocity treaty of June 5, 1854, should be restored in principle.

The American commissioners declined to assent to a renewal of the former reciprocity treaty.

The British commissioners then suggested that, if any considerable modification were made in the tariff arrangements of that treaty, the coasting trade of the United States and of Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America should be reciprocally thrown open, and that the navigation of the river St. Lawrence and of the Canadian canals should be also thrown open to the citizens of the United States on terms of equality with British subjects.

The American commissioners declined this proposal, and objected to a negotiation on the basis of the reciprocity treaty. They said that that treaty had proved unsatisfactory to the people of the United States, and consequently had been terminated by notice from the Government of the United States, in pursuance of its provisions. Its renewal was not in their interest, and would not be in accordance with the sentiments of their people. They further said that they were not at liberty to treat of the opening of the coasting trade of the United States to the subjects of Her Majesty residing in her possessions in North America. It was agreed that the questions relating to the navigation of the river St. Lawrence, and of the Canadian canals, and to other commercial questions affecting Canada, should be treated by themselves.

The subject of the fisheries was further discussed at the conferences on the 7th, 20th, 22d, and 25th of March. The American commissioners stated that if the value of the inshore fisheries could be ascertained, the United States might prefer to purchase, for a sum of money, the right to enjoy, in perpetuity, the use of these inshore fisheries in common with British fishermen, and mentioned one million dollars as the sum they were prepared to offer. The British commissioners replied that this offer was, they thought, wholly inadequate, and that no arrangement would be acceptable of which the admission into the United States free of duty of fish, the produce of the British fisheries, did not form a part, adding that any arrangement for the acquisition by purchase of the inshore fisheries in perpetuity was open to grave objection.

The American commissioners inquired whether it would be necessary to refer any arrangement for purchase to the colonial or provincial Parliaments.

The British commissioners explained that the fisheries within the limits of maritime jurisdiction were the property of the several British colonies, and that it would be necessary to refer any arrangement which might affect colonial property or rights to the colonial or provincial Parliaments; and that legislation would also be required on the part of the imperial Parliament. During these discussions the British commissioners contended that these inshore fisheries were of great value, and that the most satisfactory arrangement for their use would be a reciprocal tariff arrangement, and reciprocity in the coasting trade; and the American commissioners replied that their value was overestimated; that the United States desired to secure their enjoyment, not for their commercial or intrinsic value, but for the purpose of removing a source of irritation; and that they could hold out no hope that the Congress of the United States would give its assent to such a tariff arrangement as was proposed, or to any extended plan of reciprocal free admission of the products of the two countries; but that, inasmuch as one branch of Congress had recently, more than once, expressed itself in favor of the abolition of duties on coal and salt, they would propose that coal, salt, and fish be reciprocally admitted free; and that, inasmuch as Congress had removed the duty from a portion of the lumber heretofore subject to duty, and as the tendency of legislation in the United States was toward the reduction of taxation and of duties in proportion to the reduction of the public debt and expenses, they would further propose that lumber be admitted free from duty from and after the first of July, 1874, subject to the approval of Congress, which was necessary on all questions affecting import duties.

The British commissioners, at the conference on the 17th of April, stated that they had referred this offer to their government, and were instructed to inform the American commissioners that it was regarded as inadequate, and that Her Majesty's government considered that free lumber should be granted at once, and that the proposed tariff concessions should be supplemented by a money payment.

The American commissioners then stated that they withdrew the proposal which they had previously made of the reciprocal free admission of coal, salt, and fish, and of lumber after July 1, 1874; that that proposal had been made entirely in the interest of a peaceful settlement, and for the purpose of removing a source of irritation and of anxiety; that its value had been beyond the commercial or intrinsic value of the rights to have been acquired in return; and that they could not consent to an arrangement on the basis now proposed by the British commissioners; and they renewed their proposal to pay a money equivalent for the use of the inshore fisheries. They further proposed that, in case the two governments should not be able to agree upon the sum to be paid as such an equivalent, the matter should be referred to an impartial commission for determination.

The British commissioners replied that this proposal was one on which they had no instructions, and that it would not be possible for them to come to any arrangement except one for a term of years and involving the concession of free fish and fish-oil by the American commissioners, but that if free fish and fish-oil were conceded they would inquire of their government whether they were prepared to assent to a reference to arbitration as to money payment.

The American commissioners replied that they were willing, subject to the action of Congress, to concede free fish and fish-oil as an equivalent for the use of the inshore fisheries, and to make the arrangement for a term of years; that they were of opinion that free fish and fish-oil would be more than an equivalent for those fisheries, but that they were also willing to agree to a reference to determine that question and the amount of any money payment that might be found necessary to complete an equivalent, it being understood that legislation would be needed before any payment could be made.

The subject was further discussed in the conferences of April 18 and 19, and the British commissioners having referred the last proposal to their government and received instructions to accept it, the treaty articles XVIII to XXV were agreed to at the conference on the 22d of April.

ARTICLES XXVII TO XXXIII.

At the conference on the 6th of March the British commissioners propose that the reciprocity treaty of June 5, 1854, should be restored in principle, and that, if any considerable modifications in the tariff arrangements in force under it were made, the coasting trade of the United States and of Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America should be reciprocally thrown open, and that the navigation of the river St. Lawrence and of the Canadian canals should be thrown open to the citizens of the United States on terms of equality with British subjects.

The American commissioners declined this proposal, and in the subsequent negotiations the question of the fisheries was treated by itself.

At the conference on the 17th of March the joint high commission considered the subject of the American improvement of the navigation of the St. Clair Flats.

At the conference on the 18th of March the questions of the navigation of the river St. Lawrence and the canals and the other subjects connected therewith were taken up.

The American commissioners proposed to take into consideration the question of transit of goods in bond through Canada and the United States, which was agreed to.

The British commissioners proposed to take into consideration the question of opening the coasting trade of the lakes reciprocally to each party, which was declined.

On the proposal of the British commissioners it was agreed to take the question of transshipment into consideration.

The British commissioners proposed to take into consideration the reciprocal registration of vessels, as between the Dominion of Canada and the United States, which was declined.

At the conference on the 23d of March the transshipment question was discussed and postponed for further information, on the motion of the American commissioners.

The transit question was discussed, and it was agreed that any settlement that might be made should include a reciprocal arrangement in that respect for the period for which the fishery articles should be in force.

The question of the navigation of the river St. Lawrence and the canals was taken up.

The British commissioners stated that they regarded the concession of the navigation of Lake Michigan as an equivalent for the concession of the navigation of the river St. Lawrence.

As to the canals, they stated that the concession of the privilege to navigate them in their present condition, on terms of equality with British subjects, was a much greater concession than the corresponding use of the canals offered by the United States.

They further said that the enlargement of the canals would involve the expenditure of a large amount of money, and they asked what equivalent the American commissioners proposed to give for the surrender of the right to control the tolls for the use of the canals, either in their present state or after enlargement.

The American commissioners replied, that unless the Welland Canal should be enlarged so as to accommodate the present course of trade, they should not be disposed to make any concessions; that in their opinion the citizens of the United States could now justly claim to navigate the river St. Lawrence in its natural state, ascending and descending, from the forty-fifth parallel of north latitude, where it ceases to form the boundary between the two countries, from, to, and into the sea; and they could not concede that the navigation of Lake Michigan should be given or taken as an equivalent for that right; and they thought that the concession of the navigation of Lake Michigan and of the canals offered by them was more than an equivalent for the concessions as to the Canadian canals which were asked. They proposed, in connection with a reciprocal arrangement as to transit and transshipment, that Canada should agree to enlarge the Welland and St. Lawrence Canals, to make no discriminating tolls, and to limit the tolls to rates sufficient to maintain the canals, pay a reasonable interest on the cost of construction and enlargement, and raise a sinking fund for the repaying within a reasonable time the cost of enlargement; and that the navigation of the river St. Lawrence, the Canadian canals, the canals offered by the United States, and Lake Michigan should be enjoyed reciprocally by citizens of the United States and by British subjects. This proposal was declined by the British commissioners, who repeated that they did not regard the equivalent offered by the United States as at all commensurate with the concessions asked from Great Britain.

At the conference on the 27th of March the proposed enlargement of the Canadian canals was further discussed. It was stated on the part of the British commissioners that the Canadian government were now considering the expediency of enlarging the capacity of the canals on the river St. Lawrence, and had already provided for the enlargement of the Welland Canal, which would be undertaken without delay.

The subject of the export duty in New Brunswick on American lumber floated down the river St. John was proposed for consideration by the American commissioners.

At the conference on the 22d of April the British commissioners proposed that the navigation of Lake Michigan should be given in exchange for the navigation of the river St. Lawrence; and that Her Majesty's government should agree to urge upon the Dominion of Canada to give to the citizens of the United States the use of the Canadian canals on terms of equality with British subjects; and that the Government of the United States should agree to urge upon the several States to give to British subjects the use of the several State canals on terms of equality with citizens of the United States. They also proposed, as part of the arrangement, a reciprocal agreement as to transit and transshipment, and that the government of Great Britain should urge upon New Brunswick not to impose export duties on the lumber floated down the river St. John for shipment to the United States.

The American commissioners repeated their views as to the navigation of the river St. Lawrence in its natural state.

The British commissioners replied that they could not admit the claims of American citizens to navigate the river St. Lawrence as of right; but that the British government had no desire to exclude them from it. They, however, pointed out that there were certain rivers running through Alaska which should on like grounds be declared free and open to British subjects, in case the river St. Lawrence should be declared free.

The American commissioners replied that they were prepared to consider that question. They also assented to the arrangement as to the canals, which was proposed by the British commissioners, limiting it, as regarded American canals, to the canals connected with the navigation of the lakes or rivers traversed by or contiguous to the boundary line between the British and American possessions. They likewise agreed to give the right of navigating Lake Michigan for a term of years. They desired, and it was agreed, that the transshipment arrangement should be made dependent upon the non-existence of discriminating tolls or regulations on the Canadian canals, and also upon the abolition of the New Brunswick export duty on American lumber intended for the United States. It was also agreed that the right of carrying should be made dependent upon the non-imposition of export duties on either side on the goods of the other party passing in transit.

The discussion of these subjects was further continued at the conferences of the 24th, 25th, and 26th of April, and the treaty articles XXVI to XXXIII were agreed to at the conference on the 3d of May.

In the course of these discussions, the British commissioners called attention to the question of the survey of the boundary line along the forty-ninth parallel, which still remained unexecuted from the Lake of the Woods to the Rocky Mountains, and to which reference had been made in the President's message.

The American commissioners stated that the survey was a matter for administrative action, and did not require to be dealt with by a treaty provision. The United States Government would be prepared to agree with the British government for the appointment of a boundary survey commission in the same manner as has been done in regard to the remainder of the boundary along the forty-ninth parallel as soon as the legislative appropriations and other necessary arrangements could be made.

ARTICLES XXXIV TO XLII.

At the conference on the 15th of March the British commissioners stated that it was proposed that day to take up the northwest water boundary question; that the difference was one of long standing, which had more than once been the subject of negotiations between the two governments, and that the negotiators had, in January, 1869, agreed upon a treaty. They then proposed that an arbitration of this question should be made upon the basis of the provisions of that treaty.

The American commissioners replied, that though no formal vote was actually taken upon it, it was well understood that that treaty had not been favorably regarded by the Senate. They declined the proposal of the British commissioners, and expressed their wish that an effort should be made to settle the question in the joint high commission.

The British commissioners assented to this, and presented the reasons which induced them to regard the Rosario Straits as the channel contemplated by the treaty of June 15, 1846.

The American commissioners replied, and presented the reasons which induced them to regard the Haro Channel as the channel contemplated by that treaty. They also produced, in support of their views, some original correspondence of Mr. Everett with his government, which had not been alluded to in previous discussions of the question.

The British commissioners replied that they saw in that correspondence no reason to induce them to change the opinion which they had previously expressed. They then asked whether the American commissioners had any further proposal to make.

The American commissioners replied that, in view of the position taken by the British commissioners, it appeared that the treaty of June 15, 1846, might have been made under a mutual misunderstanding, and would not have been made had each party understood at that time the construction which the other party puts upon the language whose interpretation is in dispute; they therefore proposed to abrogate the whole of that part of the treaty, and rearrange the boundary line which was in dispute before that treaty was concluded.

The British commissioners replied, that the proposal to abrogate a treaty was one of a serious character, and that they had no instructions which would enable them to entertain it; and, at the conference on the 20th of March, the British commissioners declined the proposal.

At the conference on the 19th of April, the British commissioners proposed to the American commissioners to adopt the Middle Channel (generally known as the Douglas Channel) as the channel through which the boundary line should be run, with the understanding that all the channels through the Archipelago should be free and common to both parties.

The American commissioners declined to entertain that proposal. They proposed that the joint high commission should recognize the Haro Channel as the channel intended by the treaty of June 15, 1846, with a mutual agreement that no fortifications should be erected by either party to obstruct or command it, and with proper provisions as to any existing proprietary rights of British subjects in the island of San Juan.

The British commissioners declined this proposal, and stated that, being convinced of the justice of their view of the treaty, they could not abandon it except after a fair decision by an impartial arbitrator. They therefore renewed their proposal for a reference to arbitration, and hoped that it would be seriously considered.

The American commissioners replied, that they had hoped that their last proposal would be accepted. As it had been declined, they would, should the other questions between the two governments be satisfactorily adjusted, agree to a reference to arbitration to determine whether the line should run through the Haro Channel or through the Rosario Straits, upon the condition that either government should have the right to include in the evidence to be considered by the arbitrator such documents, official correspondence, and other official or public statements, bearing on the subject of the reference, as they may consider necessary to the support of their respective cases. This condition was agreed to.

The British commissioners proposed that the arbitrator should have the right to draw the boundary through an intermediate channel. The American commissioners declined this proposal, stating that they desired a decision, not a compromise.

The British commissioners proposed that it should be declared to be the proper construction of the treaty of 1846 that all the channels were to be open to navigation by both parties. The American commissioners stated that they did not so construe the treaty of 1846, and therefore could not assent to such a declaration.

The discussion of this subject was continued during this conference, and in the conference of the 22d of April the Treaty Articles XXXIV to XLII were agreed to.

The joint high commissioners approved this statement, and directed it to be entered in the protocol.

The conference was adjourned to the 6th of May.

XXXVII.—PROTOCOL OF CONFERENCE BETWEEN THE HIGH COMMISSIONERS ON THE PART OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND THE HIGH COMMISSIONERS ON THE PART OF GREAT BRITAIN.

WASHINGTON, May 6, 1871.

The high commissioners having met, the protocol of the conference held on the 4th of May was read and confirmed.

Lord de Grey said, that as the joint high commission would not meet again after to day, except for the purpose of signing the treaty, he desired on behalf of himself and his colleagues to express their high appreciation of the manner in which Mr. Fish and his American colleagues had, on their side, conducted the negotiations. It had been most gratifying to the British commissioners to be associated with colleagues who were animated with the same sincere desire as themselves to bring about a settlement, equally honorable and just to both countries, of the various questions of which it had been their duty to treat, and the British commissioners would always retain a grateful recollection of the fair and friendly spirit which the American commissioners had displayed.

Mr. Fish, in behalf of the American commissioners, said that they were gratefully sensible of the friendly words expressed by Lord de Grey, and of the kind spirit which had prompted them. From the date of the first conference the American commissioners had been impressed by the earnestness of desire manifested by the British commissioners to reach a settlement worthy of the two powers who had committed to this joint high commission the treatment of various questions of peculiar interest, complexity, and delicacy. His colleagues and he could never cease to appreciate the generous spirit and the open and friendly manner in which the British commissioners had met and discussed the several questions that had led to the conclusion of a treaty which it was hoped would receive the approval of the people of both countries, and would prove the foundation of a cordial and friendly understanding between them for all time to come.

Mr. Fish further said that he was sure that every member of the joint high commission would desire to record his appreciation of the ability, the zeal, and the unceasing labor which the joint protocolists had exhibited in the discharge of their arduous and responsible duties, and that he knew that he only gave expression to the feelings of the commissioners in saying that Lord Tenterden and Mr. Bancroft Davis were entitled to, and were requested to accept, the thanks of the joint high commission for their valuable services, and the great assistance which they had rendered with unvarying obligingness to the commission.

Lord de Grey replied, on behalf of the British commissioners, that he and his colleagues most cordially concurred in the proposal made by Mr. Fish that the thanks of the joint high commission should be tendered to Mr. Bancroft Davis and Lord Tenterden for their valuable services as joint protocolists. The British commissioners were also quite as sensitive as their American colleagues of the great advantage which the commission had derived from the assistance which those gentlemen had given them in the conduct of the important negotiations in which they had been engaged.

Monday, the 8th of May, was appointed for the signatures of the treaty.

No. 236.

Treaty between the United States and Great Britain.—Claims, fisheries, navigation of the St. Lawrence, &c., American lumber on the river St. John, boundary.—Concluded May 8, 1871; ratifications exchanged June 17, 1871; proclaimed July 4, 1871.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas a treaty, between the United States of America and Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, concerning the settlement of all causes of difference between the two countries, was concluded and signed at Washington by the high commissioners and plenipotentiaries of the respective governments on the eighth day of May last; which treaty is, word for word, as follows:

The United States of America and Her Britannic Majesty, being desirous to provide for an amicable settlement of all causes of difference between the two countries, have for that purpose appointed their respective plenipotentiaries, that is to say: the President of the United States has appointed, on the part of the United States, as commissioners in a joint high commission and plenipotentiaries, Hamilton Fish, Secretary of State; Robert Cumming Schenck, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Great Britain; Samuel Nelson, an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States; Ebenezer Rockwood Hoar, of Massachusetts; and George Henry Williams, of Oregon; and her Britannic Majesty, on her part, has appointed as her high commissioners and plenipotentiaries, the Right Honorable George Frederick Samuel, Earl de Grey and Earl of Ripon, Viscount Goderich, Baron Grantham, a Baronet, a Peer of the United Kingdom, Lord President of Her Majesty's Most Honorable Privy Council, Knight of the Most Noble Order of the Garter, &c., &c., the Right Honorable Sir Stafford Henry Northcote, Baronet, one of Her Majesty's Most Honorable Privy Council, a Member of Parliament, a Companion of the Most Honorable Order of the Bath, &c., &c., Sir Edward Thornton, Knight Commander of the Most Honorable Order of the Bath, Her Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to the United States of America; Sir John Alexander Macdonald, Knight Commander of the Most Honorable Order of the Bath, a member of Her Majesty's Privy Council for Canada, and Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Her Majesty's Dominion of Canada; and Montague Bernard, Esquire, Chichele Professor of International Law in the University of Oxford.

And the said plenipotentiaries, after having exchanged their full powers, which were found to be in due and proper form, have agreed to and concluded the following articles:

ARTICLE I.

Whereas differences have arisen between the Government of the United States and the government of Her Britannic Majesty, and still exist, growing out of the acts committed by the several vessels which have given rise to the claims generically known as the "Alabama claims:"

And whereas Her Britannic Majesty has authorized her high commissioners and plenipotentiaries to express, in a friendly spirit, the regret felt by Her Majesty's government for the escape, under whatever circumstances, of the Alabama and other vessels from British ports, and for the depredations committed by those vessels:

Now, in order to remove and adjust all complaints and claims on the part of the United States, and to provide for the speedy settlement of such claims, which are not admitted by Her Britannic Majesty's government, the high contracting parties agree that all the said claims, growing out of acts committed by the aforesaid vessels, and generically known as the "Alabama claims," shall be referred to a tribunal of arbitration to be composed of five arbitrators, to be appointed in the following manner, that is to say: one shall be named by the President of the United States; one shall be named by Her Britannic Majesty; His Majesty the King of Italy shall be requested to name one; the President of the Swiss Confederation shall be requested to name one; and His Majesty the Emperor of Brazil shall be requested to name one.

In case of the death, absence, or incapacity to serve of any or either of the said arbitrators, or in the event of either of the said arbitrators omitting or declining or ceasing to act as such, the President of the United States, or Her Britannic Majesty, or His Majesty the King of Italy, or the President of the Swiss Confederation, or His Majesty the Emperor of Brazil, as the case may be, may forthwith name another person to act as arbitrator in the place and stead of the arbitrator originally named by such head of a state.

And in the event of the refusal or omission for two months after receipt of the request from either of the high contracting parties of His Majesty the King of Italy, or the President of the Swiss Confederation, or His Majesty the Emperor of Brazil, to name an arbitrator either to fill the original appointment or in the place of one who may have died, be absent, or incapacitated, or who may omit, decline, or from any cause cease to act as such arbitrator, His Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway shall be requested to name one or more persons, as the case may be, to act as such arbitrator or arbitrators.

ARTICLE II.

The arbitrators shall meet at Geneva, in Switzerland, at the earliest convenient day after they shall have been named, and shall proceed impartially and carefully to examine and decide all questions that shall be laid before them on the part of the Governments of the United States and Her Britannic Majesty respectively. All questions considered by the tribunal, including the final award, shall be decided by a majority of all the arbitrators.

Each of the high contracting parties shall also name one person to attend the Tribunal as its agent to represent it generally in all matters connected with the arbitration.

ARTICLE III.

The written or printed case of each of the two parties, accompanied by the documents, the official correspondence, and other evidence on which each relies, shall be delivered in duplicate to each of the arbitrators and to the agent of the other party as soon as may be after the organization of the tribunal, but within a period not exceeding six months from the date of the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty.

ARTICLE IV.

Within four months after the delivery on both sides of the written or printed case, either party may, in like manner, deliver in duplicate to each of the said arbitrators, and to the agent of the other party, a counter case and additional documents, correspondence, and evidence in reply to the case, documents, correspondence, and evidence so presented by the other party.

The arbitrators may, however, extend the time for delivering such counter case, documents, correspondence, and evidence, when, in their judgment, it becomes necessary, in consequence of the distance of the place from which the evidence to be presented is to be procured.

If in the case submitted to the arbitrators either party shall have specified or alluded to any report or document in its own exclusive possession without annexing a copy, such party shall be bound, if the other party thinks proper to apply for it, to furnish that party with a copy thereof; and either party may call upon the other, through the arbitrators, to produce the originals or certified copies of any papers adduced as evidence, giving in each instance such reasonable notice as the arbitrators may require.

ARTICLE V.

It shall be the duty of the agent of each party, within two months after the expiration of the time limited for the delivery of the counter case on both sides, to deliver in duplicate to each of the said arbitrators and to the agent of the other party a written or printed argument showing the points and referring to the evidence upon which his Government relies; and the arbitrators may, if they desire further elucidation with regard to any point, require a written or printed statement or argument, or oral argument by counsel upon it; but in such case the other party shall be entitled to reply, either orally or in writing, as the case may be.

ARTICLE VI.

In deciding the matters submitted to the arbitrators, they shall be governed by the following three rules, which are agreed upon by the high contracting parties as rules to be taken as applicable to the case, and by such principles of international law not inconsistent therewith as the arbitrators shall determine to have been applicable to the case.

RULES.

A neutral government is bound—

First, to use due diligence to prevent the fitting out, arming, or equipping, within its jurisdiction of any vessel which it has reasonable ground to believe is intended to cruise or to carry on war against a power with which it is at peace; and also to use like diligence to prevent the departure from its jurisdiction of any vessel intended to cruise or carry on war as above, such vessel having been specially adapted; in whole or in part, within such jurisdiction, to warlike use.

Secondly, not to permit or suffer either belligerent to make use of its ports or waters as the base of naval operations against the other, or for the purpose of the renewal or augmentation of military supplies or arms, or the recruitment of men.

Thirdly, to exercise due diligence in its own ports and waters, and, as to all persons within its jurisdiction, to prevent any violation of the foregoing obligations and duties.

Her Britannic Majesty has commanded her high commissioners and plenipotentiaries to declare that Her Majesty's government cannot assent to the foregoing rules as a statement of principles of international law which were in force at the time when the claims mentioned in article I arose, but that Her Majesty's government, in order to evince its desire of strengthening the friendly relations between the two countries and of making satisfactory provision for the future, agrees that in deciding the questions between the two countries arising out of those claims, the arbitrators should assume that Her Majesty's government had undertaken to act upon the principles set forth in these rules.

And the high contracting parties agree to observe these rules as between themselves in future, and to bring them to the knowledge of other maritime powers, and to invite them to accede to them.

ARTICLE VII.

The decision of the tribunal shall, if possible, be made within three months from the close of the argument on both sides.

It shall be made in writing and dated, and shall be signed by the arbitrators who may assent to it.

The said tribunal shall first determine as to each vessel separately whether Great Britain has, by any act or omission, failed to fulfill any of the duties set forth in the foregoing three rules, or recognized by the principles of international law not inconsistent with such rules, and shall certify such fact as to each of the said vessels. In case the tribunal find that Great Britain has failed to fulfill any duty or duties as aforesaid, it may, if it think proper, proceed to award a sum in gross to be paid by Great Britain to the United States for all the claims referred to it; and in such case the gross sum so awarded shall be paid in coin by the government of Great Britain to the Government of the United States, at Washington, within twelve months after the date of the award.

The award shall be in duplicate, one copy whereof shall be delivered to the agent of the United States for his Government, and the other copy shall be delivered to the agent of Great Britain for his government.

ARTICLE VIII.

Each Government shall pay its own agent and provide for the proper remuneration of the counsel employed by it and of the arbitrator appointed by it, and for the expense of preparing and submitting its case to the tribunal. All other expenses connected with the arbitration shall be defrayed by the two Governments in equal moieties.

ARTICLE IX.

The arbitrators shall keep an accurate record of their proceedings, and may appoint and employ the necessary officers to assist them.

ARTICLE X.

In case the tribunal finds that Great Britain has failed to fulfill any duty or duties as aforesaid, and does not award a sum in gross, the high contracting parties agree that a board of assessors shall be appointed to ascertain and determine what claims are valid, and what amount or amounts shall be paid by Great Britain to the United States on account of the liability arising from such failure, as to each vessel, according to the extent of such liability as decided by the arbitrators.

The board of assessors shall be constituted as follows: One member thereof shall be named by the President of the United States; one member thereof shall be named by Her Britannic Majesty; and one member thereof shall be named by the representative at Washington of His Majesty the King of Italy; and in case of a vacancy happening from any cause, it shall be filled in the same manner in which the original appointment was made.

As soon as possible after such nominations the board of assessors shall be organized in Washington, with power to hold their sittings there, or in New York, or in Boston. The members thereof shall severally subscribe a solemn declaration that they will impartially and carefully examine and decide, to the best of their judgment and according to justice and equity, all matters submitted to them, and shall forthwith proceed, under such rules and regulations as they may prescribe, to the investigation of the claims which shall be presented to them by the Government of the United States, and shall examine and decide upon them in such order and manner as they may think proper, but upon such evidence or information only as shall be furnished by or on behalf of the Governments of the United States and of Great Britain, respectively. They shall be bound to hear on each separate claim, if required, one person on behalf of each Government, as counsel or agent. A majority of the assessors in each case shall be sufficient for a decision.

The decision of the assessors shall be given upon each claim in writing, and shall be signed by them respectively and dated.

Every claim shall be presented to the assessors within six months from the day of their first meeting, but they may, for good cause shown, extend the time for the presentation of any claim to a further period not exceeding three months.

The assessors shall report to each Government at or before the expiration of one year from the date of their first meeting the amount of claims decided by them up to the date of such report; if further claims then remain undecided, they shall make a further report at or before the expiration of two years from the date of such first meeting; and in case any claims remain undetermined at that time, they shall make a final report within a further period of six months.

The report or reports shall be made in duplicate, and one copy thereof shall be delivered to the Secretary of State of the United States, and one copy thereof to the representative of Her Britannic Majesty at Washington.

All sums of money which may be awarded under this article shall be payable at Washington, in coin, within twelve months after the delivery of each report.

The board of assessors may employ such clerks as they shall think necessary.

The expenses of the board of assessors shall be borne equally by the two governments, and paid from time to time, as may be found expedient, on the production of accounts certified by the board. The remuneration of the assessors shall also be paid by the two governments in equal moieties in a similar manner.

ARTICLE XI.

The high contracting parties engage to consider the result of the proceedings of the tribunal of arbitration and of the board of assessors, should such board be appointed, as a full, perfect, and final settlement of all the claims hereinbefore referred to; and further engage that every such claim, whether the same may or may not have been presented to the notice of, made, preferred, or laid before the tribunal or board, shall, from and after the conclusion of the proceedings of the tribunal or board, be considered and treated as finally settled, barred, and thenceforth inadmissible.

ARTICLE XII.

The high contracting parties agree that all claims on the part of corporations, companies, or private individuals, citizens of the United States, upon the government of Her Britannic Majesty, arising out of acts committed against the persons or property of citizens of the United States during the period between the thirteenth of April, eighteen hundred and sixty-one, and the ninth of April, eighteen hundred and sixty-five, inclusive, not being claims growing out of the acts of the vessels referred to in Article I of this treaty, and all claims, with the like exception, on the part of corporations, companies, or private individuals, subjects of Her Britannic Majesty, upon the Government of the United States, arising out of acts committed against the persons or property of subjects of Her Britannic Majesty during the same period, which may have been presented to either government for its interposition with the other, and which yet remain unsettled, as well as any other such claims which may be presented within the time specified in Article XIV of this treaty, shall be referred to three commissioners, to be appointed in the following manner, that is to say: One commissioner shall be named by the President of the United States, one by Her Britannic Majesty, and a third by the President of the United States and Her Britannic Majesty conjointly; and in case the third commissioner shall not have been so named within a period of three months from the date of the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty, then the third commissioner shall be named by the representative at Washington of His Majesty the King of Spain. In case of the death, absence, or incapacity of any commissioner, or in the event of any commissioner omitting or ceasing to act, the vacancy shall be filled in the manner hereinbefore provided for making the original appointment, the period of three months in case of such substitution being calculated from the date of the happening of the vacancy.

The commissioners so named shall meet at Washington at the earliest convenient period after they have been respectively named, and shall, before proceeding to any business, make and subscribe a solemn declaration that they will impartially and carefully examine and decide, to the best of their judgment and according to justice and equity, all such claims as shall be laid before them on the part of the governments of the United States and of Her Britannic Majesty, respectively; and such declaration shall be entered on the record of their proceedings.

ARTICLE XIII.

The commissioners shall then forthwith proceed to the investigation of the claims which shall be presented to them. They shall investigate and decide such claims in such order and such manner as they may think proper, but upon such evidence or information only as shall be furnished by or on behalf of the respective governments. They shall be bound to receive and consider all written documents or statements which may be presented to them by or on behalf of the respective governments in support of or in answer to any claim, and to hear, if required, one person on each side, on behalf of each government, as counsel or agent for such government, on each and every separate claim. A majority of the commissioners shall be sufficient for an award in each case. The award shall be given upon each claim in writing, and shall be signed by the commissioners assenting to it. It shall be competent for each government to name one person to attend the commissioners as its agent, to present and support claims on its behalf, and to answer claims made upon it, and to represent it generally in all matters connected with the investigation and decision thereof.

The high contracting parties hereby engage to consider the decision of the commissioners as absolutely final and conclusive upon each claim decided upon by them, and to give full effect to such decisions without any objection, evasion, or delay whatsoever.

ARTICLE XIV.

Every claim shall be presented to the commissioners within six months from the day of their first meeting, unless in any case where reasons for delay shall be established to the satisfaction of the commissioners, and then, and in any such case, the period for presenting the claim may be extended by them to any time not exceeding three months longer.

The commissioners shall be bound to examine and decide upon every claim within two years from the day of their first meeting. It shall be competent for the commissioners to decide in each case whether any claim has or has not been duly made, preferred, and laid before them, either wholly or to any and what extent, according to the true intent and meaning of this treaty.

ARTICLE XV.

All sums of money which may be awarded by the commissioners on account of any claim shall be paid by the one government to the other, as the case may be, within twelve months after the date of the final award, without interest and without any deduction save as specified in Article XVI of this treaty.

ARTICLE XVI.

The commissioners shall keep an accurate record and correct minutes or notes of all their proceedings, with the dates thereof, and may appoint and employ a secretary, and any other necessary officer or officers, to assist them in the transaction of the business which may come before them.

Each government shall pay its own commissioner and agent or counsel. All other expenses shall be defrayed by the two governments in equal moieties.

The whole expenses of the commission, including contingent expenses, shall be defrayed by a ratable deduction on the amount of the sums awarded by the commissioners, provided always that such deduction shall not exceed the rate of five per cent. on the sums so awarded.

ARTICLE XVII.

The high contracting parties engage to consider the result of the proceedings of this commission as a full, perfect, and final settlement of all such claims as are mentioned in Article XII of this treaty upon either government; and further engage that every such claim, whether or not the same may have been presented to the notice of, made, preferred, or laid before the said commission, shall, from and after the conclusion of the proceedings of the said commission, be considered and treated as finally settled, barred, and thenceforth inadmissible.

ARTICLE XVIII.

It is agreed by the high contracting parties that, in addition to the liberty secured to the United States fishermen by the convention between the United States and Great Britain, signed at London on the 20th day of October, 1818, of taking, curing, and drying fish on certain coasts of the British North American colonies therein defined, the inhabitants of the United States shall have, in common with the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty, the liberty, for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this treaty, to take fish of every kind, except shell-fish, on the sea-coasts and shores, and in the bays, harbors, and creeks, of the provinces of Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, and the colony of Prince Edward's Island, and of the several islands thereunto adjacent, without being restricted to any distance from the shore, with permission to land upon the said coasts and shores and islands, and also upon the Magdalen Islands, for the purpose of drying their nets and curing their fish; provided that, in so doing, they do not interfere with the rights of private property, or with British fishermen, in the peaceable use of any part of the said coasts in their occupancy for the same purpose.

It is understood that the above-mentioned liberty applies solely to the sea fishery, and that the salmon and shad fisheries, and all other fisheries in rivers and the mouths of rivers, are hereby reserved exclusively for British fishermen.

ARTICLE XIX.

It is agreed by the high contracting parties that British subjects shall have, in common with the citizens of the United States, the liberty, for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this treaty, to take fish of every kind, except shell-fish, on the eastern sea-coasts and shores of the United States north of the thirty-ninth parallel of north latitude, and on the shores of the several islands thereunto adjacent, and in the bays, harbors, and creeks of the said sea-coasts and shores of the United States and of the said islands, without being restricted to any distance from the shore, with permission to land upon the said coasts of the United States and of the islands aforesaid, for the purpose of drying their nets and curing their fish, provided that, in so doing, they do not interfere with the rights of private property, or with the fishermen of the United States in the peaceable use of any part of the said coasts in their occupancy for the same purpose.

It is understood that the above-mentioned liberty applies solely to the sea fishery, and that salmon and shad fisheries, and all other fisheries in rivers and mouths of rivers, are hereby reserved exclusively for fishermen of the United States.

ARTICLE XX.

It is agreed that the places designated by the commissioners appointed under the first article of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, concluded at Washington on the 5th of June, 1854, upon the coasts of Her Britannic Majesty's dominions and the United States, as places reserved from the common right of fishing under that treaty, shall be regarded as in like manner reserved from the common right of fishing under the preceding articles. In case any question should arise between the governments of the United States and of Her Britannic Majesty as to the common right of fishing in places not thus designated as reserved, it is agreed that a commission shall be appointed to designate such places, and shall be constituted in the same manner, and have the same powers, duties, and authority as the commission appointed under the said first article of the treaty of the 5th of June, 1854.

ARTICLE XXI.

It is agreed that, for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this treaty, fish oil and fish of all kinds, (except fish of the inland lakes, and of the rivers falling into them, and except fish preserved in oil,) being the produce of the fisheries of the United States, or of the Dominion of Canada, or of Prince Edward's Island, shall be admitted into each country, respectively, free of duty.

ARTICLE XXII.

Inasmuch as it is asserted by the government of Her Britannic Majesty that the privileges accorded to the citizens of the United States under Article XVIII of this treaty are of greater value than those accorded by Articles XIX and XXI of this treaty to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty, and this assertion is not admitted by the Government of the United States, it is further agreed that commissioners shall be appointed to determine, having regard to the privileges accorded by the United States to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty, as stated in Articles XIX and XXI of this treaty, the amount of any compensation which, in their opinion, ought to be paid by the Government of the United States to the government of Her Britannic Majesty in return for the privileges accorded to the citizens of the United States under Article XVIII of this treaty; and that any sum of money which the said commissioners may so award shall be paid by the United States Government, in a gross sum, within twelve months after such award shall have been given.

ARTICLE XXIII.

The commissioners referred to in the preceding article shall be appointed in the following manner, that is to say: One commissioner shall be named by the President of the United States, one by Her Britannic Majesty, and a third by the President of the United States and Her Britannic Majesty conjointly; and in case the third commissioner shall not have been so named within a period of three months from the date when this article shall take effect, then the third commissioner shall be named by the representative at London of His Majesty the Emperor of Austria and King of Hungary. In case of the death, absence, or incapacity of any commissioner, or in the event of any commissioner omitting or ceasing to act, the vacancy shall be filled in the manner hereinbefore provided for making the original appointment, the period of three months in case of such substitution being calculated from the date of the happening of the vacancy.

The commissioners so named shall meet in the city of Halifax, in the province of Nova Scotia, at the earliest convenient period after they have been respectively named, and shall, before proceeding to any business, make and subscribe a solemn declaration that they will impartially and carefully examine and decide the matters referred to them to the best of their judgment, and according to justice and equity; and such declaration shall be entered on the record of their proceedings.

Each of the high contracting parties shall also name one person to attend the commission as its agent, to represent it generally in all matters connected with the commission.

ARTICLE XXIV.

The proceedings shall be conducted in such order as the commissioners appointed under Articles XXII and XXIII of this treaty shall determine. They shall be bound to receive such oral or written testimony as either government may present. If either party shall offer oral testimony, the other party shall have the right of cross-examination, under such rules as the commissioners shall prescribe.

If in the case submitted to the commissioners either party shall have specified or alluded to any report or document in its own exclusive possession, without annexing a copy, such party shall be bound, if the other party thinks proper to apply for it, to furnish that party with a copy thereof; and either party may call upon the other, through the commissioners, to produce the originals or certified copies of any papers adduced as evidence, giving in each instance such reasonable notice as the commissioners may require.

The case on either side shall be closed within a period of six months from the date of the organization of the commission, and the commissioners shall be requested to give their award as soon as possible thereafter. The aforesaid period of six months may be extended for three months in case of a vacancy occurring among the commissioners under the circumstances contemplated in Article XXIII of this treaty.

ARTICLE XXV.

The commissioners shall keep an accurate record and correct minutes or notes of all their proceedings, with the dates thereof, and may appoint and employ a secretary and any other necessary officer or officers to assist them in the transaction of the business which may come before them.

Each of the high contracting parties shall pay its own commissioner and agent or counsel; all other expenses shall be defrayed by the two governments in equal moieties.

ARTICLE XXVI.

The navigation of the river St. Lawrence, ascending and descending, from the forty-fifth parallel of north latitude, where it ceases to form the boundary between the two countries, from, to, and into the sea, shall forever remain free and open for the purposes of commerce to the citizens of the United States, subject to any laws and regulations of Great Britain, or of the Dominion of Canada, not inconsistent with such privilege of free navigation.

The navigation of the rivers Yukon, Porcupine, and Stikine, ascending and descending, from, to, and into the sea, shall forever remain free and open for the purposes of commerce to the subjects of her Britannic Majesty and to the citizens of the United States, subject to any laws and regulations of either country within its own territory, not inconsistent with such privilege of free navigation.

ARTICLE XXVII.

The government of Her Britannic Majesty engages to urge upon the government of the Dominion of Canada to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals in the Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion; and the Government of the United States engages that the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty shall enjoy the use of the St. Clair Flats Canal on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States, and further engages to urge upon the State governments to secure to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty the use of the several State canals connected with the navigation of the lakes or rivers traversed by or contiguous to the boundary line between the possessions of the high contracting parties, on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States.

ARTICLE XXVIII.

The navigation of Lake Michigan shall also, for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this treaty, be free and open for the purposes of commerce to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty, subject to any laws and regulations of the United States or of the States bordering thereon, not inconsistent with such privilege of free navigation.

ARTICLE XXIX.

It is agreed that, for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this treaty, goods, wares, or merchandise arriving at the ports of New York, Boston, and Portland, and any other ports in the United States which have been or may, from time to time, be specially designated by the President of the United States, and destined for Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America, may be entered at the proper custom-house and conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, through the territory of the United States, under such rules, regulations, and conditions for the protection of the revenue as the Government of the United States may from time to time prescribe; and under like rules, regulations, and conditions, goods, wares, or merchandise may be conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, from such possessions through the territory of the United States for export from the said ports of the United States.

It is further agreed that, for the like period, goods, wares, or merchandise arriving at any of the ports of her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America, and destined for the United States, may be entered at the proper custom-house and conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, through the said possessions, under such rules and regulations and conditions for the protection of the revenue as the governments of the said possessions may from time to time prescribe; and, under like rules, regulations, and conditions, goods, wares, or merchandise may be conveyed in transit, without payment of duties, from the United States through the said possessions to other places in the United States, or for export from ports in the said possessions.

ARTICLE XXX.

It is agreed that, for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this treaty, subjects of her Britannic Majesty may carry in British vessels, without payment of duty, goods, wares, or merchandise from one port or place within the territory of the United States upon the St. Lawrence, the great lakes, and the rivers connecting the same, to another port or place within the territory of the United States as aforesaid: Provided, That a portion of such transportation is made through the Dominion of Canada by land carriage and in bond, under such rules and regulations as may be agreed upon between the government of Her Britannic Majesty and the Government of the United States.

Citizens of the United States may for the like period carry in United States vessels, without payment of duty, goods, wares, or merchandise from one port or place within the possessions of Her Britannic Majesty in North America to another port or place within the said possessions: Provided, That a portion of such transportation is made through the territory of the United States by land carriage and in bond, under such rules and regulations as may be agreed upon between the Government of the United States and the government of Her Britannic Majesty.

The Government of the United States further engages not to impose any export duties on goods, wares, or merchandise carried under this article through the territory of the United States; and Her Majesty's government engages to urge the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada and the legislatures of the other colonies not to impose any export duties on goods, wares, or merchandise carried under this article; and the Government of the United States may, in case such export duties are imposed by the Dominion of Canada, suspend, during the period that such duties are imposed, the right of carrying granted under this article in favor of the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty.

The Government of the United States may suspend the right of carrying granted in favor of the subjects of her Britannic Majesty under this article, in case the Dominion of Canada should at any time deprive the citizens of the United States of the use of the canals in the said Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion, as provided in Article XXVII.

ARTICLE XXXI.

The government of Her Britannic Majesty further engages to urge upon the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada and the legislature of New Brunswick, that no export duty, or other duty, shall be levied on lumber or timber of any kind cut on that portion of the American territory in the State of Maine watered by the river St. John and its tributaries, and floated down that river to the sea, when the same is shipped to the United States from the province of New Brunswick. And, in case any such export or other duty continues to be levied after the expiration of one year from the date of the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty, it is agreed that the Government of the United States may suspend the right of carrying hereinbefore granted under Article XXX of this treaty for such period as such export or other duty may be levied.

ARTICLE XXXII.

It is further agreed that the provisions and stipulations of Articles XVIII to XXV of this treaty, inclusive, shall extend to the colony of Newfoundland, so far as they are applicable. But if the imperial Parliament, the legislature of Newfoundland, or the Congress of the United States, shall not embrace the colony of Newfoundland in their laws enacted for carrying the foregoing articles into effect, then this article shall be of no effect; but the omission to make provision by law to give it effect, by either of the legislative bodies aforesaid, shall not in any way impair any other articles of this treaty.

ARTICLE XXXIII.

The foregoing Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX of this treaty, shall take effect as soon as the laws required to carry them into operation shall have been passed by the imperial Parliament of Great Britain, by the Parliament of Canada, and by the legislature of Prince Edward's Island on the one hand, and by the Congress of the United States on the other. Such assent having been given, the said articles shall remain in force for the period of ten years from the date at which they may come into operation; and further until the expiration of two years after either of the high contracting parties shall have given notice to the other of its wish to terminate the same; each of the high contracting parties being at liberty to give such notice to the other at the end of the said period of ten years or at any time afterward.

ARTICLE XXXIV.

Whereas it was stipulated by Article I of the treaty concluded at Washington on the 15th June, 1846, between the United States and Her Britannic Majesty, that the line of boundary between the territories of the United States and those of Her Britannic Majesty, from the point on the forty-ninth parallel of north latitude up to which it had already been ascertained, should be continued westward along the said parallel of north latitude "to the middle of the channel which separates the continent from Vancouver's Island, and thence southerly, through the middle of the said channel and of Fuca Straits, to the Pacific Ocean;" and whereas the commissioners appointed by the two high contracting parties to determine that portion of the boundary which runs southerly through the middle of the channel aforesaid, were unable to agree upon the same; and whereas the government of Her Britannic Majesty claims that such boundary line should, under the terms of the treaty above recited, be run through the Rosario Straits, and the Government of the United States claims that it should be run through the Canal de Haro, it is agreed that the respective claims of the Government of the United States and of the government of Her Britannic Majesty shall be submitted to the arbitration and award of His Majesty the Emperor of Germany, who, having regard to the above-mentioned article of the said treaty, shall decide thereupon, finally and without appeal, which of those claims is most in accordance with the true interpretation of the treaty of June 15, 1846.

ARTICLE XXXV.

The award of His Majesty the Emperor of Germany shall be considered as absolutely final and conclusive; and full effect shall be given to such award without any objection, evasion, or delay whatsoever. Such decision shall be given in writing and dated; it shall be in whatsoever form His Majesty may choose to adopt; it shall be delivered to the representatives or other public agents of the United States and of Great Britain, respectively, who may be actually at Berlin, and shall be considered as operative from the day of the date of the delivery thereof.

ARTICLE XXXVI.

The written or printed case of each of the two parties, accompanied by the evidence offered in support of the same, shall be laid before His Majesty the Emperor of Germany within six months from the date of the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty, and a copy of such case and evidence shall be communicated by each party to the other, through their respective representatives at Berlin.

The high contracting parties may include in the evidence to be considered by the arbitrator such documents, official correspondence, and other official or public statements bearing on the subject of the reference as they may consider necessary to the support of their respective cases.

After the written or printed case shall have been communicated by each party to the other, each party shall have the power of drawing up and laying before the arbitrator a second and definitive statement, if it think fit to do so, in reply to the case of the other party so communicated, which definitive statement shall be so laid before the arbitrator, and also be mutually communicated in the same manner as aforesaid, by each party to the other, within six months from the date of laying the first statement of the case before the arbitrator.

ARTICLE XXXVII.

If, in the case submitted to the arbitrator, either party shall specify or allude to any report or document in its own exclusive possession without annexing a copy, such party shall be bound, if the other party thinks proper to apply for it, to furnish that party with a copy thereof, and either party may call upon the other, through the arbitrator, to produce the originals or certified copies of any papers adduced as evidence, giving in each instance such reasonable notice as the arbitrator may require. And if the arbitrator should desire further elucidation or evidence with regard to any point contained in the statements laid before him, he shall be at liberty to require it from either party, and he shall be at liberty to hear one counsel or agent for each party, in relation to any matter, and at such time, and in such manner, as he may think fit.

ARTICLE XXXVIII.

The representatives or other public agents of the United States and of Great Britain at Berlin, respectively, shall be considered as the agents of their respective governments to conduct their cases before the arbitrator, who shall be requested to address all his communications, and give all his notices to such representatives or other public agents, who shall represent their respective governments, generally, in all matters connected with the arbitration.

ARTICLE XXXIX.

It shall be competent to the arbitrator to proceed in the said arbitration, and all matters relating thereto, as and when he shall see fit, either in person, or by a person or persons named by him for that purpose, either in the presence or absence of either or both agents, and either orally or by written discussion or otherwise.

ARTICLE XL.

The arbitrator may, if he think fit, appoint a secretary, or clerk, for the purposes of the proposed arbitration, at such rate of remuneration as he shall think proper. This, and all other expenses of and connected with the said arbitration, shall be provided for as hereinafter stipulated.

ARTICLE XLI.

The arbitrator shall be requested to deliver, together with his award, an account of all the costs and expenses which he may have been put to in relation to this matter, which shall forthwith be repaid by the two governments in equal moieties.

ARTICLE XLII.

The arbitrator shall be requested to give his award in writing as early as convenient after the whole case on each side shall have been laid before him, and to deliver one copy thereof to each of the said agents.

ARTICLE XLIII.

The present treaty shall be duly ratified by the President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by Her Britannic Majesty; and the ratifications shall be exchanged either at Washington or at London within six months from the date hereof, or earlier if possible.

In faith whereof, we, the respective plenipotentiaries, have signed this treaty and have hereunto affixed our seals.

Done in duplicate at Washington the eighth day of May, in the year, of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-one.

And whereas the said treaty has been duly ratified on both parts, and the respective ratifications of the same were exchanged in the city of London, on the seventeenth day of June, 1871, by Robert C. Schenck, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States, and Earl Granville, Her Majesty's principal secretary of state for foreign affairs, on the part of their respective governments:

Now, therefore, be it known that I, Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States of America, have caused the said treaty to be made public, to the end that the same, and every clause and article thereof, may be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the United States and the citizens thereof.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

No. 237.

The President to the Governor of New York.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, November 29, 1871.

SIR: I transmit herewith a copy of a treaty concluded in this city on the 8th day of May last, between the United States and Great Britain.

By the 27th article the government of Her Britannic Majesty engages to urge upon the government of the Dominion of Canada to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other Canals in the Dominion, on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion, and the Government of the United States engages to urge upon the State governments to secure to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty the use of the several State canals connected with the navigation of the lakes or rivers traversed by or contiguous to the boundary line between the possessions of the high contracting parties, on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States.

The wisdom and the importance of these reciprocal concessions of the use of the artificial channels of water communication contemplated by the treaty on terms of equality to the citizens or subjects of either power are apparent. The rapid increase of population and of production of the vast territory on either side of the boundary line and on the upper lakes demands all the channels of communication with the tide waters, which either nature or the enterprise of man has made available. It is confidently believed that the use of the artificial water communications which the treaty contemplates will contribute to a rapid increase of trade through those several channels, and will tend to a consequent increase in the tolls and returns of profits, both direct and indirect, to each, and all of the canals thus opened to the use of a larger extent of country.

As the period is approaching when the legislature of your State is about to convene, I desire to bring the provisions of this article of the treaty to its notice, and to urge upon your State government to secure to the subjects of her Britannic Majesty the use of the several State canals within the State of New York, connected with the navigation of the lakes or rivers traversed by or contiguous to the boundary line between the possessions of the United States and those of her Britannic Majesty in North America, on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States.

I address a similar request to other States through which are constructed canals connected with the navigation of the lakes.

I have the honor to be, &c., &c.,

U. S. GRANT.

His Excellency JOHN T. HOFFMAN,
Governor of the State of New York.

Same, mutatis mutandis, to the governors of the States of Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Wisconsin.

No. 238.

4.—PAYMENTS TO GREAT BRITAIN UNDER THE TREATY OF JULY 1, 1863.

Mr. Fish to Mr. Akerman.

Washington, August 1, 1871.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith a memorandum sent to me by Sir Edward Thornton containing an argument against the deduction from an installment of $100,000, payable to the British government on the 21st instant, of the sum of $27,061 97, claimed to be due from the Puget Sound Agricultural Company to Pierce County, Washington Territory, for taxes assessed in the years 1859 to 1869, upon lands in the occupation of said company, and of the further sum $34,243 25, claim for interest upon such unpaid taxes.

The only information which the Department has as to the purposes for which the taxes were imposed is derived from a letter from the honorable Messrs. Garfield and Poland, the attorneys for Pierce County, and the accompanying statement and certificate of the clerk of same county, of the amount in which they are distributed under the heads of county tax, school tax, territorial tax, and road tax, copies of which are inclosed.

I have to request your opinion as to whether the law and the treaties referred to in the memorandum require the retention in the Treasury of a sum equal to the taxes before mentioned, and also whether the amount charged as interest upon the unpaid taxes is also to be retained.

I will thank you to return the memorandum when it shall have answered your purpose.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

HAMILTON FISH.

Hon. A. T. AKERMAN,
Attorney General.

Mr. Thornton to Mr. Fish.

WASHINGTON, May 25, 1871.

SIR: I have the honor to invite your attention to the act of appropriation for the consular and diplomatic services for the year ending June 30, 1872, and to that section of it which provides for the second and last installment of the amount awarded by the commissioners under the treaty of July 1, 1863, in satisfaction of the claims of the Hudson's Bay and Puget Sound Agricultural Companies. To this section is added a proviso that before payment shall be made of the last installment, all taxes legally assessed upon any of the property of the Puget Sound Agricultural Company, covered by the said award before the same was made, and still unpaid, shall be extinguished by the said company; or the amount of such taxes shall be withheld by the Government of the United States from the sum appropriated as above.

You have recently been good enough to furnish me with a copy of an account showing the amount of taxes which are claimed by Pierce County, Washington Territory, to be due by the Puget Sound Agricultural Company on the lands with regard to which the award was made.

In accordance with your permission, I have now the honor to submit for your perusal a memorandum which I have caused to be drawn up relative to the above-mentioned taxes, and I am not without hopes that you will be persuaded that the amount thereof ought not, either legally or equitably, to be deducted from the final installment to be paid in September next.

I have, &c., &c.,

EDWD. THORNTON.

[Inclosure.]

As a claim has been made for the payment of taxes assessed upon the property of the Puget Sound Agricultural Company out of the sum awarded by the commissioners under the treaty of July, 1863, the following statement is offered to show that such a claim should not be allowed, and that it cannot be supported upon legal or equitable grounds.

It is not necessary to set out in detail the early history of the company, or the now admitted and adjudged fact of their possession of some 167,000 acres of land on the shores of Puget Sound, a large portion of which was open prairie, and in that thickly-wooded country very desirable for settlement.

Article IV of the treaty of June 4, 1846, provides that the farm lands and other property of every description belonging to the Puget Sound Agricultural Company, on the north side of the Columbia River, shall be confirmed to the said company. In case, however, the situation of those farms and lands should be considered by the United States to be of public and political importance, and the United States Government should signify a desire to obtain possession of the whole or any part thereof, the property so required shall be transferred to the said Government at a proper valuation to be agreed upon between the parties. The treaty of July 1, 1863, after reciting the foregoing provisions, and reciting that whereas it is desirable that all questions between the United States authorities on the one hand, and the Hudson Bay and Puget Sound companies on the other, with respect to the possessory rights and claims of these companies, and of any other British subjects in Washington and Oregon Territories, should be settled by the transfer of those rights and claims to the Government of the United States for an adequate money consideration, provided for the appointment of a joint commission to examine and decide upon all claims arising out of the provisions of said treaty of June 15, 1846. Article IV of the treaty of July 1, 1863, provides that "all sums of money which may be awarded by the commissioners, or by the arbitrators or umpire, on account of any claim, shall be paid by the one government to the other in two annual installments, whereof the first shall be paid within twelve months after the date of the award, and the second within twenty-four months after the date of the award, without interest, and without any deduction whatever."

On the 10th of September, 1869, the commissioners appointed under the said treaty rendered their decision, and awarded "as an adequate money consideration for the transfer to the United States of America of all the possessory rights and claims of the Puget Sound Agricultural Company, and in full satisfaction of all such rights and claims, there ought to be paid the sum of $200,000 at the times and in the manner provided in the 4th article of said treaty," and appended to such award a form of deed of rebate, to be executed by said company, releasing all of their possessory rights and claims, and demands founded upon or growing out of the said treaties, or the possessory rights or claims of said company, before referred to. (See pages 30 and 31, printed opinions and awards.) The first installment of the said treaty and award was paid by the United States, as stipulated; for the payment of the second installment, Congress, in March, 1871, made an appropriation, with the following proviso: "That before payment shall be made of that portion of the entire sum awarded to the Puget Sound Agricultural Company, all taxes legally assessed upon any of the property of the said company covered by the said award before the same was made, and still unpaid, shall be extinguished by the Puget Sound Agricultural Company, or the amount of such taxes shall be withheld by the Government of the United States from the sum hereby appropriated."

The amount of such unpaid taxes as appears from the certificate of the clerk of Pierce County, Washington Territory, filed with the Secretary of State, is $27,061 97, being the amount of taxes claimed to have been assessed upon the lands of the company from the year 1859 to the year 1869, inclusive, and there is claimed the further sum of $34,243 25 as penalties for the non-payment of such taxes at the times when claimed to have been assessed, making the total sum claimed $61,305 22. One question arises as to the effect of the proviso in said appropriation act, and whether the taxes alleged to have been legally assessed and still unpaid were so assessed, or if legally assessed, are still unpaid, and leads to the consideration of the following points:

1st. The lands were not subject to taxation, (a;) the said company, at the time and prior to the transfer of this territory by Great Britain to the United States, had simply possessory rights, but no legal title, which fact was determined by the said commissioners. Mr. Johnson, commissioner on the part of the United States, in his separate opinion, (p. 26,) says: "There was never any grant of lands by the British government to this company," a fact in the knowledge of both governments; and in commenting upon the language used in the 4th article, on p. 27, says: "Upon these principles of interpretation, I have no hesitation in saying that the intent of the parties, as manifested by the terms employed, included all the lands which apparently belonged to the company;" the term "belonging" is not a condition, and imparts none into the provision; it is used merely as a part of the description and designation of the property intended. Mr. John Rose, commissioner on the part of Great Britain, holds the like opinion, and held "that the term 'belonging,' used in the treaty, did not imply restriction to such property as the company could prove a legal title to," (see p. 14;) and on 15 says: "I cannot accept the modified interpretation contended for by the United States, that it meant to confirm only what the company could prove a legal ownership in, or that in any case its claim must be confirmed to such lands as were actually inclosed. The company had no different title to the lands within inclosures from what they had to those over which their pastoral occupation extended; both rested upon the fact of possession and use." After the transfer to the United States, the company obtained no title to the lands occupied by them. Mr. Johnson (p. 28 of the opinions) says: "The United States have never proceeded to confirm any lands whatever, as they stipulated they would." It may be said that the proposition as stated by Mr. Johnson is too broad, as the United States did not absolutely and unqualifiedly stipulate to confirm these lands to the company, but reserved to itself the right, in case it should so desire, to obtain possession to said lands, and to have the same transferred to the United States at a proper valuation.

The treaty was of itself, therefore, no confirmation of title; the confirmation, if any, should be made by the legislative department of the government. Foster and Elan vs. Wilson, 2 Peters, 253; United States vs. Alvarado, 6 Peters, 691. The United States, however, in said treaty reserved the right to elect whether it would confirm the company in their rights or to possess itself of the lands at a proper valuation. The latter election was made, and therefore the treaty of July 1, 1863, was entered into, and therefore no title was ever granted to the company of these lands. The United States having elected to keep the lands under the provisions of said treaty of June 15, 1846, and the title being retained by the United States, no taxes could legally be assessed against them. This provision, although one universal rule in the United States, was, however, incorporated in the organic laws of Washington Territory, wherein it was provided that no tax should be imposed on the property of the United States. (G. U. S. Stat. 175, section 6.)

All the rights the company had, therefore, in these lands were possessory with the contingency of such rights being extinguished at the option of the United States upon certain conditions, which contingency happened when the United States made its election. That there is no justification in law for this claim is apparent, and from the following facts which appear in the evidence presented to said commission it will appear that there is little claim in equity.

After the treaty of 1846, American citizens and others who had been naturalized, or had declared their intention to become such, began to settle upon the lands in the occupation of the said company, claiming the right so to do under the laws of the provional government of Oregon granting lands, and afterward under the act of Congress, September 27, 1850, and its various amendments granting lands to actual settlers in Oregon and Washington Territories.

The number of settlers having increased, a county was formed which embraced within its limits all the lands occupied by the company in 1846, the county seat of which, named Steilacoom, was located on these lands. The boundaries of the county were afterward changed, and it was altered in size until it contained very few settlers except those who had located their claims on these lands or who were living in the towns of Steilacoom and Steilacoom City, also situated upon them. The county commissioners of this county in 1850 assessed a tax upon these lands which was paid without protest. In 1852 a tax of $645 12 was assessed and paid under protest. In 1857 taxes were assessed on 163 square miles at a valuation of $500,000, of $4,999, including a road tax of $1,250 and a school tax of $249, which was also paid under protest. The taxes of 1858 were assessed on the same quantity of land at the same valuation, amounting to the sum of $7,250 02, which was also paid under protest. The taxes for the year 1859 were assessed at the sum of $7,250, of which amount the company paid $304 under protest, as before, leaving the remainder of said tax unpaid. The total amount of taxes paid by the company up to that time amounted to the sum of $14,595 14; (see evidence of Wm. T. Palmer, on page 113 of Puget Sound Agricultural Company.) The quantity of land contained in 163 square miles being 104,320 acres, a valuation of $500,000 makes the assessed valuation of the lands $4 79½ per acre, and the rate of taxation $1 45 per hundred dollars of such valuation. In a new and agricultural community this rate of taxation was monstrous and the valuation for the purpose of taxation equally so; it was, in fact, almost tantamount to confiscation. In comparison with the usual rates of valuation in other portions of the United States, these lands have been worth in market from $6 to $8 per acre. These same lands were, however, afterwards assessed by the same commissioners at $1 per acre, and one of them afterward stated under oath that they were worth only 50 cents per acre.

For the entire possessions of said company, including 167,040 acres in Pierce County and 3,000 acres in Cowlitz County, the company was awarded the sum of 200,000. There is one other fact to be stated in this connection. That although there were nearly two hundred persons on the company's lands, claiming them as settlers, and although there were several settlers in the county outside of the limits of the company's possessions, yet no assessment was made on any lands except those belonging to the company; and with the exception of a small revenue derived from the taxation of personal property the entire revenue of that county was obtained from the land so assessed to the company at the foregoing oppressive rates, and of which lands only a small portion were actually used by the company. The payment of these taxes by the company was made a distinct claim before the joint commission both in the memorial and in the proof, and was argued upon the hearing in the arguments of council, yet it now here appears in the opinion or award of the commissioners what disposition was made of the subject by the commissioner, for the reason that the items which found the aggregate balance fund to be due, and awarded in favor of said company, are not stated; neither does it appear from such opinions or award, whether the taxes now claimed from the year 1859 to 1869, inclusive, were claimed on the part of the United States. It may, however, be properly urged, that as the commission had full and ample jurisdiction over the subject-matter of this claim, the award so made should be final. It will be observed that the commissioners were appointed under the treaty of 1863, to examine and decide upon all claims arising out of the treaty of June 15, 1846, and especially under the expressed desire of the United States, to obtain the possessory rights of said company in said lands, and that all sums of money which might be awarded by said commissioners should be paid by the one government to the other in the manner prescribed without any deduction whatever.

No language could be used more clearly showing the intentions of the high contracting parties to submit all claims pertaining to such lands, whether in favor of the company or in favor of the United States, and the balance of such accounts when adjusted was to be paid to whichever party was found to be indebted to the other, without any deduction whatever; in other words, the award of such commission was to be final and conclusive.

In determining the value of the rights of the company in these lands, it was proper to consider any liens or charges in the nature of taxes held by the United States, or its Territories, if any such existed legally; in fact the commission could arrive at the true result in no other way, and the presumption of law would be that every element that entered into the proper adjustment of such accounts was considered by the commission in making their award. It is not to be presumed that this proviso was enacted by Congress for the purpose of reviewing the proceedings of the high contracting parties, made under the solemn obligations of a treaty, or to change or modify the obligations so made, and when it is so conclusively shown that the subject-matter of the claim now set up was embraced in the scope of the submission to the commission organized under said treaty; and the award having been made, such award should not be disturbed without indisputable proof of the injustice thereof; the principle of res adjudicata ought to apply to this claim.

It may be added that taxes legally assessed are a charge upon the land taxed, and it is in the nature of a proceeding in rem, and that under the laws of Washington Territory the remedy to be pursued in the collection of taxes upon the refusal of the owner of the lands is by sale of the lands subject to such taxes; and in case no sale can be effected, it is the duty of the county to purchase the lands for the amount of the delinquent taxes, (see section 20, page 335 of Laws of Washington Territory, 1854.) In this case, however, the company were adjudged by the commissioners to have no legal title, and in their award were directed to convey to the United States no title, but all their possessory rights and claims without any covenants of warranty or title whereby every lien and charge held by the United States or any of its Territories became extinguished by merge in its own title.

It is therefore insisted that the said proviso does not and should not defeat the payment of the money appropriated for the fulfillment of the obligations assumed under the provisions of said treaties, and that a refusal to pay such award would be a violation of one of the most solemn forms of obligations entered into by one government with another.

As to that portion of the bill rendered and filed with the Secretary of State claiming $34,243 25 as penalties for the non-payment of said taxes, it is only necessary to direct attention to the proviso in said appropriation act, which provides that all taxes legally assessed and still unpaid shall be extinguished by the said company, or the amount of such taxes shall be withheld. The penalties are no portion of the taxes assessed, and therefore not embraced in the terms of such proviso; it is proper, however, to add, in connection with this branch of the case, the following narration of facts: The company having, as heretofore stated, for several years paid the taxes assessed against their lands, although protesting and insisting that there was no legal authority for such assessment for the purpose of having a judicial determination of such rights. In the year 1859, the company appeared before the board of county commissioners of Pierce County and objected to the excessive valuation and to the right to tax at all, desiring a judicial examination of the question of the liabilities of the lands that had been in their occupation and possession in 1846 to be assessed to them for taxation. The objection was overruled, and the tax was ordered to be levied upon such lands at a valuation of $1 per acre. From this order an appeal was taken to the district court of Washington Territory and there affirmed, from whence the cause was taken to the supreme court of the Territory, in which court the order of the county commissioners was affirmed in the year 1862. From this judgment a writ of error was presented to the Supreme Court of the United States, which court, at its December term, 1867, without any decision upon its merits, dismissed the writ of error on account of a defect in the writ. In the mean time an injunction was granted enjoining the collection of any taxes that might be assessed against the lands, which suit was continued, by the mutual consent of all parties, until the question of the right of taxation so raised should be determined. In the taxes for which the claim is made are those claimed to have been assessed in 1859, and since up to and including the year 1869, the year in which the commissioners made their award, before whom the company urged the same question upon the taxes they had paid prior to the year 1859. The parties having failed to obtain the decision of the Supreme Court upon that point, therefore, so long as the proceeding was pending, there could be no return made of taxes as delinquent, and the penalties charged could not attach. It is evident that the payment of taxes was all that was contemplated originally by Congress. It would, under the circumstances, be unconscionable to compel the payment of more than the taxes as legally assessed, and there is no rule of construction which can construe a statute providing for the payment of one sum to include other sums.

WASHINGTON, May 1, 1871.

SIR: We have the honor to inclose certified statement of the amount of taxes due from the Puget Sound Agricultural Company to Pierce County, in Washington Territory. By the act of Congress appropriating money to pay the balance due said company, the amount of taxes due by said company is to be withheld to meet such indebtedness.

We respectfully request to be notified of your action in the premises.

Mr. Poland's address is St. Johnsbury, Vermont; that of Mr. Garfield, for the present, Olympia, Washington Territory.

With great respect, your obedient servants,

S. GARFIELDE,
LUKE P. POLAND,
Attorneys for Pierce County.

Hon. HAMILTON FISH,
Secretary of State.

TERritORY OF WASHINGTON, County of Pierce, ss:

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct transcript of the delinquent tax rolls, "so far as relates to the delinquent taxes of the Puget Sound Agricultural Company," of Pierce County, Washington Territory, with the percentage added thereto according to law, as fully and amply as the same appears of record in my office. In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of the said Pierce County, Washington Territory, on this the 11th day of April, A. D. 1871.

JOHN LATHAM,

Auditor Pierce County, Washington Territory.

No. 239.

Mr. Akerman to Mr. Fish.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,

August 7, 1871. (Received August 9.)

SIR: Your letter of the 1st instant presents a question arising under the act of February 21, 1871, making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1872, and for other purposes. The last of the appropriations in that act is as follows:

The pay to the government of Great Britain and Ireland, the second and last installment of the amount awarded by the commissioners under the treaty of July one, eighteen hundred and sixty-three, in satisfaction of the claims of the Hudson's Bay and of the Puget Sound Agricultural Company, three hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars in gold coin: Provided, That before payment shall be made of that portion of the above sum awarded to the Puget Sound Agricultural Company, all taxes legally assessed upon any of the property of said company covered by said award, before the same was made, and still unpaid, shall be extinguished by said Puget Sound Agricultural Company; or the amount of such taxes shall be withheld by the Government of the United States from the sum hereby appropriated. (16 U. S. Stat., 419.)

Attorneys for Pierce County, Washington Territory, have transmitted to you a certificate of John Latham, auditor of Pierce County, Washington Territory, under the seal of the commissioner's court of that county, that a certain annexed paper is a true and correct transcript of the delinquent tax-rolls so far as relates to the taxes of the Puget Sound Agricultural Company of Pierce County, Washington Territory, with the percentage added thereto according to law, as fully and as amply as the same appears of record in my office. The paper annexed purports to be a statement of delinquent taxes due to Pierce County, Washington Territory, by the Puget Sound Agricultural Company, on one hundred and sixty-one thousand acres of land, from the year 1859 to 1869, inclusive. These taxes are distributed under the heads of county tax, school tax, territorial tax, and road tax, the whole amounting to $27,062 64; and there are additions of various percentages, running from twenty-five per cent. on the tax of 1869 to two hundred and seventy-five per cent. upon the tax of 1859, raising the total to the sum of $61,305 22. No explanation is given in the certificate or annexed paper of the reason for these additions. But it is probable that they are claimed as due for the delinquency of the tax payer.

You request my opinion as to whether the law requires the retention in the Treasury of the amount of the said original taxes and of the additions thereto.

The appropriation above quoted is in fulfillment of a stipulation in the treaty of July 1, 1863, which, after providing for a decision of the claims of the company by commissioners, engages in the fourth article that the sums awarded shall be paid in two installments, within specified times, "without any deduction whatever." (13 U. S. Stat., 652.) If this proviso is to cause the payment of a less sum than the amount awarded, it will produce a breach of the treaty, and make the country responsible to the foreign power for such a breach. A statute which may have such consequences should receive the strictest construction allowable under established rules. Not denying the right of Congress to repeal a treaty or any provision of it, so far at least as to control the action of the Executive in relation to it, yet I think that a statute which may have that effect should be held to mean no more than its language necessarily imports.

Under this rule, when the term taxes is used in such an act of Congress, without explanation from the context or other noticeable circumstances, it must be understood to mean taxes under the laws of the United States—that is, taxes known as national taxes, in distinction from State or Territorial taxes.

When the Government is both a debtor and creditor of the same party, Congress might think it no substantial, though a literal, violation of an international covenant to deduct what is due to this Government from what this Government owes to the other party. But that Congress meant that the Government of the United States should become a tax collector for a Territorial county, and should execute this office by breaking a treaty with a foreign power, is not to be inferred from language which will bear any other interpretation.

If it were intended that this money should be withheld for the benefit of Pierce County, Congress would probably have directed that it should be paid the treasury of that county. But no such direction appears in the statute. The provision is that the amount of such taxes shall be withheld from the appropriation—that is, shall be kept in the Treasury of the United States—a very fit place for taxes assessed by the United States, but not for taxes assessed by Pierce County.

I am not informed whether any United States taxes were in fact assessed upon the property of the company. But it is hardly possible that the company could have had interests of great magnitude within the United States for the last ten years without liability to national taxes; and Congress might have inserted the proviso out of abundant caution, without knowing whether a claim for such taxes existed in fact.

I do not overlook the fact that Territory is a creation of Congress, and sustains to the General Government a relation different in many respects from that sustained by a State. Nevertheless, its taxes are so different from the taxes of the United States, in the authority which immediately imposes them, in the agencies which collect them, and in the purposes to which they are applied, that Congress cannot reasonably be supposed to have intended to embrace them under the general name "taxes" in such a statute as that under consideration.

I have not examined the questions of the regularity and sufficiency of the certificate from the auditor of Pierce County; of the validity of the county's claim for taxes, or of the validity of the assessed penalty; or whether the taxes, if valid at all, constitute a general debt of the company, or binds alone the property once occupied by it, and now recognized as belonging to the United States; because the construction which I have felt obliged to put upon the proviso in question makes such examination unnecessary.

I am, therefore, of the opinion that neither the tax nor the penalty which Pierce County is said to claim from the company should be withheld, and that no taxes should be withheld under the proviso except such as may be found to have been legally assessed upon the property of the company by the Government of the United States.

Very respectfully, &c.,

A. T. AKERMAN.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., September 2, 1871. (Received September 4.)

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of August 28, inclosing a copy of the opinion of the Attorney General on the question of the amount of taxes due from the sum appropriated for the payment of an award to the Puget Sound Agricultural Company. You ask to be informed whether any tax for the use of the United States, as imposed by any act of Congress, has been legally assessed upon any of the property of that company covered by the award in question.

I herewith transmit in reply a copy of a letter from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to whom the subject was referred for report.

In view of the result of the Commissioner's investigation, I am enabled to state that this Department is not informed of any unpaid assessment of tax due the United States, against the property of the Puget Sound Agricultural Company.

Respectfully, &c.,

J. F. HARTLEY,
Acting Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. Douglass to Mr. Boutwell.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., August 31, 1871.

SIR: Yours of the 28th instant, inclosing letter of the honorable Secretary of State, with the opinion of the Attorney General upon the question "what taxes if any are to be withheld by this Government from the sum appropriated for the payment of an award to the Puget Sound Agricultural Company, by the act of February 21, 1871, required by the treaty with Great Britain of July 1, 1863," is acknowledged.

You request me to state whether any such taxes have been legally assessed and remain unpaid to the United States. I perceive by reference to the second page of the "opinion of the Attorney General," that your inquiry relates to taxes assessed before the "award" was made. It not appearing at what time the award was made, I have caused investigation to be made with reference to the entire period covered by the operations of the internal revenue system, and find that no taxes have been assessed during that period on the property of the Puget Sound Agricultural Company which remain unpaid at the present date.

Respectfully,

J. W. DOUGLASS,
Commissioner.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Athens, January 14, 1871. (Received February 8.)

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the volume of Consular Regulations; also of your dispatch of the 10th ultimo, No. 55.

The festivities of the Greek New Year took place yesterday. The diplomatic body assisted at mass at the cathedral and from thence proceeded to the palace, where the King and Queen gave an official audience, and the customary address to the throne was delivered, to which Her Majesty responded.

The eventful year which has just closed has not been without political and moral importance to Greece. In April last, the affair at S. Nierme, near Marathon, whereby four foreigners, including two members of legations, were massacred by brigands, created an intensity of feeling in this community which cannot wholly die out, and may lead to that unity of public sentiment here which is essential to the thorough removal of the scourge of brigandage in Greece and the Turkish provinces. On the other hand, through misapprehension and misrepresentation of the facts of the case, this nation has been most unjustifiably assailed, especially by the government and press of England, until a bitterness of feeling has been excited here which is not likely to strengthen the friendly relations heretofore existing between Great Britain and Greece. The result of the legal examination, which involves an Englishman in the circumstances which led to the tragical ending, is not satisfactory to the English minister, and further complications are likely to grow out of this protracted affair.

Two changes of ministry have occurred during the year. That of Mr. Deligeorgis gave promise of important reforms, and did effect much in the successful pursuit of brigandage, but the minister was without popular support. The idea that the King would, in face of this last fact, authorize the dissolution of the forthcoming Parliament, subjected the sovereign to very general and severe criticism. The return of Mr. Coumoundouros to power has restored the popular equilibrium, and the chief political organs now assert that the kingdom, has "returned at last to strictly constitutional government," the present cabinet being supported by a parliamentary majority.

With the popularity which now surrounds the new minister, and the great opportunity which is afforded for positive and independent action in the important questions of brigandage, finance, and internal development, it may be expected that Greece will this year take some important steps in the right direction.

The National Exposition of Industry, which has just closed, was a creditable evidence of the material resources of the kingdom, and which a supply of outside capital would largely develop.

Attention has been given to the subject of commercial relations with the United States. The reduction of our import duty on dried currants will lead to the increase of the export from Greece, but it still seems desirable that a further reduction of the duty should be made in view of the fact that the existing rate is equal to about double the cost of the fruit in this market, and also because Great Britain is seriously suggesting the entire removal of the duty at her ports. This would divert shipments from the United States.

The reports of our consuls at Patras, Zante, and Cephalonia encourage the belief that much more can be done than ever has been done in direct importations from the States, and practical efforts will be made to increase these commercial relations.

I have, &c.,

CHAS. K. TUCKERMAN.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Guatemala, July 31, 1871. (Received September 4.)

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of Department circulars Nos. 10 and 11, dated June 13 and 16, 1871, respectively.

Referring to your No. 11, I have to state that all the foreign residents in this republic seek the protection of this legation, because none other is respected. During the late insurrection it became a necessity for me to extend it to them, to make their treaty rights be respected by the government and by the revolutionists. Among the number were British subjects, acting as agents of sugar and coffee estates.

In employing the friendly offices of this legation, I have been careful not to give just cause for offense; but at times I have had to meet arbitrary acts with unyielding firmness. The authorities have in no instance objected to my action, but approved my course and claimed the protection of the legation. The insurgent party also claimed the protection of the legation. Protection has been given to President Cerna's family, and his ministry and their families. Also the family of President Granadas and to his partisans.

The granting these friendly offices to all parties has largely improved the position of this legation, and has drawn to its sustenance all the foreign residents and better class of natives. There is now not a doubt but my worst fears, as communicated to you in my several dispatches, would have more than been realized had its influence and active efforts to prevent been less. Humanity called for the part I bore, and where there was so much to be justly apprehended, I believe my conduct would be excused, if not fully warranted, in acting in that behalf.

I have the honor, &c.,

SILAS A. HUDSON.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, September 6, 1871.

SIR: Your dispatches, numbered 37, 38, and 39, have been received. The efforts which you have made for the general protection of life and property, during the recent hostilities in Guatemala, meet with the approval of this Department. You are authorized to use your friendly offices, unofficially, in behalf of foreigners who are not represented in Guatemala, whenever it can be done without offense to the government to whom you are accredited. Meanwhile you should bear in mind that the protection authorized by circular No. 11 is defined, and differs from the friendly offices which may be exercised in behalf of citizens, other than those of Switzerland.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, October 9, 1871.

SIR: Your dispatch No. 40, of the 20th of August last, has been received. It appears to request instructions as to whether you are officially to interpose for the protection of foreigners in Guatemala. It is contrary to the practice of this Department to sanction such interference, unless it shall have been requested by the government of a friendly country, which may not have a diplomatic representative in that where the protection may be required, and unless the government of the latter country shall consent to the interposition. As you do not specify the nationality of the foreigners whom you propose to protect, the Department is unable to say how far the rule referred to may be applicable to them. The recent changes in the government of Guatemala have been important and appear to have been warmly welcomed by you. Such changes, however, are not, on the whole, so infrequent in Spanish American countries as not to require caution on the part of our representatives in the expression of their opinion at the place of their residence, and especially in interfering in political affairs abroad without express instructions. The policy of this Government has usually been to require its diplomatic agents to abstain from all partisanship. A contrary course would create a precedent which would be pleaded by foreigners who might be disposed to interfere here. It has ever been deemed best for the diplomatic representatives of the United States to refrain from even giving advice in the political affairs of foreign countries, unless that advice shall be asked for. Whatever may be our predilections for persons and parties, how much soever we may exult in the preponderance of those whom we favor, the Executive Government here has no authority to make any pledge for their support, unless this shall be expressly sanctioned by Congress, which would probably deliberate much before giving any such sanction. Your activity and energy, however, during recent critical events in Guatemala, deserve commendation.

No. 93.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Honolulu, December 27, 1870. (Received January 18, 1871.)

SIR: The United States steamer Saginaw, Commander Sicard, was totally wrecked on Ocean Island, which lies about 1,200 miles northwest of this, on the 29th of October last. All hands were saved, (ninety-eight persons in all,) together with three months' provisions at quarter rations. Water, seals, fish, birds, and turtle are found there. The party are sheltered by tents made of sails and spars saved from the wreck.

It is with much sorrow I have also to report the death by drowning of Lieutenant Talbot, executive officer of the Saginaw, and seamen John Andrews, of Boston; Peter Francis, native of Manila, and James Muir, of Glasgow, Scotland, who were upset by the surf from a boat sent from Ocean Island, November 18, to Honolulu for the purpose of obtaining means for the relief of the ninety-three persons then remaining on that island.

The boat, after being at sea thirty-one days, during which the persons on board suffered much from cold, wet, hunger, and some sickness, but not for want of water, arrived off the coast of the Island of Kanai, one of this group, at a place called Kaliki-Kai during the night of December 19, and, while attempting to land, got into the breakers and upset, with the melancholy result mentioned. The sole survivor of the boat's crew, William Halford, of New York, coxswain of the captain's gig, succeeded in reaching the beach by drifting of the boat toward it, the action of the surf having in the meanwhile righted her.

By Coxswain Halford's personal exertions there was saved from the boat a long tin case, containing dispatches and letters from Commander Sicard and others, also barometer, chronometer, and other articles. But Commander Sicard's instructions to Lieutenant Talbot, with requisitions for supplies for their relief, were unfortunately lost in a tin case containing books, charts, &c. The want of those papers has obliged me to work somewhat in the dark while sending necessary rescue and relief to those at Ocean Island.

The natives were very kind to Halford, particularly one by the name Peter, who furnished him with food, clothing and horses to proceed to Hanalei, about five miles distance from Kaliki-Kai.

The humane services of Peter should be recognized by the United States Government.

Arriving at Hanalei, Halford called on the Hawaiian sheriff, Mr. Wilcox, and Mr. Bent, planter. All of them then went to Kaliki-Kai, where an inquest was held over the bodies of those saved, namely, Muir and Lieutenant Talbot. The latter had drifted ashore during Halford's absence, and was tenderly cared for by the natives there. There were bruises on the forehead of Lieutenant Talbot, received, as Halford thinks, from a blow of the boat, and which caused him to let go his hold of the same after being upset by the heavy breakers. The bodies were put into good pine coffins and transported to Hanalei, where the Episcopal burial service was read by Mr. Kenney, an appropriate hymn sung by two daughters of late Mr. Johnson, American missionary, and were then interred, with tears and heartfelt sympathy of the spectators, side by side, in one grave, near where a seaman was buried in 1867, belonging to the United States ship Lackawanna, Captain Reynolds.

Coxswain Halford sailed from Hanalei in the schooner Waiola, Captain Dudoit, on the evening of 20th of December, and arrived at the United States consulate, Honolulu, at 11 a. m., December 24, where I happened then to be conversing with the acting consul, Mr. Perkins.

After hearing Halford's story, we deemed it highly important to act in concert with promptness and energy, and do what the situation seemed to demand for the succor and rescue of the unfortunates remaining on Ocean Island. Our first promptings were to obtain a steam-vessel, but there was but one in port, the Kilauea of 450 tons, double-decks, belonging to Hawaiian government, engaged in the service between the islands of the group. No application was made for her on learning that her fuel capacity was insufficient for the voyage desired. This statement proved to be false in fact, as the sequel proved.

The schooner Kona Packet, of 85 tons, fast sailer, was instantly chartered of her owners, Messrs. O. A. Williams & Co., at $850 per month, victualed and manned at their expense, for an unlimited time.

At 6 p. m., December 24—only seven hours after hearing Halford's story—the Kona Packet sailed direct for Ocean Islands, having on board thirty days' full rations of provisions for one hundred men, a good present supply of clothing, blankets, medicines, vegetables, water, and other stores. She will probably reach the sufferers in about eight days, as the winds are generally fair. I wrote by her to Commander Sicard, informing him that we had also chartered for his relief the fast-sailing bark Comet of 450 tons, and that she would sail on the 26th or 27th of December with duplicate supplies, so as to provide against all contingencies of loss of either vessel named, or detention by calms, head-winds, currents, &c. The charter of the Comet was, however, subsequently canceled, for reasons hereinafter made apparent.

Receiving an intimation, late on Christmas night, that His Hawaiian Majesty had expressed consent for the Kilauea steamer to go to Ocean Island, provided I made application for the vessel; and being credibly informed that her fuel or coal capacity was sufficient for twenty-five to thirty days' steaming, I immediately addressed a letter to the minister of the interior, asking for the use of that vessel. That noble gentleman (Mr. Hutchison) gave immediate affirmative reply, to the effect that preparations for the voyage should commence on the steamer at daylight next morning; that she should be victualed, manned, and supplied with 250 tons coal, (burning but 7 or 8 tons each twenty-four hours,) and dispatched with such supplies for the shipwrecked men as I thought best to send in her, and be ready on or about 5 o'clock p. m., December 26. All was completed as above promised. The steamer left at 6 p. m., under command of the celebrated Captain Long, formerly commanding American whale-ships.

The Kilauea is well provided with extra whale-boats, and carries duplicate supplies of provisions, clothing, &c., and of those put on board the schooner, also some other articles, such as, on reflection, was thought would be needed. Efforts were made to procure and send a surgeon, to assist Mr. Frank, but did not succeed for want of time.

Previous to procuring the Kilauea, I held consultation with Captain Floyd, of the mail steamer Moses Taylor, which vessel arrived on 25th instant, from San Francisco, as to her being sent to the relief of the persons on Ocean Island. The measure was found to be impracticable, for many cogent reasons, not necessary now to be stated. Captain Floyd was ready and desirous to be of service in the matter.

Coxswain Halford is a tall, athletic man, of great endurance, and intelligent. He is staying at my house, but will take passage on to-morrow's steamer for San Francisco. He deserves well of his country, and, no doubt, promotion and reward will be given him. He is well in health, but is afflicted with salt-water sores on his body. He reports all his boat companions as having suffered likewise.

When the boat was off Kaliki-Kai, there was no food on board except four spoonfuls of desiccated potatoes; the original stock of that article, he says, saved them from starvation. I have taken his deposition or statement in writing, and herewith inclose the same; the main facts therein stated I have embodied in this dispatch.

I feel much indebted for aid and assistance received from Judge A. S. Hartwell, of Hawaiian supreme court. He is from Massachusetts, and commanded a brigade of troops, from that State, in South Carolina during the civil war.

I am so wearied by the labor and excitement of the three days past that I may be excused if I have omitted any item of importance in this dispatch.

In a private letter to me from Commander Sicard, dated Ocean Island, November, 1870, (no day named,) he says :

No doubt your surprise will be extreme to hear of our sad ending here, after having finished up all our Midway Island work, and got off, as I supposed, for San Francisco; but we cannot tell what a day may bring forth. My errand to this island was purely one of humanity, I not feeling willing to leave these parts without seeing if there might be some shipwrecked persons on the island, whom I might be able to relieve. Mr. Talbot will give you all the particulars. I wish particularly to recommend him to your kind offices. He is a brave, zealous, gentlemanly young man, and you will like him, I am sure. He volunteered at once to go to Honolulu in the boat, and throughout this affair he has been of the very greatest assistance to me. Will you please give him the benefit of your advice and assistance in the matter of chartering a vessel to come to our relief, (in case the Jamestown or some other man-of-war is not in port.) It is very important the arrangements made should be as economical to the Government as possible. I must close now, as I have a great deal of writing to do.

Believe me, most truly, yours,

MONTGOMERY SICARD.

I have promised in behalf of the United States Government that all expenditures on the Kilauea consequent upon her voyage to Ocean Island shall be reimbursed to the minister of the interior on her return.

Inclosed herewith is copy of my note to the latter, before alluded to, marked No. 2.

Telegraph dispatch to you from this legation is transmitted to the office at San Francisco by kind hands of Captain R. S. Floyd. I thought it very important a correct version of the whole sad affair mentioned herein should go forth at once to the country, and the best and the worst of the facts received correctly by the friends at home.

I am, &c.,

HENRY A. PEIRCE.

Extract from Morrell's voyage.

OCEAN OR BYERS'S ISLAND, July 12.

We crossed the meridian of 180°, the ne plus ultra of longitude, in latitude 28° 32', and on the 13th we landed on Byers's Island, situated in latitude 28° 32' north, longitude 177° 4' east. This island is moderately elevated, and has some bushes and spots of vegetation. It is about four miles in circumference, and has good anchorage on the west-southwest side, with fifteen fathoms of water, sand and coral bottom. There are no dangers around this island, excepting on the southeast side, where there is a coral reef running to the southward about two miles. Sea-birds, green turtles, and sea-elephants resort to live about its shores. Fresh water may be had here from the south-southwest side of the island, which is of volcanic origin.

No. 1.—Statement of William Hulford concerning the loss of the United States steamer Saginaw, &c.

We sailed from Midway Island at 5 o'clock p. m., October 28. The vessel struck between 3 and 4 a. m., October 29. It was good weather, but cloudy and dark; speed two and a half to three knots; fires banked; top-sails and jib set; running with fair wind.

Captain Sicard came on deck at 2 a. m., and was sitting aft when the vessel struck. The officer of the deck, Mr. Gast, (who relieved Mr. Coles at Honolulu,) had just informed the captain of "breakers ahead." The captain ordered top-sails to be lowered; just at that moment the vessel struck. Top-sails were ordered to be furled. The crew were paralyzed with fear, and the orders were not obeyed. All hands were put to work to get out boats and save provisions and other things. At break of day saw a sandy island about one and a half to two miles off. Worked all day carrying things to the shore. Removed two very sick men ashore and four or five others slightly ill. For nearly three weeks from the time of the wreck, all hands were employed getting up tents, saving provisions and rigging, making fresh water with the apparatus, and decking over and preparing the captain's gig to go to Honolulu. The launch was lost when the vessel struck. The first and second cutters, the second badly damaged, the dingey, and an old metallic boat of the contractors were left at Ocean Island.

The Saginaw began at once to break up. The gig was raised about 10 inches, midships tapering fore and aft, and a wooden deck was placed over all, with places for men to row, and with movable hatches. Volunteers were called to go in the gig to Honolulu. Lieutenant Talbot; Peter Francis, quartermaster belonging to Manila; John Andrews, seaman, of Boston; James Muir, seaman, of Glasgow, Scotland, and William Halford, (myself,) coxswain of the captain's gig, volunteered to go in the boat to Honolulu. There were put into the boat ten breakers of water, five days' rations of bread in a tin case, sealed; ten days' rations of bread in a black canvas bag, which was mostly spoiled on the passage; about two dozen small tins of preserved meats; five tins, five pounds each, desiccated potatoes, to which we attribute being saved from starvation; two tins cooked beans—could not be used, causing dysentery; three tins boiled wheat, the same; one ham, eight or ten pounds; six tins preserved oysters; two five-pound pieces dried beef; one dozen tins Lima beans and peas; four or five pounds of butter; one gallon of molasses in keg, leaked out; twelve pounds of white sugar, also lost by wet; four pounds tea; four or five pounds coffee, both spoiled. The boat was furnished with a small tin cooking-apparatus for boiling, with oil and wick. Five days out we lost all light and fire, and no means of making either; no dry tinder or wood, but had flint and steel. About five or six days before making Kawai, we succeeded in getting a light with glasses taken from the opera-glass. Suffered much from wet, cold, and want of food. When we left Ocean Island, November 18, at noon, we ran to the north to latitude 32°, then took the westerly winds and ran east to the longitude of Kawai, as Mr. Talbot supposed, but it proved ultimately that we were not near that longitude by over a degree. We then stood south. Had heavy weather while running eastward; hove to, with sea-anchor, twice; last time lost it; made another drag with three oars, which was also lost; then made another drag with two oars, with square-sail, by crossing them; that lasted for three turns of bad weather; the last time it broke adrift, and all was lost of it. Mr. Talbot was ill seven or eight days with diarrhea; got better, but still suffered from fatigue and hardship. He was somewhat cheerful the whole passage. Muir and Andrews were sick two or three weeks. Francis was always well. The deck was leaky. The boat was furnished with chronometer, compasses, sextant, opera-glass, charts, Bowditch's Navigator, almanac, barometer. Did not make land so soon by a week as we expected, the first land we saw was Kankulana Rock, near Nihau Island, on Friday a. m.; December 16. We stood to north by east, Nihau Island in sight, but to windward, all day Friday. During that night and Saturday we stood northeast by north; on Saturday night headed east, wind south-southeast. Sunday morning wind allowed us to head southeast. Saw Kawai a great distance off on Saturday night. Sunday night we were off Hanalei Bay; there hove to, head to north-westward, wind having hauled that night to the westward. We lay to there until 11 p. m. My watch on deck. Called Mr. Talbot; told him the night was clear—I could see the entrance to Hanalei Harbor. He ordered the boat to be kept away, and steered for the entrance; got near it, when it clouded up and became dark. Hove to again to the north-westward. At 1 a. m. (night) called my relief. Andrews and Francis came on deck; also Mr. Talbot. After I went below the boat was again kept away for a short time, when she was again hove to, it being dark. At a little past 2 a. m. on Monday, December 19, she was kept away for the third time. I remained below until I felt the boat getting into shoal water. I awoke Muir, and told him it was time we went on deck. He did not go, but I did. Just as I got in the cockpit a sea broke aboard abaft. Mr. Talbot ordered to bring the boat by the wind. I hauled aft the main sheet. Francis was at the helm, and brought the vessel up to the wind. Just then another breaker broke on board and capsized the boat. Andrews and Francis were washed away, and never seen afterward. Muir was still below, and did not get out or clear until the boat was righted, when he gave symptoms of insanity. Before the boat was righted by the sea, Mr. Talbot was clinging to the bilge of the boat. I called to him to go to the stern of the boat and there get up on the bottom. While attempting to do so he was washed off. When he sank he was heavily clothed and much exhausted. He made no cry. I succeeded in getting on to the bottom, when I stripped myself of clothing. Then a sea came and righted the boat. It was then that Muir put his head up the cock-pit, when I assisted him in getting on deck. Soon after another breaker came and upset her again, she going over twice. The last time she came upright and head on to the breakers. We then drifted toward the shore at a place called Kaliki Kai, about five miles from Hanalei. I landed, with the water breast high, and took with me a tin case of dispatches and letters. There was a tin box on board, with its cover broken, containing navigation books, charts, &c.; also, Cap-- tain Sicard's instructions to Lieutenant Talbot, and other papers, among which were Muir's and Andrews's discharge papers, they having shipped November 15 for one month. They belonged to the contractors, as their employes, previous to that time. Also, mine and Francois's transfer papers and accounts, destined for Mare Island navy-yard. The above-named box, with everything not lashed, fell into the water when we were first upset. I landed about three a. m. Saw no one until daybreak, when, seeing some huts, I went to them and got assistance to get the boat on to the beach. I had previously, by making five trips to the boat, succeeded in bringing ashore the long tin case aforementioned, chronometer, opera-glass, barometer, one ship's compass, boat's binnacle and compass, and also assisted Muir to the shore. He was still insane; said but little, incoherently; he groaned a good deal. I was much exhausted and laid myself down to rest until sunrise, when I looked for Muir and found him gone from the place I had left him in. Soon after I found him, surrounded by several natives, but he was dead, and very black in the face. During the day I got some food and clothing from the natives, one called Peter, and after resting myself, Peter and I went on horseback over to Hanalei to Sheriff Wilcox and Mr. Bent. We returned with the sheriff and coroner to Kaliki Kai, where an inquest was held on the bodies of Lieutenant Talbot and Mr. Muir, the former having drifted ashore just before I left Kaliki Kai for Hanalei. Mr. Talbot's forehead was bruised and quite black, apparently from having struck the boat or wrecked stuff. After the inquest the two bodies were taken to Hanalei, put into coffins, and buried the following day in one grave, at a place where a seaman belonging to the United States steamer Lackawanna was buried in 1867. Funeral services were performed by Mr. Kenney, by reading the Episcopal burial service, and two Miss Johnsons, daughters of an American missionary, singing hymns.

Before I left Kawai for Honolulu it was reported by a half-white, who had been left to watch the shore at Kaliki Kai, that Andrews's body had also come ashore and was taken care of. Captain Dudoit, of the schooner Waiola, offered to bring me direct to Honolulu, leaving his return freight at Waimea for another trip. I accepted, through Mr. Bent, and we sailed for Honolulu the evening of Tuesday, December 20, a. m. arrived at Honolulu at 11 a. m. December 24, bringing with me the effects saved as before mentioned. I went, on landing, immediately to the United States consular office, where I saw him and the minister resident and told them my story.

I add to the foregoing that when we sighted land, and talked of being safe, Lieutenant Talbot said he was fully prepared for death, and felt sure that God would take him to Himself if we had not got through, and the like of that.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Honolulu, December 25, 1870.

SIR: In consequence of the wreck of the United States steamer Saginaw, reported to me last Saturday, I immediately chartered a small schooner to go with supplies for the relief and rescue of ninety-three persons belonging to her at Ocean Island.

In view of the importance of their immediate relief, and as a precaution against her non-arrival, from wreck, calms, and head-winds, I have the honor to request the assistance of His Hawaiian Majesty's government steamer Kilauea to proceed immediately to that island for same purpose. All necessary expenses incurred therefor will be reimbursed by the United States Government. I address this to you to save time, which is so important, and for the reason the vessel named is in charge of your department.

I am, &c.,

HENRY A. PEIRCE.

His Excellency F. W. HUTCHISON,
His Hawaiian Majesty's Minister of the Interior.

No. 246.

Mr. Peirce to Mr. Fish.

No. 98.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Honolulu, January 18, 1871. (Received February 15.)

SIR: I have the honor and the pleasure to inform you of the return to this port, on the 14th instant, of Hawaiian steamer Kilauea, bringing Commander Sicard, officers and crew of the late United States steamer Saginaw, wrecked at that island, as reported in my dispatch No. 93. The number thus rescued is eighty-eight, including eleven men of the contractors' party, previously at work at Midway Island. All have arrived in excellent health. No casualties have occurred, except the four persons drowned by the upsetting of the boat at the island of Kawai.

Inclosed herewith is a newspaper slip, Captain Long's account of the Kilauea's voyage to Ocean and Midway Islands. Also copy of a letter addressed by this legation to the Hawaiian minister of foreign affairs, expressing thanks for the prompt and valuable aid rendered by the government steamer, as aforementioned, and requesting an account of the expenditures incurred for that object, with a view to their reimbursement by the United States Government. No reply to it has been received by the legation. But Captain Sicard, at an interview with the minister of the interior, held at request of the latter, was furnished with the account of disbursements, amounting to about $2,900; twenty-nine hundred dollars for nineteen days' services of the steamer, and which will be paid immediately. No charge whatever would have been made by the Hawaiian government for the Kilauea but for its straitened pecuniary resources.

Commander Sicard, with the officers and men of his command, has concluded to take passage to San Francisco in the mail steamer of the 28th instant, and not in the United States vessel Nyack, as mentioned in a previous dispatch as being his intention.

The body of John Andrews, naked, drifted ashore at Kaliki Kai, Kawai, on the afternoon of December 20, and was buried in a suitable manner at Hanalei, the following day, in a grave beside that of Lieutenant Talbot and William Muir. They repose, in a beautiful, picturesque spot, on the rising slope of a hill which overlooks the charming valley of Hanalei, with a view of the ocean beyond.

I am, &c.,

HENRY A. PEIRCE.

[From the Hawaiian Gazette of January 18, 1871.]

THE TRIP OF THE KILAUEA.

MR. EDITOR: At your request, I take pleasure in giving a brief account of the trip of the Kilauea to Ocean Island, for the relief of the crew of the United States steamer Saginaw, wrecked on that Island. By direction of the minister of the interior I assumed charge of the expedition on Monday, the 26th of December, and, as you aware, sailed on the afternoon of that day. During the first four days we experienced very light winds, so light in fact that the speed of the vessel was considerably retarded for the want of a proper draught in the furnaces. On the night of 31st December we took strong trades, which freshened by Sunday, January 1, into a severe northeast gale, with thick weather and rain. On the night of January 2 the vessel was hove-to for twelve hours, with a view of sighting Midway Island. I had been unable, on account of the thick weather, to obtain meridian observations for the two days previous, and therefore, although aware by my reckoning that we could not be a great distance from the island, was unable to define its exact position. On the morning of the 3d, the weather being favorable, I found by observation that I was to the leeward of Midway Island, and, being anxious to reach Ocean Island that day, the vessel was immediately headed for the latter island. We were, on this day, so unfortunate as to be unable to obtain a meridian altitude, and at 2 o'clock p. m., by double altitudes, found ourselves twelve miles to the northward of the island. The course was at once changed for the island. At 3.45 p. m. sighted the breakers on the reef which surrounds the island. The next object sighted was the flag-staff which had been erected by the crew of the Saginaw, the island being so low that it was not visible from the masthead until long after the surf and flag-staff were seen. At half-past four we had reached sufficiently near the island, and, as the anchorage was some five miles along the reef from where the vessel approached, I thought it prudent to lay off until morning, having, in the mean time, communicated with those on the island by dipping the flag and firing rockets, to assure them that we had come to their relief. On the morning of the next day, 4th of January, we anchored at the mouth of the lagoon, (a boat from the island having previously come off to the vessel.) After sounding for some distance around the vessel, from a boat, to assure myself of the safety of the anchorage, I went on shore, finding every one there, fortunately, well, and rejoiced is hardly the expression for the state of their feelings for the timely relief. I found them on rations of one ounce of flour or beans, and seal-meat, or sea-fowl, (albatross,) besides the few fish they were able to catch in the lagoon. During the 4th and 5th we were engaged in taking the crew and their baggage, stores, &c., on board. The articles saved from the wreck of the vessel were not considered by Captain Sicard or myself as of sufficient value to warrant the detention which would be necessary in shipping them.

On the 5th, as the last boats were coming off from the Island, the schooner Kona Packet arrived. None of the stores were transferred from her, as there was amply sufficient on board of the steamer. Captain Sicard directed the captain to return to Honolulu.

On the evening of the 5th we got under way from Ocean Island, and being uncertain of the quantity of coal necessary for the return trip, thought it expedient to take a quantity on board at Midway Island, where we arrived on the morning of the 6th. During that day and the following, with the assistance of the Saginaw's crew, we were enabled to get forty tons of coal on board. Fortunately we were able to leave on the evening of the 7th, as I was assured by those who had lived on the island that the strong westerly wind which we experienced the next morning would have kept us there for at least a week. Our passage from Midway Island was extremely pleasant, having had favorable winds and good weather. We sighted Kauai at 11 a. m. on the 13th, and reached Honolulu at 4.30 p. m. on the 14th, having made the passage from Midway Island in seven days, and the whole voyage in nineteen, passing over a distance of two thousand three hundred and fifty miles, and being detained at Ocean and Midway Islands four days. The average speed on the voyage was six and a half knots. The best day's run was two hundred and thirty miles.

Yours, truly,

THOS. LONG.

On the arrival of the Kilauea, on Saturday afternoon, the esplanade presented a scene seldom witnessed. An immense crowd of people, anxious to learn the result of her mission, congregated on the wharf even before the steamer entered the harbor. As she neared her dock, the crowd, unable to control their feelings at the sight of the weather-beaten faces on board, gave vent to hearty cheers, which were returned lustily from the steamer. The inquiries as to whether "all were saved" being answered in the affirmative, cheers were again renewed. The crowd did not disperse until after the rescued crew had safely landed on terra firma. The whole party, including the men who had been stationed at Midway Island, numbered eighty-eight persons.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Honolulu, January 17, 1871.

SIR: The Hawaiian government steamer Kilauea, having returned from Ocean Island, bringing Captain Sicard and the officers and crew of the late United States steamer Saginaw, unfortunately wrecked on that island, I have the honor and pleasure, in behalf of my Government and those individually who have been so timely, humanely, and nobly rescued from further peril, to present their grateful thanks for the use of the Kilauea, and the successful result of her voyage.

As Captain Sicard is desirous of settling his accounts, anticipating an early departure, I have to request that you will please furnish to me an account of the items of expenditure incurred for the voyage of the Kilauea, together with the proper vouchers for the same. To avoid unnecessary expense, may I ask you to cause such articles to be returned as were not used and that were purchased on that condition?

Other articles may perhaps be taken back by consent of sellers, after allowing them a small discount or a commission.

It is desirable to receive the several bills of parcels, showing net amount due thereon, and the expenditure or purchase authenticated in the usual manner.

Renewing assurances of high consideration and great regard, I am your excellency's obedient servant,

HENRY A. PEIRCE.

His Excellency C. C. HARRIS,
His Hawaiian Majesty's Minister of Foreign Affairs.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Honolulu, January 24, 1871.

SIR: In answer to your letter of the 17th instant, and in accordance with your request therein made, I am directed to inclose herewith an account of the items of expenditure ($2,965) incurred for the voyage of the Kilauea, approved by the minister of the interior.

Hoping that the same will be satisfactory, I have the honor to be, with the highest respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

WM. JARRETT,
Secretary.

His Excellency HENRY A. PEIRCE,
Minister Resident of the United States.

Mr. Peirce to Mr. Fish.

No. 99.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Honolulu, January 23, 1871. (Received Feb. 18.)

SIR: In the belief that no law has as yet been enacted by Congress for the establishment of a monthly line of steamships for transporting the United States mails between San Francisco and the Australian colonies, and in view of the beneficial importance of that measure to the interests of the United States in this hemisphere, and particularly so in our commercial and political relations with this archipelago, and that much depends upon the designation by law and proper selection of the terminal and way ports of the proposed mail service; and thinking the information herewith transmitted may have some weight in determining the several questions above alluded to, I have the honor to inclose—

Copy of an unofficial letter addressed to myself by his excellency J. M. Smith, Hawaiian minister of finance, of date January 16, 1871, containing much that is interesting and suggestive in regard to the subject-matter, worthy of consideration by the United States Postmaster-General and others.

Printed slips from Taranaki Herald of November, 1870, containing terms of a recent contract between Mr. Vogel, postmaster general of New Zealand, and Mr. A. Neilson, for mail service from and to New Zealand and San Francisco.

Slips of Hawaiian Gazette of January 4, 1871, containing correspondence between the Hawaiian government, Mr. Neilson, and Mr. Vogel—same subject.

Slips of Hawaiian Gazette of January 11, 1871. Remarks on the Australian steamship line to Honolulu; and on the correspondence above named. Also a statement of comparative distances from San Francisco to Honolulu, Feejee, and New Zealand, and San Francisco to Sydney, via Honolulu and Feejee; and articles entitled "Across the Pacific," "Hall on the rampage."

From my stand-point, and with full knowledge of the subject, I am strongly of opinion that the mail route of the steamers should be fixed by law to run on the great circle or shortest line from San Francisco to Honolulu, thence to Feejee Islands and Sydney, New South Wales, and return the same way; New Zealand to be rejected as a terminal port, on account of small population, and Sydney selected as having ten times more population and commerce, and proposing to grant large subsidy for the service. Besides, the region about New Zealand and thence to Australia is tempestuous in the general character of its weather, while the route from Feejee to Sydney is comparatively free from severe storms.

New Zealand would, no doubt, ultimately have a connecting line to Feejee if the main line is established by the United States in the manner proposed.

Two other things I beg leave to suggest:

The agent of the contractors' steamers at Honolulu should be a citizen of the United States, for the reasons named in my dispatch No. 57.

The existing contract for mail service between San Francisco and Honolulu should, if possible, be annulled, and the work and subsidy of $75,000 per annum be arranged so as to transfer both to the new line from San Francisco to Honolulu and Australia.

I have, &c.,

HENRY A. PEIRCE.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE,
Honolulu, January 16, 1871.

MR. MINISTER: The establishing of a proper steam service between San Francisco and Sydney is a matter of so much importance that I gladly give you such information as may be in my power to communicate.

It is assumed by steamer-owners and those interested that to run steamers on the route large subsidies will be required, and that the countries whose ports are connected or visited by the boats should join their subsidies on the same line.

The Eastern Australian and New Zealand colonies, whose interests in this Pacific route are identical, as compared with the route occupied by the Peninsular and Oriental Company, have so far joined together as to subsidize the line of English steamers at present running from Sidney, via Auckland, to Honolulu, and connecting here with the American line of Messrs. Holladay & Brenham. Their subsidies (New South Wales £10,000 and New Zealand £15,000) are granted for five years to H. H. Hall, esq., (United States consul at Sydney,) for a monthly service. His steamers commenced running in April last, and have made their trips regularly up to this time, transferring their passengers and mails at this port to the San Francisco steamer.

The steamers employed are the Wonga-Wonga and City of Melbourne; both are iron screw propellers, 700 tons English measurement, able to steam on the round voyage ten knots per hour, and of accommodating one hundred first-class and one hundred steerage passengers. The two first trips of these steamers, their passengers having been about one hundred and fifty persons, paid a very handsome profit on the cost of the voyage.

out at present the passengers having fallen to fifty or sixty persons; they are not paying their way.

Mr. Hall is now backed by the Australian Steam Navigation Company, whose boats are chartered for the first six months, but they now (as they have idle boats) are desirous of joining him to maintain the service. They propose, if New Zealand breaks off from the present contract, to secure sufficient subsidies from the Australian colonies to keep their steamers upon the route. These steamers on their voyage from Honolulu to Auckland follow the shortest line, but in returning keep well eastward of the Friendly Islands, in order to avail themselves of the southeast and northeast trade-winds on the northerly passage, sighting always Fanning's Island.

Mr. Hall has a contract with Messrs. Holladay & Brenham to transport his mails, passengers, &c., between San Francisco and Honolulu. The distances are as follows:

	Miles.
San Francisco to Honolulu	2, 103
Honolulu to Auckland	3, 817
Auckland to Sydney	1, 290
Total	7, 210

Their contract time is:

	Days.
San Francisco to Honolulu	10
Honolulu to Auckland	16
Total	31

The route followed by Hall's steamers fully accommodates the New Zealand colonies, and for their connection with San Francisco cannot be bettered; but not so the Australian colonies, inasmuch as the direct line between Honolulu (which lies in the shortest line between San Francisco and Sydney) and Sydney is seven hundred and sixty-six miles, or three days' steaming, shorter than through Auckland.

In order to obtain for both colonies, therefore, the shortest time, the line must branch at or near the Feejee Islands.

But though the colonies combined upon subsidizing the Hall line as the most immediate realization of their wishes to have steam connection with San Francisco, yet the necessity of a subsidy from Congress to help them develop the route with first-class steamers, and the ambition of New Zealanders to have their islands the terminus of the main line, has prevented a mutual agreement with the same company to run their ships.

New Zealand has recently entered into an agreement with Mr. Neilson, an agent of Messrs. Holladay & Brenham, to pay £40,000 per annum for a first-class line of steamers which shall make Port Chalmers, the most southern of their ports, the terminal point of their voyages. It enforces the vessels, after reaching Auckland, the most northern port, to make a coasting voyage of one hundred hours, touching at Wellington and Lyttelton, to Port Chalmers.

The largest commercial city of the islands, and the nearest port to Sydney, is Auckland.

This agreement has been entered into by Mr. Vogle, their postmaster general, under the general provisions of their postal laws of 1858, and it must be submitted to their parliament, now in session, for approval and adoption. The expectation of its adoption is based upon the compromises of the contract regarding the wants and interests of the parliamentary district, by making the steamers touch at the several ports on the coast.

Though this agreement, in its first promulgation, has been cheered by their press, it seems impossible that it will be accepted for its full term of years, since it throws upon their revenue a burden unnecessarily large, to secure a benefit that can be obtained at a cheaper price; because of their large public debt and small population of 250,000. Their parliament will remember that they already have a steam service which gives them in the main the benefits claimed to arise out of the new scheme, and that the proposals for the same service have been made by a strong London company at £24,000 per annum.

Their scheme also will not meet with any favor or co-operation from the Australians, although the contract mentions branch lines from New Zealand ports as one of the contingencies of the agreement. Their population of two and a half millions and large trade with San Francisco cannot be made subordinate to the strait-jacket of a terminal line to New Zealand.

The projected route of the steamers (at choice of the contractors) from San Francisco to Auckland, via Tahiti, will also in greater degree be incompatible with the interest and wishes of the Australians; for although the distance between the two ports, via Tahiti or via Honolulu, is upon the chart about the same, the up voyage from Auckland through Tahiti would be lengthened several days by reason of steaming the whole passage directly in the teeth of the trade-winds. As the direct route between San Francisco and Sydney lies near the Hawaiian and the Feejean Islands, and not at all near the Society Islands, a detour to these latter islands would not help matters in their estimation.

The distance from San Francisco to Tahiti is.....	Miles 3,650
Tahiti to Auckland.....	2,210
Auckland to Sydney.....	1,250

Total..... 7,110

The distance from San Francisco to Honolulu is.....	Miles 2,100
Honolulu to Feejee.....	2,710
Feejee to Sydney.....	1,020

or 720 miles in favor of the Honolulu and Feejee route. It is not necessary with large steamers, except for the purpose of connecting with a branch line to Auckland, to stop at Feejee as well as at Honolulu on a voyage to Sydney.

The commercial interests of the United States combine primarily with those of Australia, inasmuch as by its greater population and trade over New Zealand it will give the largest result, by reason of steam connection with San Francisco.

Nearly all the passengers and freight that go upon the steamers at present running is either to or from Australia.

That the steamers ought to be run upon the routes indicated by the speediest and most natural track of traffic and travel, and thereby trade be fostered, rather than be forced into impracticable channels, is a proposition to be taken into reasonable consideration by the governments whose subsidies will be given to this new Pacific enterprise. In the disagreements of the colonists, and their impending failure to combine upon one and the same route, it will be within the province of Congress to secure the co-operation of both, as well as that of the Hawaiians, by designating in their subsidy grants (if they mean to secure the route to their own ships) the route which shall be followed.

Taking for granted that Sydney will be made the terminus, for the reason that these steamers ought to become self-supporting, or nearly so, the best route is that of San Francisco to Sydney, via Honolulu and Auckland, or via Honolulu and Feejee, with a branch line to Auckland.

If either of these routes obtains assistance from Congress, the commercial interest, as well as mail convenience of all the countries mentioned will cause the subsidy to be combined eventually upon it.

Beyond the fact that Honolulu is upon the most direct line, there is another reason why Congress should cause it to be named as a way port when this subject comes up for their consideration. They have caused for several years past a subsidy of $75,000 to be paid for a steam service between San Francisco and Honolulu, and the policy which instituted that subsidy is still both sound and reasonable in favor of its continuance. They have already possession of one-third of the distance contemplated by the new service, which in fact is but an extension, and this extension was provided for, as possible, in the contract made with Messrs. Holladay & Brenham.

Now that the question arises to cause it to be done, it would seem unwise to abandon the original purpose of making Honolulu a connecting port, and unnecessary to pay for double service across the same part of the ocean.

On the other hand, it can hardly be made to appear that to abandon Honolulu in favor of Tahiti or the Feejees, it is a reasonable way of promoting the welfare of either American steamships or American commerce. The Tahitian Islands number but 200 souls all told, of whom about 600 are white or mixed blood, and their exports to California are bounded by a few thousand oranges yearly. The same is true of the Feejee groups in regard to white population, while they have nothing to offer in the way of trade.

To make either of these groups the only way station for the steamers will, in effect be to cause their permanent occupation of the route to depend upon the largeness of the subsidies, and the ability of the governments granting them to continue granting them always.

This government, Mr. Minister, as you are aware, are authorized by the legislative assembly to contribute a small subsidy to any line that can assure us a permanent connection with San Francisco and Australia, and although the colonies would prefer these islands as a way station, neither their preferences nor our subsidy will avail to make it so, if congressional subsidies to an American steamship line is adverse or hostile to such an arrangement.

I have the honor to be, yours truly,

J. MATT. SMITH.

His Excellency H. A. PEIRCE,
United States Minister Resident.

No. 2, (with dispatch No. 99.)

(From the Taranaki Herald summary for November mail.)

AUCKLAND, NEW ZEALAND.

NEW MAIL SERVICE WITH ENGLAND.—MEMORANDUM OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL.— IMPORTANT CONCESSIONS TO THIS COLONY.

Through the courtesy of the Hon. Julius Vogel, postmaster general, we are enabled to publish the following memorandum relative to the terms of a new contract for a mail service between New Zealand and San Francisco:

"The postmaster general records with much gratification that, after considerable difficulty and protracted negotiation, he has succeeded in arranging the terms of a new contract for a mail service between New Zealand and San Francisco, with Mr. A. Neilson, the confidential representative of the North Pacific Transportation Company, (Messrs. Holladay & Brenham, San Francisco,) between which company and Mr. Webb, of New York, there has been an amalgamation of interests, and an arrangement entered into by which Mr. Webb's ships are to perform the service.

"The following is an outline of the arrangement entered into:

"The contractors are to establish a line of mail steamers, under the style and title of 'The United States, New Zealand, and Australian Line;' the steamers to be employed are to be the Nevada, the Nebraska, and the Dacotah, with the proviso that the Moses Taylor may be temporarily used in the event of accident to any one of the three vessels named; and, further, that should any of the three vessels become unserviceable, others are to be substituted, to be approved by the postmaster general. The contract vessels are to be, in every respect, first-class mail and passenger steamers, and to be maintained as such.

"The contract is to be for ten years, subject to the condition that, within six months from the arrival of the first boat at Wellington, (say about the beginning of September,) the assembly may decide that the duration of the contract shall be for three years only; but the government are to use their best endeavors to secure that the ten years' period be accepted by the assembly.

"The service first commenced is to be a temporary one; and in the contract it is to be described as 'line No. 1.' Three alternative lines are provided for—one of which will have to be finally adopted, under conditions set forth in the contract, and which the postmaster general proposes now to indicate. To all the four lines one feature is common—that the main boat runs from San Francisco to Port Chalmers, calling at Auckland, Wellington, and Lyttelton.

"Line No. 1.—A steamer to leave San Francisco once in every calendar month, commencing on the 16th of February next, and to proceed to Port Chalmers, calling at Auckland, Wellington, and Lyttelton, and to return from Port Chalmers to San Francisco once in every calendar month, calling at Lyttelton, Wellington, and Auckland. Between San Francisco and Auckland two ports may be visited; these ports to be selected by Mr. Neilson, but to be within the Hawaiian, Society, Navigator, or Feejeean groups. The ports so selected are to be visited for coaling purposes only, and there is an express prohibition against any connection being effected between either of the coaling ports and any port in New Caledonia or in Australia. For this line the payment is to be £40,000 for twelve complete services; and any subsidies received from Australia or New Caledonia are to be equally divided between the New Zealand government and the contractors.

"Within six months of the date of arrival at Wellington of the first contract vessel, the postmaster general may give to the contractors notice that he adopts as the alternative of the initiatory line (No. 1) the line described in the contract as—

"Line No. 2.—This line is for a service precisely as described under the heading 'line No. 1,' but thirteen complete services are to be performed within the year, instead of twelve, and the contractors are to establish a branch steamer between Auckland and Sydney, and any other branches they please from New Zealand ports, but they are not to be at liberty to run any branch steamers except from New Zealand ports. For line No. 2 the payment is to be £60,000 for thirteen complete services, including the branch line; and all subsidies received, whether from the Australian colonies or from New Caledonia, are to belong wholly to the New Zealand government.

"If within six months of the arrival of the first contract boat at Wellington the postmaster general does not give notice to adopt line No. 2, the contractors may elect to carry out line No. 3 or line No. 4.

"Line No. 3 is similar to line No. 1, only that the contractors are to receive the subsidies from the other colonies, less 10 per cent. to be paid to the New Zealand government. They are to be at liberty to establish branches to any Australian colony or to New Caledonia from New Zealand, but they are not to run any branch boats except from New Zealand ports. The payment for line No. 3 is to be £40,000, the contractors receiving all subsidies paid by other colonies, and retaining the amount less 10 per cent., which they are to pay to the New Zealand government.

"Line No. 4 is the same as the others in regard to the main boats running to Auckland, Wellington, Lyttelton, and Port Chalmers; but the contractors are to be at liberty to run branches from the Feejee Islands to Australia, and to make such arrangements as they please respecting subsidies from colonies other than New Zealand. The payment for this line to be £30,000 per annum.

"Time.—In each of the four cases described, the contract time between San Francisco and Auckland is to be twenty-four days; and the contractors are to use all diligence to perform the distance between Auckland and Port Chalmers within one hundred hours, subject to a penalty of two pounds per hour for unnecessary delay. If the government adopt line No. 2, the contract time between San Francisco and Sydney is to be thirty days. If the contract time is exceeded, the contractors are to pay a penalty of two pounds per hour for such excess, unless a reasonable cause can be shown for it; and they are to receive a bonus of two pounds for each hour less than contract time within which any service is performed between San Francisco and Auckland, or San Francisco and Sydney.

"The postmaster general is to have power to make and to vary time tables. The vessels may be detained twenty-four hours in New Zealand and twenty-four hours in Sydney. They may also be detained forty-eight hours in San Francisco whenever it may be necessary so long to await the arrival there of the mails from Europe.

"The contract vessels are to be exempt from all port, light, or wharfage dues or charges in New Zealand. On board each vessel, first-cabin passages are to be provided, without charge, for a mail agent and his assistant.

"The contractors are to enter into bonds to the amount of £25,000 for the due performance of their contract.

"The contractors agree, subject to a penalty of £1,000 per annum, to procure from the United States an exemption from all the charges for mails between San Francisco and London, and between New York and San Francisco, which are now imposed under the convention between the United States and Great Britain. The contractors also agree to use their best endeavors to secure a concession under which wool, the produce of any colony, contributing to the mail subsidy, and the fiber of the Phormium tenax, produced in New Zealand, shall be admitted into the United States duty free.

"These are the principal features of the contract. Some details have still to be settled between the contractors and the postmaster general. Until it is known what the United States Government may decide to do in respect to some of the open questions, it may not be desirable that specific offers should be made to the Australian colonies. The contract contains ample provision for securing payment of subsidies from other colonies. It may be observed that the post-office act, No 2, passed last session, and the terms of the convention proposed to the United States (which Mr. Neilson announces that the authorities of that country have agreed to) have been signally useful in smoothing over one of the most difficult features of the contract—that of dealing with non-subsidizing colonies.

"The postmaster general, in accordance with the resolutions of the assembly, made it a condition in every case that the main-line steamers should come on to New Zealand, and should call at Auckland, Wellington, Lyttelton, and Port Chalmers. There was great difficulty in procuring the consent of the contractors' representative to the main-line boats visiting so many New Zealand ports; and the arrangement in respect to time between Auckland and Port Chalmers, with penalty for delay, is the very best that the postmaster general could succeed in effecting. The representative of the contractors declined to make any arrangement as to Napier, and whether the contract vessels will call at that port must depend upon future negotiations.

"Every one of the lines will substantially comply with the conditions laid down by the assembly in the resolutions of last session, but line No. 4, in permitting the diversion of the Australian traffic at the Feejees, will be least in accordance with the spirit of the resolutions. Unfortunately, it may be taken for granted that if the colony does not adopt line No. 2, the contractors will adopt line No. 4. They would by it, in all probability, obtain much larger subsidies from the Australian colonies than by the New Zealand route. In the case of the other lines, if the vessels call at the Feejees, they are to do so for coaling purposes only. The main steamer is to proceed to New Zealand, and no branches are to be run except from New Zealand ports.

"A subsidy of £60,000 may seem to be a large one, and especially so as compared with the amount indicated in the resolutions of the assembly. Care has therefore been taken to give the assembly time to decide whether the colony shall adopt line No. 2, or leave the contractors their choice between line No. 3 and line No. 4; but, as the point is certain to be immediately discussed, the postmaster general takes the opportunity of remarking upon it, without, however, committing himself to a conclusion as to which choice will be recommended to the assembly.

"Line No. 2 is, in effect, not widely different from the service contemplated by the resolutions. It is true that the amount named in the resolutions is £40,000, and that the assembly understood that subsidies from other colonies would go in reduction of that sum; but it must be remembered that for the £60,000 thirteen complete services a year will be secured, and also a branch line to Sydney; while the line for which the assembly approved of paying £40,000 would have been merely a line to New Zealand. The Australian colonies would have had to arrange for branch services, and would have contributed to the line only as far as New Zealand; under line No. 2, the colony will be able to offer to lay down the mails in Sydney. If line No. 2 is adopted, the £60,000 a year will be reduced by the amount of all subsidies received from Australian colonies; and if the concession as regards the convention between the United States and Great Britain be secured, (the contractors binding themselves in a penalty of £1,000 per year to obtain it,) the postages in England and in Australia would alone amount to a very handsome contribution from the Australian colonies for the carriage of their mails.

"In any case, the Australian colonies should unitedly pay not less than from £25,000 to £30,000 a year; and supposing the concession above mentioned to be secured, New Zealand would save a very large sum per annum in regard to her own mails, for the imperial government would hand over to the colony the postages collected on the other side, but which are now detained to defray the charges payable by Great Britain to the United States under the convention.

"It must be added, that the adoption of line No. 2, by placing the whole service in the hands of New Zealand, would secure that the traffic between Great Britain and the United States on the one hand, and the Australian colonies on the other, should permanently pass through New Zealand instead of passing by it, as would be the case were the contractors enabled to adopt line No. 4, and so to run branch boats from Feejee to Australia. Still further, if the colony should adopt line No. 2, not only will it include connection with Sydney from Auckland, but, by line of steamers already existing, there would practically be direct communication between Melbourne and the main line at Dunedin, Lyttelton, and Wellington.

"The postmaster general believes that the contract times are such that it would be impossible for the Australian colonies not to come in and contribute fairly in reduction of the £60,000 subsidy. The contractors have assisted in maturing arrangements by which the journey between San Francisco and New York, and from New York to San Francisco, will be performed in five days, instead of seven; and a steamer is always to be ready at New York to start with the mails for England as soon as they arrive. The transit from San Francisco to London will thus be effected in fifteen days; while from Sydney to San Francisco the time will be thirty days. Thus mails from London to Sydney, or from Sydney to London, would be delivered in forty-five days, and mails to or from Melbourne would be received and delivered in forty-seven days. Those times, indeed, would probably be materially reduced, for the contractors state that they would be able to save two days, should it be worth their while to do so.

"Supposing New Zealand adopts line No. 2, the government would be able to choose, under the thirteen-services condition, either Sydney or Melbourne as the port at which to make the times correspond with those of the boats of the Peninsular and Oriental Company; or the government would be able to give either Sydney or Melbourne an absolute fortnightly service to England. Whichever of those courses might be adopted, it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that there would be a mail service to which public opinion in the Australian colonies would demand that contributions should be made; while it is also impossible not to conclude that, as a passenger route, the service would be unequalled.

"There are many other considerations to be taken into account in choosing between the services. Line No. 2, with contributions from the other colonies, and with the English postages which would be sent free by the United States, foregoing the transit charges, should not cost much, if any, more than £25,000; while, under similar circumstances, line No. 4 would cost about the same amount, with far less advantages. Line No. 3, with nearly equal advantages, would cost about the same, but with less risk of costing more, through the colonies not contributing. But the contractors have the option, if line No. 2 is not adopted, of choosing between line No. 3 and line No. 4, so that No. 3 cannot be counted on. It will be for the assembly to decide whether line No. 2 involves so much risk as to make it desirable to be prepared for the substitution of line No. 4, which, after all, would be a very good service. If or any of the other lines would give New Zealand a service which would cost much less than the Panama service, or than the Suez service (with intercolonial and interprovincial distributing boats) has cost, while, as compared with either, it would confer immeasurably greater advantages, direct and indirect.

"The contractors propose to charge £85 for the through passage to England, (including railway fare across the American continent,) and to leave to each passenger the option of proceeding direct or delaying at different places as long as may be desired. The postmaster general is informed—although it is not a condition of the contract—that a uniform rate to England is to be charged from all parts of New Zealand.

"Should effect be given to the provision for the admission duty free into the United States of New Zealand flax, and of wool the produce of New Zealand, or of any colony contributing toward the service, another inducement to the Australian colonies to contribute will be supplied.

"It can scarcely be doubted that the establishment of the line will lead to the development of the New Zealand coal-fields, in which case it would be no exaggeration to regard the subsidy as being more than recouped to the colony by the money payments for its coal, and by the employment of labor and capital which would be afforded.

"The time-table fixed for the commencement of the service is as follows: to leave Port Chalmers, Sydney, (if required,) and London on the 1st of each month, Auckland on the 7th, and San Francisco on the 16th. This will enable letters dispatched from London on the 1st of the month to be delivered in Port Chalmers on the 15th, and in Sydney on the 16th of the following month. There will be about a fortnight for answering, and replies leaving Port Chalmers or Sydney on the 1st will reach London on the 15th of the following month, thus giving a 'course of post' of about one hundred and five days, or three months and a half. The same will apply to answers to letters sent from Port Chalmers or Sydney. In the case of Wellington or Auckland, the time here stated would be reduced by several days.

"In conclusion, the postmaster general would observe that the contract appears to be one of an eminently satisfactory nature. It will stand the test of meeting the requirements of the whole colony as a first-class mail, passenger, and commercial service, and if tested as regards its effect upon the much-discussed separate interests of the different parts of the colony, the conclusion must be that no service more likely to do justice to those interests could be obtained, even if one could be devised.

"JULIUS VOGEL.

The following description of the vessels to be employed is taken from the American Lloyd's for 1870:

NEBRASKA.—The steamship Nebraska, 2,143 tons register, built in 1865, under official supervision, specially surveyed, and classed as extra A 1 in 1869; built of oak and hackmatack; an iron frame, three decks and beams; 15 feet draught; half brig-rigged; dimensions, 370 feet length; breadth, 39 feet; depth, 26 feet; beam engines, 81-inch cylinder; stroke of piston, 12 feet; double-planked with 4-inch oak; made 154 knots on her trial trip.

NEVADA.—The steamship Nevada was built at the same time as the Nebraska; her tonnage is the same, and she is in every respect a similar vessel, except that her cylinder is 4 inches larger.

DACOTAH.—The steamship Dacotah, 2,153 tons register, was built in 1865, and specially surveyed and classed in 1869 as extra A 1. She is similar in every respect to the Nebraska. At present she is employed in the trade between New York and the West Indies.

MOSES TAYLOR.—The Moses Taylor is 1,354 tons register; was built in 1857, and was resurveyed and classed as extra A 1 in 1869.

We publish in this issue the full correspondence in relation to the subsidy placed at the disposal of the King's cabinet and privy council, for the encouragement of steam communication between this kingdom, New Zealand, and the Australian colonies. Want of space compels us to defer the publication of our comments thereon until next week.

HONOLULU, October 24, 1870

SIR: Referring to our conversation of this morning, in which I very fully explained to you the present position of the Australian steamship question, and the perfect understanding that has been arrived at between the North Pacific Transportation Company and William H. Webb, of New York, by which a line of powerful steamers will be put into operation between San Francisco and Australia as soon as the necessary details as to ports of call, coaling stations, &c., can be arranged, to effect which purpose I am at present on my way to the colonies, I now have the honor to submit, in accordance with your excellency's suggestion, one or two points on which it is requisite I should be informed, prior to my departure, and without which my instructions will not permit me to make definite arrangements in the colonies to provide that Honolulu shall be a permanent port of call for the reception of passengers, cargo, mails, and coal.

In so important an undertaking, involving the expenditure of a large immediate outlay, it is of course essential to my principals that they should know upon what they have to depend before taking action. That being so, may I ask your excellency to be pleased to say if it is understood that the good faith of your government will be considered to be pledged to the paying of the subsidy recently voted by the legislature, so soon as they shall put on a permanent line of steamers, which shall call and remain at Honolulu a sufficient length of time to take on board all the cargo that may be ready for shipment?

I am aware that, under the terms of the law, your excellency cannot definitely promise the subsidy for more than two years. For the reasons which I fully explained to you, it will be obvious that the subsidy from the various governments concerned should all be granted for a similar period. As our contract with the colonies will be for five years, it is, I very respectfully submit, a reasonable proposition that your government should agree to propose and use their influence to carry a measure to extend the subsidy to $25,000 per annum for a further period of three years. It is of course understood that you will be prepared to supply all the accommodation in respect to wharfage dues, lights, &c., which have hitherto been so liberally promised by your government.

The frank and satisfactory verbal explanations which I had with your excellency this morning give me the assurance that His Hawaiian Majesty's government will soon have to congratulate themselves upon the establishment, on a permanent basis, of a line of first-class steamers, such as have never been seen in this port, and which will speedily create a traffic which will be fruitful of important results to the future of these islands.

By the credentials which I presented to your excellency, you will of course understand that I am acting in this matter in the interests of the North Pacific Transportation Company, and William H. Webb, which are now consolidated.

I have the honor to be, your excellency's most obedient servant,

WM. M. NEILSON.

His Excellency FERD. W. HUTCHISON,
Minister of the Interior.

OCTOBER 25, 1870.

SIR: In answer to your communication of October 24, touching the Australian steamship question, I have to say that the minister of finance, in whose department the matter more immediately rests, is out of town at present, and the attorney general is on the eve of departure, but I have consulted informally with His Majesty the King, and the minister of foreign affairs, and they concur with me, as I have no doubt will the minister of finance on his return, in saying that it is the intention of government to pay in good faith the subsidy recently voted by the legislature to a line of steamships running hence to the New Zealand and Australian colonies, which shall remain here sufficient time to take cargo which is ready for shipment, and which shall take the cargo at such rates as shall not render it impracticable for producers to avail themselves of that mode of transportation. You are not to understand that we propose to dictate the price of freight, but will pay the subsidy, if our people are able to avail themselves of the opportunity.

With regard to wharfage and other facilities, we see no reason why the same privileges should not be accorded as are now given to mail steamships arriving at this port.

Communications have already been addressed to the minister of finance by Mr. Hall, who is the pioneer in this business, whose efforts the administration regard most favorably, and feel that he (Mr. H.) has strong claims upon it for consideration.

With regard to your second question, as you say, the law gives no authority beyond two years, and a further grant of the legislature would depend upon the value of the service rendered to the material interests of the country. We do not doubt that if it should be made apparent that new markets are opened and property increased by this means, the legislature will be liberal in continuing grants, and the executive government will certainly deem it their duty to urge such a course upon them.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

F. W. HUTCHISON,
Minister of Interior.

WM. M. NEILSON, Esq., Honolulu.

NEW ZEALAND, GENERAL GOVERNMENT OFFICES,
Auckland, November 22, 1870.

SIR: I take the earliest opportunity of informing you that I have entered into an arrangement with Mr. Neilson, representing Messrs. Holladay, Brenham & Co., and Mr. Webb, conjointly, for putting upon a permanent footing the service which has already been begun, under Mr. H. H. Hall's auspices, between New Zealand and San Francisco.

As it was impossible for me to wait, in order to secure your co-operation in the matter, I was not in a position to make any terms with Mr. Neilson as to your government contributing toward the subsidy; and I had no alternative but to allow it to remain an open question whether the vessels of his principals should call at Honolulu.

Let me at the same time assure you that the government of New Zealand are anxious to maintain the direct communication with Hawaii which has been commenced, and which they do not doubt will lead to extensive commercial relations between the two countries.

I have the honor to be, sir, your very obedient servant,

JULIUS VOGEL,
Postmaster General of New Zealand.

The Hon. the MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR,
Hawaii, Honolulu.

DECEMBER 26, 1870.

SIR: I have to acknowledge receipt of your letter of November 22, informing me that you had made an agreement, on the part of the government of New Zealand, with Mr. Neilson, acting as agent of Mr. Webb, of New York, and Messrs. Holladay, Brenham & Co., of San Francisco, for a mail service between your colony and San Francisco. No member of His Majesty's cabinet has received any communication from Mr. Neilson up to this moment of writing, i. e., within one hour of the closing of the Wonga Wonga's mail, but you may rest assured that this government is anxious that direct communication should be established between your province, Australia, and these islands, and that it will give every encouragement possible to secure so desirable a result.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

FERD. W. HUTCHISON,
Minister of Interior.

Hon. JULIUS VOGEL, Postmaster General, New Zealand.

HONOLULU, December 27, 1870.

SIR: Since I had the honor of addressing you two months since, I have visited New Zealand, where I have entered into a contract, in behalf of the North Pacific Transportation Company, with the postmaster general of that country, for a line of first-class steam-vessels between San Francisco, New Zealand, and Australia.

Mr. Vogel having shown me a letter which he addressed to you by this month's mail, I am aware that by this time you are in possession of his official notification of the existence of the contract referred to, and of the fact that it is therein provided that the question as to whether Honolulu shall be made a port of call or not has been left to my determination. In order that you may be still further informed on the subject, I inclose you an official printed copy of the contract, and I would specially call your attention to clause 7.

I now have the honor, very respectfully, to inform you that I am at once prepared to notify the government of New Zealand, under the power vested in me by the clause aforesaid, that I name Honolulu as the port of call in the Hawaiian Islands, provided that His Majesty's government are ready to guarantee to Messrs. Hackfeld & Co., the North Pacific Transportation Company's agents here, prior to my departure on Wednesday next, that they will pay, subject to such reasonable conditions as may be mutually agreed upon, the subsidy voted by the members of your legislature, to whom it must be a subject of much congratulation that, by means of the wise provision they have made, it is now within the power of the government to secure so effective a line as that which the New Zealand contract provides for.

It would have afforded me much pleasure to have mentioned a longer time in which to decide this matter, but the contract makes it imperative that the first steamer shall leave San Francisco on the 16th of February next. That being so, you will see that the time has at last arrived when decisive action cannot be longer delayed.

You will observe that the principle pervades the whole contract of excluding all non-contributing places from participating in advantages the expense of which they are not willing to share. It is with all respect that I feel constrained to say that I am bound, in honor and good faith to New Zealand, to see that Honolulu is no exception to so wholesome a rule. It is only fair that I should add that the vote of your legislature is the best possible evidence that the representatives of the people of the Hawaiian Islands desired no such exception in their favor.

I address the communication to you, believing that the subject it refers to belongs to your department. If I am mistaken on that point, would you kindly oblige me by referring to the proper quarter.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

WM. M. NEILSON.

His Excellency FRED. W. HUTCHISON,
Minister of the Interior.

DEPARTMENT OF INTERIOR,
Honolulu, December 27, 1870.

SIR: I am directed by the minister of the interior to acknowledge receipt of your letter of this date, inclosing printed copy of the contract made by Mr. Vogel, the postmaster general of New Zealand, and yourself on the part of Mr. Webb, of New York, Messrs. Holladay, Brenham & Co., of San Francisco; and to say in reply that he has passed it to the minister of finance, to whose department the matter more properly belongs than to his own, who will no doubt bring it up for the consideration of His Majesty at as early a day as may be convenient.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

CHAS. T. GULICK,
Chief Clerk.

WM. M. NEILSON, Esq.

HONOLULU, December 28, 1870.

GENTLEMEN: Referring to our conversation this morning on the subsidy for an Australian steamer, I will state that the government is ready to take into immediate consideration contracts that may be proposed by the agent of the N. P. T. Company, or of any responsible company, whose steam service shall carry out the conditions specified in the appropriation bill, always bearing in mind the relations of Mr. Hall to the service, which he has initiated with great labor and risk to himself, and whom we desire to treat with consideration.

The wording of the subsidy item you are familiar with, as a copy of it has been sent to you from this department.

Speaking for myself, I anticipate that a speedy arrangement may be arrived at, as the establishment of a satisfactory line seems very likely to be made by the countries that are interested in the project.

I remain yours, truly,

J. M. SMITH,
Minister of Finance.

Messrs. HACKFELD & Co.,
Agents North Pacific Transportation Company, Honolulu.

No. 4, (with dispatch No. 99.)

[From the Hawaiian Gazette of January 11, 1871.]

THE AUSTRALIAN STEAM LINE.

We published last week all the correspondence which had taken place between this government, Mr. W. Neilson, and others, on the subject of the line of mail steamers between San Francisco and the New Zealand and Australian colonies. We did so from the fact that Mr. Neilson, had, as we understood, thought fit to publish in the Advertiser of the week previous a portion of the correspondence in question, apparently with the view of demonstrating to the public that this government had shown a most remarkable apathy in grasping the advantages to this country, which he, in his character as agent of a steamship company in San Francisco, most graciously offered it. We are entitled to express this opinion inasmuch as he bitterly denounced the government in a public room of this city, a few hours after his arrival here on his return from New Zealand. We say, in his capacity as agent of a steamship company in San Francisco, with some little hesitation and misgiving, although we must believe that he showed some authority to Mr. Vogel, the postmaster general of New Zealand, or it is not probable that that gentleman would have negotiated the contract which he undoubtedly did with Mr. Neilson as agent for Messrs. Holladay & Brenham, for the establishment of a steam route between San Francisco and New Zealand. Still it is somewhat remarkable that although Mr. Neilson, in his letter of October 24, represents that he "is acting in the interest of the North Pacific Transportation Company and William H. Webb, which are consolidated," and that Mr. Vogel says, in his communication of November 22, that he "has made an agreement on the part of the government of New Zealand with Mr. Neilson, acting as agent of Mr. Webb, of New York, and Messrs. Holladay, Brenham & Co., of San Francisco," yet Mr. Neilson signed the contract only "for and on behalf and in the name of Holladay & Brenham." To say the least, there is considerable inconsistency in this state of things; but then the gentleman appears to have considered himself the embodiment of the company—president, board of directors, manager, and agent, in fact, sole owner of all the steamers now occupied on the various routes of the company, as well as those belonging to Mr. Webb, now in the harbor of San Francisco. His style of negotiation was remarkably ostentatious; indeed, so far as this government is concerned, negotiation is hardly the proper term; a demand for tribute would be a better way of expressing his mode of procedure.

It is not, however, important at present to ascertain and define Mr. N.'s exact relations to the company (or companies) in question; he may own the "whole concern," or the company may have delegated to him full authority to regulate steam navigation in the Pacific Ocean to suit himself, as the case may be. It is rather our intention at present to call the attention of our readers to the correspondence in question, and point out as clearly as possible the real position of affairs, and to demonstrate that no one here has left anything undone which should have been done to secure the advantages which are sure to follow the permanent establishment of a line of steamers between San Francisco and the colonies, which shall stop here a sufficient length of time to take and discharge freight both ways. Without this latter condition we fail to see the incalculable advantages which would flow in upon us from the establishment of such a line of steamers.

The King's ministers asked the last legislative assembly to place at the disposal of the executive a sum of $50,000 for the subsidizing of a line of steamers between the colonies of Australia, New Zealand, and this port, to be used at the discretion of the King in cabinet council, to which request that body cheerfully responded, and inserted in the appropriation bill the sum asked for, with the following words attached: "To be paid at the discretion of His Majesty's cabinet, with the consent of the privy council, in sums not exceeding two thousand dollars per month, to any line of steamers running between the ports of Honolulu, Australia, and New Zealand, making Honolulu a terminus or stopping place for receiving and delivering cargo." It will, therefore, be apparent that no appropriation was made directly to a line of steamers, (as has been claimed,) but simply gave authority to the government to contract with responsible parties willing to make this place a port of call, should the advantages likely to accrue from the outlay of a sum of money (large in proportion to our revenue) appear to justify its action. There can be no doubt that the legislature expected care and thoughtfulness in the expenditure of the funds voted, by the cabinet and privy council, and placed implicit trust in their discretion. On so important a subject it behoves the government to see that the faith thus given should not be abused.

What is the history of the matter? Mr. Neilson arrived in this city by the Moses Taylor, in October, and on the 24th of that month addressed a letter to the minister of the interior, after a personal interview, in which he states that he represents the consolidated interests of Mr. Webb and Messrs. Holladay, Brenham & Co., but, as we understand, produced no document to show he had authority to act for them. He received an answer from the government assuring him of its wish to establish a permanent steam service between Honolulu and Australia, and giving assurances of their intention to meet the wishes of the legislature, should a reasonable guarantee be given that cargo could be shipped and delivered, and that they did not find themselves left out in the cold on some day that should meet the convenience of the company. While Mr. Neilson was absent on his mission, Mr. Collie, who was well known to have made a tour of the colonies in the interests of Mr. Webb, and was no doubt his agent in the steam business, arrived here and remained some days, but we have been told that he did not make himself known to any member of the government, which, if a fact, does not show great anxiety on his part to receive our co-operation; but however that may be, Mr. Neilson returned to this town on the 24th of December, by the Wonga Wonga, bringing with him a printed copy of the contract made between himself and Mr. Vogel, for the establishment of a line of steamers between New Zealand and San Francisco, which copy he transmitted to the government on the 27th, not on the 26th, as printed in the Advertiser, giving this government notice that he was prepared to notify the New Zealand government at once that he named Honolulu as a port of call, calling especial attention at the same time to the 7th clause of the contract, said clause reading as follows :

"7. The said steam-vessels may call at two intermediate places and no more between Auckland and San Francisco and between San Francisco and Auckland, and such two places may be at any of the Hawaiian, Society, Navigator's, or Feejeean Islands, as William Neilson, whose signature is hereto affixed as agent of the contractors, shall think fit and appoint, and such ports, after being appointed, may be altered from time to time by the contractors with the consent of the postmaster general, but not otherwise."

We call special attention to the last clause of the section, which shows clearly that an agreement made by Mr. W. Neilson, on the terms proposed by himself, would have stultified our government, and would justly have rendered them a laughing-stock to the world.

We have seen above that the legislature and government anticipated steam intercourse with both New Zealand and the Australian colonies, the latter being in fact the market in which our planters and farmers are more especially interested. But what shall we say of the document to which the attention of our government was invited, when we read the following twenty-fifth and twenty-sixth articles of the contract :

"25. No mails whatever to or from any of the colonies of Australia, or to or from New Caledonia, except as hereinbefore provided, shall be received on board or carried in any of the steam-vessels employed under this contract without the written consent of the postmaster general; and for every breach of this stipulation with the consent or connivance or through the negligence of the contractors, they shall forfeit the sum of £500 as liquidated damages, to be deducted from any sums then due or to become due by way of subsidy under this contract.

"26. In pursuance of the postal convention existing between the United States government and the colonial government of New Zealand, and in order to insure reasonable contributions from the Australian colonies and New Caledonia for mail services to be performed for them, whether under the terms of this contract such contributions would be payable to the government of New Zealand or the contractors, neither the postmaster general nor the contractors shall or will transmit, or permit to be transmitted, and will use their best endeavors to prevent the transmission of, all mails to or from any of the Australian colonies, or to or from New Caledonia, unless such colony or New Caledonia, respectively, shall give such a contribution as aforesaid; and in case of any willful breach of this stipulation, the party breaking the same shall forfeit and pay to the other the sum of £500 as liquidated."

After our readers have read and pondered on the three articles presented here, we think they will be satisfied that some caution is necessary before making an agreement with any person, more especially one who does not produce authority to bind his principals.

There is much more to be said on this subject, but our space forbids a thorough examination of the contract in this issue.

Considerable has been said in the papers, here and in San Francisco, in regard to the distances between the various points on the route between San Francisco and the New Zealand and Australian colonies. We give below what we believe to be the actual distances:

	Miles.
San Francisco to Honolulu.....	2,100
Honolulu to Feejee.....	2,830
Feejee to Auckland.....	990
Total—San Francisco to Auckland.....	5,920
From Auckland to Sidney.....	1,280
Total—San Francisco to Sydney via Auckland.....	7,200
From San Francisco to Feejee via Honolulu.....	4,930
From Feejee to Sydney.....	1,510
Total from San Francisco to Sydney via Honolulu and Feejee.....	6,450

It will be seen by the above distances that Sydney is really but five hundred and thirty miles farther from San Francisco via Honolulu and the Feejees, (both of which are in the direct line,) than Auckland, a distance equal to about two days' steaming of the vessels now employed on the route. This makes a difference in favor of a direct route to Sydney of seven hundred and fifty miles, or three days' steaming. It therefore looks reasonable that the Australian colonies, being the most flourishing and populous, will eventually insist upon the main line of steamers running direct, with a branch line to Auckland from the Feejees. Indeed, the distance from San Francisco to Melbourne via Sydney, by the direct line, would be less by about two hundred miles than that to Sydney via Auckland. Tahiti has been spoken of as a probable port of call instead of Honolulu. It is true that the route via Papeete is about thirty-five miles shorter to Auckland than Honolulu, but the danger of the navigation over the direct route is much greater than by this route; besides, it seems to be one of the objects of the colonists to develop by the new line of steamers the commerce of the Feejees. These islands are about one thousand five hundred miles directly west of Tahiti, and to visit them would take steamers out of their direct path from eight hundred to one thousand miles, a delay which is not to be thought of when time is one of the principal objects.

No. 4, (with dispatch No. 99.)

ACROSS THE PACIFIC.

The Peninsular and Oriental Steamship Company carry between the mother country and the Australian and New Zealand colonies about one hundred and fifty first-class passengers per month. For this service they exact the highest passenger-rates demanded by any steamship company in existence, and carry no second-class or steerage passengers. Having the monopoly of the carrying trade, gained and assured by their judicious use of their heavy subsidies, as well as by their great strength and power of defying competition, they have had the bulk of the East Indian service under their control. Though it cannot be said that they have in any wise abused it, still we are so situated here, that we have an idea that a little competition in regard to a certain portion of the East India service may prove wholesome, and to many of the interested parties highly advantageous.

The laboring classes, and all those whose limited means compel them to take passage to or from the colonies in emigrant vessels, have been hitherto, and are still, subjected to all the privations, inconveniences, and suffering of a long and tedious sea voyage, under the most unpleasant attendant circumstances, and with little or no accommodations to speak of. The rates of passage which are charged there are cheap, to be sure, because both the colonies and the mother country have studied the problem of immigration, and have, to a certain extent, extended facilities and encouragement to its progress. But there is no reason whatever to doubt that the system of travel between Europe and America, and between America East and America West, combined with such a steamship line as it is contemplated to organize across the Pacific, should not draw to themselves all of the Australian and New Zealand passenger traffic, now monopolized by the old-established eastern routes. The inducements which it holds out to passengers and emigrants are: A saving of time, particularly for the latter class; cheapness; superior vessels, with superior accommodations; and a route which is neither monotonous nor tedious, three thousand miles of it being by land. In no part of the voyage are passengers subjected to any of the many unpleasant features which characterize the route now in vogue. It has no Red Sea to traverse beneath a scorching and broiling sun, none of the seemingly-endless tedium of the Indian Ocean, and is free of the disagreeable accompaniments of all long sea-voyages. Its advantages, as compared with travel in the Eastern Hemisphere, are numerous and apparent, and are freely testified to by all the passengers who have tried it by the aid of the inefficient and ill-adapted steamer-line that has attempted to establish itself. As a proof of this, we may state that many of those who came through with the first two steamers, and whose business in England only required their presence there for a brief period, are returning by this route in preference to the Peninsular and Oriental. Some who did not wish to again incur the inconveniences and discomfort to which they were subjected between Honolulu and Auckland, returned by the old route.

Well-informed gentlemen, merchants and business men, from Sydney and the nearer ports, have given it as their opinion that such a line of steamers as Mr. Webb proposes to start is not only a good business speculation, but is an absolute requirement of the colonies which sooner or later must be met. Here in San Francisco, as a business community, we recognize very fully all the advantages which will accrue to us from the successful establishment of a through trans-Pacific mail and passenger service.

We perceive the necessity which the colonies experience of closer and quicker communication with the old country, and we appreciate and understand their inclination for closer and more intimate relations with the United States. Into the commercial aspect of the matter it is not necessary now to inquire; of its importance and ultimate value in this respect to us and the colonies we are assured, and have no doubt that with the establishment of the line it will speedily develop itself. Recognizing therefore the mutual advantages to be derived, we wish to see a similar appreciation evinced by our neighbors. We hope to see a liberal subsidy accorded, a sound and reliable line, and such other practicable encouragement extended as may tend to advance its interests and their own, and conduce to its permanency and efficiency. As to action of Congress in the matter, we are assured that there will be no further delay, and that the subsidy demanded at the last session will be unhesitatingly granted. The report of the committee fully canvassed the entire project from beginning to end, and was as favorable as could be desired, and were it not for the unusual press and hurry of business, amid which the proceedings of Congress were wound up, the delay would never have occurred. We wish to see capable and first-class American lines of steamers developing the trade and commerce of the Pacific. We have been unsuccessful, and retarded for various reasons in our Atlantic shipping progress, and England has in many respects distanced us in that direction. But while we have this example to learn from, and while we understand its cause and see where and how to apply the remedy, in our own case, we should not hesitate to do so.—San Francisco Bulletin.

HALL ON THE RAMPAGE.

Mr. H. H. Hall, the proprietor of "my line" of steamers between Australia and Honolulu, comes out with a strong letter in the Sydney Morning Herald of November 21st, in which he threatens to run an opposition through-line to San Francisco, if Holladay & Brenham should have the temerity, and should be so regardless of their own interests as to throw him over. Hear his portentous utterances:

"To the editor of the Herald.

"SIR: From the kindly interest you have displayed in the success of the present California mail service, I feel sure that you have no wish to allow your journal to be the medium of circulating rumors regarding it which have no foundation in fact. For several months past we have been told that 'one of Webb's steamers may be expected here every day;' but up to the present there is no news of her having started.

"Now, I learn from a paragraph in your second edition of Thursday that Webb and Holladay & Brenham have formed a coalition to run a line of steamers to Australia, and that in the event of their terms not being complied with, no connection will be formed with my line at Honolulu. In reply, I beg to state that my advices from San Francisco make no mention whatever of any such arrangement, nor can I believe it exists. I hold my contract from the New Zealand government for a period of four years, and I also hold a contract from Messrs. Holladay & Brenham that they will carry out so much of it as relates to the service between Honolulu and San Francisco. Both documents are open for your inspection.

"Apart from all legal responsibilities, is it likely that Messrs. Holladay & Brenham are going to throw away a certainty for an uncertainty, and not only this, but provoke opposition on a line which they now monopolize, and this they would most assuredly do by a procedure such as that referred to.

"The performances of the Wonga and City of Melbourne will compare favorably with those of any of the American mail-steamers running in the Pacific, and I have only to charter the City of Adelaide to enable me to form a through line into San Francisco. This course I shall certainly adopt if circumstances warrant it. However, having full faith in the honor of my co-contractors, (Messrs. H. & B.,) I am satisfied that if they intend to shirk their responsibility they would at least have given me the earliest information of it, rather than have it reach me as a newspaper rumor. Trusting you will find space for this as a means of counteracting any influence the paragraph alluded to may have had, I remain, sir, yours, faithfully,

"H. H. HALL."

No. 104.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Honolulu, March 29, 1871. (Received April 20.)

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt, yesterday, of your dispatches Nos. 37 and 38; the latter inclosing copy of a letter from the honorable Secretary of the Navy, addressed to the State Department, dated 13th February, on the subject of my dispatch to you, No. 93, relative to the wreck of the United States vessel Saginaw, and instructing me to convey the thanks of the United States Government to His Hawaiian Majesty, to Mr. Hutchison, member of his cabinet, and to Judge Hartwell, of the supreme court, for aid and assistance rendered by them to the officers and crew of the Saginaw. Likewise, to make compensation to the mau Peter, or other natives, who rendered kind service to Halford.

Inclosed herewith is copy of a letter from this legation, addressed to the Hawaiian minister of foreign affairs, written in compliance with your instructions, but omitting the name of Judge Hartwell, at his request. Payments which may be made to Peter or others, will be reported to you hereafter.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, February 9, 1871.

SIR: Your dispatch No. 64, of the 25th ultimo, has been received. The assurances offered to you by the Haytian government as to its disposition to keep wholly neutral in the contest between the Dominican parties, severally headed by Baez and Cabral, do not seem to be expressed in a way to inspire perfect confidence in their sincerity. If it be borne in mind that, for a considerable period, both the Spanish and French parts of the island of San Domingo were under the sole dominion of Hayti, that it has been the policy of that government not only to oppose the independence of the Spanish part of the island, but to prevent its occupation by a foreign power, the difficulty of lending entire credence to any assurances which that government may give as to its indisposition to interfere in Dominican affairs will be apparent. The protest of the Haytiens against the recent attempt of Spain to regain her foot-hold in that island is fresh in the recollection of the public.

It may easily be understood that the Haytiens, being mostly descended from those of African extraction, who, once held in slavery, won their freedom and independence by expelling their former masters, should be reluctant to allow any nation tolerating slavery to acquire dominion in San Domingo. This feeling should not now, however, include the United States, especially in view of the fact that the equality of races here before the law is signally exemplified in the person of our diplomatic representative accredited to them.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Port au Prince, Hayti, May 27, 1871. (Received June 6.)

SIR: I have the honor to state that much anxiety has lately been felt by those who have an interest in the public tranquillity of Hayti, owing to a vote of non-confidence in President Saget's ministry, which was passed by the chamber of communes in secret session as their first act after assembling, on the 20th of April, ultimo, and before the ministers had been afforded the customary opportunity to submit their annual reports.

All the ministers immediately resigned, except the minister of the interior, Mr. Larquet, who is a man of ability and energy of character, and who was understood to be the President's chief adviser. The President, though at first disposed to stand by his ministers, finally yielded, and appointed a new ministry.

The new minister of foreign affairs at once declined, and Mr. Madion, a distinguished citizen, was placed in control of that bureau. But the chambers claimed that according to a decree of the constituent assembly of 1867 he was under accusation as a minister of President Geffrard. He was therefore suspended, and General Cauvin was charged ad interim with the portfolio of foreign affairs.

During these proceedings there was naturally great public anxiety felt, because this attempt of the chambers to share power with the executive has been the starting point of most of the successful revolutions in Hayti, and the present is said to be the first instance in the history of this country when the executive has, on a direct issue, yielded to the chambers. The crisis is scarcely yet passed; but everybody now seems to have confidence in the conciliatory disposition of the President.

Another remarkable event has been the trial before a jury instead of one before an ex parte or a military commission named by the President, as has ever been the case heretofore, of several conspirators, some of whom were apprehended with arms in their hands assailing the arsenal of this city in February last. The trial excited much public interest and discussion. When of the twenty-four two were condemned to be shot, the President is said to have peremptorily refused to sign their death-warrants, declaring that he had been forced to sign two such warrants in his life, and would never sign another.

The chambers seem disposed to push every point to the letter of the law, and the executive appears decided to yield to them. This is confessedly a new point of departure in Haytian administration.

The general impression seems now to be that the ministerial crisis will be safely passed, and that affairs will settle down into comparative quietude, if the chambers succeed in taking action to relieve the financial situation, and establish a respectable circulating medium in place of the wretched currency now in use.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, June 24, 1871.

SIR: Since the last instruction to you upon the subject, reiterated representations have been received here from the government of the Dominican Republic to the effect that, despite its professions of neutrality, the Haytian government has taken part with Cabral and Luperon, the armed enemies of that republic on the frontier, and has furnished them with men, munitions, and arms in furtherance of their designs. The facts stated, or some of them, are of a character which may not be denied by the government of Hayti. If their accuracy should be acknowledged, that government might be said to have acted with a want of good faith towards the Government of the United States, against which you will again remonstrate pointedly but dispassionately.

SIR: Referring to your dispatches No. 85, and private No. 14, in which you state that you are informed that the government of Hayti entertain serious intentions of declaring war against San Domingo, and that the British minister may take steps to interfere with the interests of the United States, I have to instruct you to be observant of all acts by the Haytian government, and by the representatives of other powers tending to embroil Hayti and San Domingo, and to disturb the peace of the latter.

You will remonstrate earnestly in case of any such acts and keep this Department well informed in regard to them. You are further directed to ascertain whether the transmission of aid in money, military supplies, or men, to the insurgents in San Domingo, can be traced to the government of Hayti.

No. 91.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Port au Prince, Hayti, October 3, 1871. (Received October 21.)

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch No. 77, of June 24, 1871, which did not however reach this legation until more than ten weeks after its date.

I understood the tenor of its instructions to be, that I should remonstrate plainly and emphatically against the want of good faith shown by the Haytian government in the observance of its neutrality in regard to the domestic strife in San Domingo, if it should acknowledge the proceedings which have been charged against it by the government of San Domingo, and to some of which allusion is made in my dispatch No. 85, of August 3, 1871, and again in my letter marked "private, No. 15," of the 8th ultimo.

* * * * *

Upon careful reflection, therefore, I concluded that your instructions would be more fully carried out if I were to embody in my dispatch, conveying to the Haytian government the substance of these instructions, some specifications to the general representations made by the government of San Domingo. In making these specifications I endeavored to keep within the line of diplomatic propriety, and to state them in manner and language as inoffensive as the case would permit.

My dispatch to the minister of foreign affairs (see inclosure A) makes reference to former dispatches on the same subject, and states that since the reports of the acts of his government which have been made, the subject of complaint in this particular come not only from a source so responsible as a recognized and established government, but are found in accord with information from other trustworthy sources, with rumors public and current; and with the well-known sympathies and predilections of his government, scarcely less could be expected than that they should be set forth for such explanation or criticism, or other regard, as may be just and proper. As to the truth of the eight specifications which are embodied in my said dispatch, although it might perhaps be difficult under the circumstances to establish them technically and legally, I have hardly a doubt. Observing, however, to the minister that they appear to be sustained by remarkable corroborations, I felt that I could not say less to him than that if they be correct, they show a want of good faith on the part of his government toward the Government of the United States, and that he ought not to be unmindful of the hazard and responsibility which his government must, in such a case, incur.

The dispatch seemed to have produced a visible effect upon the members of the government whom I chanced to meet socially immediately after sending it to the minister, although they avoided making any allusion to the subject in conversation, and I understood that it was several times brought up for discussion in cabinet meeting.

Ten days after the date of my dispatch, the minister returned answer (see inclosure B) in a dispatch quite characteristic of the government which he represents. He takes advantage of the guarded form of expression used in my dispatch, whereby, following diplomatic usage, I avoided stating the charges in an assured and positive manner, and he intimates that the allegations made in my dispatch are not sustained by proofs, and must have come from factions interested in throwing discredit upon his government, by which latter statement I suspect he intends allusion to the adherents of President Baez, and especially to the Haytian exiles and refugees in San Domingo.

He declares that the sympathies of his government are in full accord with those of the "great majority of the citizens of the United States who have a lively interest in the independence of the republic of San Domingo;" that his government can have no interest in working for the annexation of that republic to Hayti, (nous ne saurions avoir aucun intérêt à attirer à nous cette partie de l'île;) and makes again the declaration that his government does nothing to foment discord in San Domingo, but that its strongest desire is to cultivate perfect friendship and harmony with that republic.

Although the minister but faintly denies, and does not refute, the specifications of my dispatch, yet it might be surprising that he can even tacitly deny statements which, in my opinion, lack little, if anything, but formal and sworn testimony to substantially establish them beyond question.

At all events, to borrow an expression from your No. 55 of February 9, 1871, the promises and protestations of the Haytian government on this particular subject "do not seem to be expressed in any way to inspire perfect confidence in their sincerity."

I am, &c.,

EBENEZER D. BASSETT.

A.

Mr. Bassett to Mr. Denis.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Port-au-Prince, September 19, 1871.

SIR: I have already had occasion several times to address the department of foreign affairs, over which you now so well preside, in relation to the attitude of your government toward the republic of San Domingo in its endeavors to maintain its own domestic peace. In the several dispatches which I have had the honor to receive from your government on the subject, it has affirmed and reaffirmed its purpose to observe a strict and impartial neutrality toward the contending parties in that republic.

As late as the 28th of December last, I had the honor to convey to your predecessor, Mr. Laporte, certain representations which had been made to the government of the United States by President Baez, and from which it appeared that the government of Hayti, despite its pledges of neutrality, was constantly putting in jeopardy the tranquillity of the republic of San Domingo, by conniving at the organization of factions on Haytian territory and by furnishing war material to Dominican insurgents. Your predecessor, in his answer under date January 10, 1871, reiterates still again the pledge of neutrality, declaring that it had been faithfully observed up to that time, and he insists that the representations of President Baez would vanish if a demand were made for the specification of a single act on the part of the Haytian government in contravention of that pledge.

Since the date of these dispatches the government of San Domingo has, with specifications and directness, repeated its representations of the continued unfriendly interference in its domestic peace and tranquillity by the Haytian government. Under the circumstances these specifications could scarcely be expected to pass unnoticed, even if they came only from a source so responsible as an established and recognized government. But when they are found to accord with information neither limited nor unsupported from other trustworthy sources, with reports publicly and commonly current, as well here in Port au Prince as elsewhere, and with the well-known sympathies and predilections of the Haytian government, I think nothing less could be expected than that they should be fairly set forth, for such explanation or criticism or other regard as may be just and proper. Some of these specifications are:

1. That men, munitions of war, money, and supplies have been regularly forwarded to the Dominican insurgents by the Haytian government, as, for instance, in the month of May or June last, when a Haytian force of several hundred armed men was marched out from the valley of the Artibonite to the Dominican frontier, under General M. Benjamin as commander, which troops had orders to lend such aid to the insurgent Dominican leader Cabral as occasion might require, and actually did take some part in an engagement against the forces of President Baez; and as, for instance, in the month of June, when several hundred thousand gourdes were sent by messengers through the plains and Las Cahobas to the insurgent Dominicans.

2. That representatives of Dominican insurgents have, with the knowledge and connivance of your government, repeatedly found encouragement, aid, and comfort here in the national capital, even at the national palace, and in other parts of Hayti; as, for instance, when money and advice were freely given by your government, or at least with its knowledge, to some of those insurgents lately here, especially to a Roman priest named Meriño, and also to several others who were likewise aided and encouraged in concocting and perfecting schemes for reorganizing the movement against President Baez, in which movement General Martinez, particularly, received encouragement from the same source, here in Port au Prince, to take a leading part.

3. That Dominican insurgents, under Cabral's command, have repeatedly, when forced to retreat, been permitted to reform their forces on Haytian territory, and from Haytian territory to rally forth in hostile array against the established and recognized government of their country.

4. That Dominican insurgent leaders have been permitted to maintain with the Haytian authorities here regular communication and consultation, with the view of furthering the interests of the insurgent cause in San Domingo.

5. That not without the knowledge, and probably the consent or approval, of your government, a house is rented in the central part of this city at 40 piastres a month, for the headquarters of Dominican insurgents, who have a well-known resident for their agent here; and a journal in the Spanish language, pretendedly published at San Juan, was really concocted and issued here at Port au Prince, in the interests of these insurgents, for several months.

6. That during the month of August ultimo, orders were issued for Haytian troops in the south to aid in case of need, and to some extent the will of the junte gouvernementale, which was formed by Dominican insurgents during the same month, and of which, contrary to expectation, General Cabral was chosen president.

7. That the corps legislatif, during the last days of its session and with closed doors, voted a sum of several thousand piastres in such a way, and with the understanding, that it could be used in aid of the anti-Baez movement in San Domingo.

8. That, in short, at numerous times, in divers ways, encouragement, counsel, money, supplies, and other aid have been habitually furnished to the armed enemies of the republic of San Domingo by the Haytian government, or at least with its connivance and knowledge.

Such, Mr. Minister, are some of the specifications which have been made, and which appear to be sustained by remarkable corroborations. If they, or any of them, be correct, your government might be said to have acted with a want of good faith toward the Government of the United States; and, in that case, you will pardon me for remarking, not only that it would behoove your government to bear in mind the hazard it might incur by provoking the resentment of the numbers in the United States who take a lively interest in the independence of San Domingo, and especially that it should be independent of Hayti; but that it also behooves your government, as it behooves all men, nations, and individuals not to be unmindful of the penalty of at least a diminution of friendship, esteem, and credit which must ever attach to even a careless or indifferent observance of plighted faith. When one nation pledges itself to another to solemnly observe a certain course of action, that pledge ought not to be lightly regarded or lightly treated, much less to be designedly evaded.

Good faith between nation and nation lies at the very basis of all international law, of all international communion.

I seize this occasion, Mr. Minister, to renew to you the assurance of my high consideration.

EBENEZER D. BASSETT.

BUREAU OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Port au Prince, September 29, 1871.

MR. MINISTER RESIDENT: Notwithstanding the formal assurance already given to you by my government that it intends to observe a strict neutrality in regard to the events which are taking place in the eastern part of this island, you again refer to the question in your dispatch of the 19th instant, which I have had the honor to receive, and you seem to raise some doubts upon that assurance of neutrality. You rest these doubts upon allegations communicated to your Government by that of St. Domingo, which, according to your dispatch, are corroborated by reports emanating from sources worthy of credit, and which are, besides, in accordance with the well-known sympathies of the Haytian government. Respecting this point, I will answer that these different allegations, to which, however, you do not seem to have, yourself, a full and entire faith, since, if the occasion required, they could not be substantiated by proofs, come, without doubt, from intrigues of factions interested in casting discredit upon the government of Hayti.

The respect of sworn faith, the observance of solemn engagements, taken freely, will always serve as a basis to the policy of my government, which would feel injured in its dignity and honor if one were, with reason, to reproach it with having violated the principles of right and justice universally acknowledged and proclaimed by international law.

Thus, Mr. Minister, I have noted with satisfaction that you mention these allegations under reservations; and that you show how grave would be the consequences resulting always from a non-observance of conventions made between two nations. In that respect we are in accord with you, and my government holds at heart to give you to-day a new assurance that it does nothing to foment discord in the eastern part, having no interest in entertaining among its neighbors dissensions which could be hurtful to them.

Our sympathies are in favor of the independence of the Dominican Republic. They are entirely in accord with those of the great majority of the citizens of the United States, who take the liveliest interest in the independence of that republic, as you express it in your dispatch. We could have no interest in seeking to annex to Hayti that part of the island, (nous ne saurions avoir aucun intérêt à attirer à nous cette partie de l'île.) Pile, and we give you the assurance, in waiting for proofs, that our greatest desire is to live in perfect harmony with it, and to entertain with our neighbors sincere and frank relations of good friendship and commerce to the greatest advantage of both republics.

Receive, Mr. Minister, the assurance, &c.,

DENIS.

No. 254.

Mr. Baxter to Mr. Fish.

No. 22.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Tegucigalpa, Honduras, February 7, 1871. (Rec'd March 16.)

SIR: Many rumors of the probability of war between the republics of Honduras and Salvador have been circulated for some time past, although I have thought with little foundation; but now, from movements that are transpiring in the two republics, such a result would seem quite probable. The government of Honduras is taking active measures to fill its ranks and put itself in complete readiness, and, if report be true, expect to be in the field within a very short time. Hopes are still entertained by many, however, that the differences, whatever they may be, may yet be susceptible of an amicable settlement. One of the causes of difference is said to be that the government of Honduras takes exception to the course pursued by the government of Salvador in harboring and keeping in government employ and position persons who have been banished from Honduras for political misdemeanors, and stationing such on the frontier, where they gather about them the disaffected of this republic and others, and continually threaten an attack, causing the government of Honduras much trouble, anxiety, and expense. In case of war, the unprotected condition of a large amount of movable property, merchandise, &c., that is usually found at Amapala, Honduras, and La Union, Salvador, is a matter of great anxiety with those interested, as being particularly liable to plunder by one or the other party; and as many of the citizens of the United States have commercial transactions at these points, they would be severe sufferers in such case. It is most earnestly desired, by those interested, that the United States Government should station a vessel of war in the Bay of Fonseca, the bare presence of which would give them that protection so much needed. I enclose herewith a communication received a few days since from Messrs. Morris & Co., of Amapala, with extracts from letters received by them from San Francisco, presenting this matter, and the growing importance and interest taken in the trade of Central America.

I am, &c.,

HENRY BAXTER.

Morris & Co. to Mr. Baxter.

TEGUCIGALPA, Amapala, December 24, 1870.

DEAR SIR: As you are undoubtedly aware, there are political movements going on, both in this and the neighboring republic of Salvador. From a continuation of circumstances one can easily judge that there is imminent danger of an outbreak, and, even if experience did not show that the period of peace has comparatively been a long one, that one of the customary periodical revolutions is approaching. Under such circumstances, it is convenient to look out after the safety of such places where considerable property of an easy-movable nature is deposited—for instance, in this port—because these places attract generally much attention of either one or the other party; and all precedents have shown that, whenever these depots have been attacked, the heaviest losses have always been suffered by foreigners, generally creditors of natives, &c. During the revolutions of 1863 and 1865 we found that the presence of one or the other vessel of war protected only the custom-house at La Union from being robbed; and the massacre and robbery at this place would not have occurred in September, 1863, if a vessel of war had been in port. In view, then, of the approaching crisis and of the unprotected state in which this port finds itself, we beg to call your attention to the great convenience which may result from the presence of a vessel of war in this port, not alone on account of the approaching danger, but also on account of the increasing importance of this bay, which already commences to awaken considerable interest in California, and the East also as you will see from the inclosed extracts from letters from California.

There is comparatively little known about this section of this continent, and navigators coming to these waters have to content themselves with sailing directions and charts partially antiquated, partially incorrect; and a United States vessel coming to this bay and remaining here some time may eventually grant not alone protection to foreign and native property, but collect and bring before the public much useful knowledge and information, tending in a great manner to forward the American commercial and political interests in these republics.

If you will consider our above statements, and deem it convenient to make the necessary representations to the admiral of the Pacific squadron or at the Department at Washington, we think you will be entitled to the thanks of both nations, and foreigners interested in this country, and not less of the government of Honduras.

We remain, &c.,

MORRIS & CO.

Mr. Wells to Mr. Morris.

SAN FRANCISCO, California, October 31.

GEO. K. MORRIS, Amapala:

It is the intention of persons interested in Central American matters to hold an important meeting on the 10th November, in connection with the chamber of commerce of this city, for the purpose of adopting measures for the encouragement of trade and commerce between here and Honduras. The importance of this is now beginning to excite general attention, and there is no reason why a lucrative business should not soon be established. Whatever may be the results of that meeting shall be duly forwarded to you. The idea of establishing Tingo Island a free port and placing it under the protection of the United States, must be pressed at Washington. Senators Cole and Cassidy, of California, are now in San Francisco, and the subject shall be properly placed before them.

WM. V. WELLS.

SAN FRANCISCO, October 30.

This morning I had a long talk with Mr. Webb, the great ship-owner, of New York, who arrived here last night, and I shall do my best to excite his interest and his all-powerful aid in getting up a steam-line between this and the different Central American ports.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Tegucigalpa, Honduras, February 13, 1871. (Rec'd March 16.)

SIR: I have the honor to forward herewith inclosed communications and papers just received from Hon. Francisco Alvarado, secretary of foreign relations, Honduras. Under the present critical situation and possible contingencies that are liable to occur between the republics of Honduras and Salvador I have thought it proper to call the attention of the government of Salvador to the existing treaty between the governments of the United States and Honduras of July 4, 1864, and especially to article XIV of said treaty; giving assurance at the same time of all confidence that nothing will occur that shall interfere with or interrupt the friendly relations now existing between the governments of the United States and Salvador.

Opinions are still entertained by many that an amicable arrangement may yet be concluded and war avoided.

Hoping my course thus far may meet with the approval of your excellency, and awaiting instructions after the communicated facts are known to your excellency,

I have, &c.,

HENRY BAXTER.

Mr. James Maddey to minister of foreign relations.

COMAYAGUA, January 17, 1871.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: I have the honor to inform your excellency, and the government, of my return to this country again to perform the duties of my position as the representative of Mr. James Brunlees, of London, engineer of the railway for the government of Honduras.

I much regret to find myself obliged, by justice to the contractor, to appeal immediately to the government for protection to the employes of the third section of the road.

The state of things in Goazcoran, the headquarters of Mr. Stanley, director of the works of said section, is such that the lives of foreigners employed there, of the agents of the contractor and of his workmen, are daily exposed and in great danger, and those employes may be killed or forced to kill their antagonists in their own defense, both of which occurrences would be very prejudicial to the building of the road, and might, moreover, paralyze the whole enterprise. The worst is that the local authorities are opposed to the laborers on the railroad instead of assisting them. The alcalde of Goazcoran disarmed a servant of the engineer's, and declared that no foreigners should be allowed to carry arms in the town, and that, too, in a town where the inhabitants have sworn to kill all foreigners, and have come around their houses at night and told them so. The government has already sent some soldiers, but as these are frequently removed for one or two days, the employes of the road have no resource left but to defend themselves. I need not say that the withdrawal of the soldiers for a time renders the fact of their presence an absurdity, for the hostile inhabitants never withdraw. Besides, the alcalde has openly declared against the railway.

In consequence of these difficulties, Mr. Stanley has suggested that the following steps be taken:

1st. That the alcaldes be ordered to give all the assistance in their power to the officers of the road, and that they be not allowed to speak openly against them, as the alcalde of Goazcoran is now doing.

2d. That all foreigners belonging to the road be at liberty to carry arms both in and out of the towns, and that they be placed upon the same footing as the officers of the government.

3d. That some difference be made in the jurisdiction of the alcaldes over the officers of the road and the natives of the country.

4th. That the soldiers sent for the protection of the employés of the road be not removed for any other service, and that a force sufficient to prevent any disorder be obliged to remain at Goazcoran, and at any other point of the line where threats have been made or bad feeling exists against the employés of the road.

Allow me to add that I consider the petition of Mr. Stanley reasonable, and that the government ought to accede to it out of regard to its own interest in the completion of the road. I hope that your excellency will communicate this petition, as soon as possible, to his excellency the President, on whom I hope to call soon.

Inclosed are copies of two letters from Mr. Drew, with regard to which I have no observation to make; but they will confirm what I have said in relation to the necessity of the immediate interposition of the government for the protection of those who are engaged in the building of the road. Unless things be put on a different footing it will be impossible for the contractors to complete their work, and I repeat that, as an engineer of the government, I consider it essentially to the interest of the government to give them all the assistance and protection possible.

With the highest respect, I sign myself, your excellency's, &c.,

JAMES MADDEY.

Señor Don Francisco Alvarado to Mr. Baxter.

COMAYAGUA, February 7, 1871.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose to your excellency the decree which has been this day issued, declaring the treaties between Honduras and Salvador suspended, on account of the absolute refusal of that government to fulfill the duties imposed upon it by said treaties.

This step has been taken with regret, but it was necessary, as it tends to maintain the rights of this country, which would suffer detriment if the reciprocal obligations contracted by the two governments were only fulfilled by Honduras. I do not doubt that your excellency will, with the good judgment which characterizes you, regard the considerations upon which the decree is based as being eminently just.

I am, with the highest consideration, your, &c.,

FRANCISCO ALVARADO.

José Maria Medina, captain-general and president of the republic of Honduras.

Considering that the government of Salvador has refused the extradition requested on several occasions, and recently demanded, of the parties guilty of two atrocious murders, whom it should have surrendered according to the stipulations of article VI of the convention of Santa Rosa, concluded March 25, 1862:

Considering that it has also positively refused the concentration of the political refugees from Honduras, who for six years have been fanning the flame of discord in this country, and that during this time remonstrances have been made according to article VIII of the same convention:

Considering that this absolute refusal of the government of Salvador to fulfill its international duties has rendered the commission of no avail which was sent by Honduras to negotiate a harmonious and conciliatory settlement, the result of which should be peace between two friendly governments, and the strengthening of the kindly relations of two sister nations united by common interests:

Considering that to this act of flagrant bad faith it adds another still more grave, viz, that of placing considerable forces on the frontiers of Honduras, without explaining its reasons for such a step, according to article IX of the convention of Sensenti, concluded November 27, 1845:

Considering that this open violation of the treaties which bind the two republics, and the menacing attitude which has been assumed by the government of Salvador, discharges that of Honduras from the obligations contracted by said conventions :

In observance of the rules established by the law of nations, and desiring to protect the rights of Honduras, decrees :

ARTICLE I. All treaties between Honduras and Salvador are suspended until that government shall, on its part, duly observe them.

ARTICLE II. Let this be communicated to the governments of Central America, and to the diplomatic corps, for their information.

ARTICLE III. Let it be reported to the sovereign congress of the republic at its next ordinary session ; let it be printed, published, and circulated.

Done at the city of Comayagua February 7, 1871.

JOSE MARIA MEDINA.

The Minister of Foreign Relations,
FRANCISCO ALVARADO.

Señor Don Francisco Alvarado to Mr. Baxter.

CAMAYAGUA, February 10, 1871.

SIR: The continuance of political refugees from Honduras in the department of San Miguel and La Union, has been a great cause of alarm to the towns on the frontier, which are in constant dread of an invasion. This alarm has recently increased on account of the positive refusal of the government of Salvador to concentrate the emigrants, as was requested by a commission from Honduras, and on account of said governments having subsequently placed considerable forces at San Miguel under the command of General Xatruch, the leader of the opposition party in Honduras.

This situation has placed obstacles in the way of the proper performance of the work on the inter-oceanic railway of Honduras, inasmuch as the partisans of General Xatruch foment hatred among the people against the engineers in charge of the work, and some evil-disposed persons have even gone so far as to threaten them with death, as you will see by the inclosed copy of a communication from Mr. James Maddey, the government engineer.

His excellency the President has already taken the necessary measures to protect the work ; but if the invasion which is announced takes place at any point of the line the laborers must of course disperse, the engineers be in peril of their lives, and the large foreign capital employed in this great work be lost, or at least greatly prejudiced.

As those countries, on account of the inexperience of their political infancy, are constantly exposed to intestine commotions and to invasions from other States, the government of Honduras desired to secure with the friendly great foreign powers the neutrality of the line, in order that the labors which have been commenced might never be interrupted, and in order that the capital employed in the construction of the road might be guaranteed against any loss.

Among the great powers which have lent their guarantee to the government of Honduras is the great American republic, which, in the fourteenth article of the treaty of July 14, 1864, stipulated, "That, in consideration of these concessions, (those made to it by Honduras,) in order to insure the construction and permanency of the road aforesaid, as well as the advantages which its non-interruption offers to mankind, the Government of the United States recognizes the rights of sovereignty and ownership of Honduras in the line of the road ; and for the same reason it positively and effectively guarantees its entire neutrality so long as the United States shall enjoy the privileges granted in the foregoing articles, &c."

In virtue of this guarantee on the part of the United States of the non-interruption of a work in which mankind is so deeply interested, and to prevent the loss of or any injury to the large foreign capital which is employed therein, his excellency the President of Honduras, earnestly requests, through me, the very honorable Mr. Baxter, minister of the United States, to be pleased to notify the government of Salvador to refrain from attacking or occupying any point of the line of the railway from Amapala to Puerto Caballos in case of a war with Honduras, giving it to understand that any aggression, occupation, or attack on any of the points of the line aforesaid will render it responsible for any injury which may be done to the work in consequence of its interruption, and for any losses which may be suffered by the engineers, as likewise for any diminution of the value of the capital employed in the work.

This step, which his excellency the President hopes will be taken by his excellency Mr. Baxter, in consideration of the friendly and cordial relations which happily exist between the Government of the United States, of which your excellency is a worthy representative, and that of the republic of Honduras, is only designed to prevent the aforesaid injuries to the work of building the road ; for, in the event of an invasion by the government of Salvador, this government feels confident that it possesses the elements and resources necessary for the defense of the State.

I beg your excellency to be pleased to give me a reply in due time to this note, and to accept, at the same time, the assurance of my respect and high consideration.

FRANCISCO ALVARADO.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, March 20, 1871.

SIR: Your dispatches Nos. 22 and 23, of the 7th and 13th ultimos, have been received. It is to be hoped that the hostilities to which they refer as apparently impending between Honduras and Salvador may not take place. The government of the former republic, however, seems to have been premature in applying to this Government for the fulfillment of its guarantee of neutrality to the railway in course of construction between the two oceans across its territory. It has not hitherto been supposed that the obligation of the United States to maintain that neutrality would become perfect except upon the completion of that railway, as the charge was assumed as a consideration for advantages promised, the realization of which obviously cannot begin so long as the road shall be in an unfinished state. In any event, however, a proper case under the treaty will not be presented until the forces of Salvador shall have actually occupied the territory claimed to have been guaranteed. When such an occupation shall have taken place, the real nature and extent of the obligation of the United States in the matter shall receive further and candid consideration. It is proper, however, that the government of Salvador should have been apprised, as it has been through you and Mr. Torbert, that the claim to the guarantee of this Government exists. The mere knowledge of that fact may, it is hoped, check the grievance which appears to be apprehended.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Tegucigalpa, Honduras, April 1, 1871. (Received May 2.)

SIR: Thus far all endeavors to arrive at a peaceable settlement of the difficulties between Honduras and Salvador have proved a failure, and on the 5th of last month war was declared by Honduras. This step was avowedly taken by Honduras on account of the invasion of their territory by a force of Salvadorians numbering about one hundred and twenty men, and making an attack on a small police guard of thirty men, stationed at a small town near the frontier (Goascoran) merely for the protection of the workmen and works of the railway against local raids. On the 16th, a division of the army of Honduras, commanded by General Lope, crossed over into Salvador and, at Pasaquina, attacked a force of Salvadorians, were repulsed and forced to retreat, sustaining considerable loss. Since this, President Medina, at the head of the Honduras forces, has crossed over into Salvador and, it is reported has had several engagements and met with decided success, which reports, however, need further confirmation. The same reports of success would undoubtedly be carried to Salvador with reference to the success of the Salvadorian troops in Honduras. On Thursday, (30th of March,) a detachment of General Xatruch's division of Salvadorians, numbering about one hundred men, marched into this city, which is entirely undefended, (and with a decided feeling of opposition to President Medina,) taking full possession. To-day, General Xatruch, commanding in person, occupies the city with about eight hundred troops, and, it is reported, will, on Monday, march on Comayagua. I forward herewith correspondence with the secretary of foreign relations of Salvador and also of Honduras with reference to the treaty of July 4, 1864, between the United States and Honduras, and the guarantees of neutrality as to the interoceanic railway therein contained. Comayagua, the capital of Honduras, is on the direct line of the railway as surveyed and being worked, and the principal offices of the engineers and conductors of the second section are here located, making it an important point as to the railway interests. Honduras has not made the city of Comayagua a base of military operation, nor has it had stationed here more than a reasonable and ordinary police guard, leaving it entirely defenseless as against an invading force.

I would respectfully ask instructions, under these circumstances, as to what extent would the conditions of the said treaty bear upon the protection of the private and public property of the capital of Honduras, and, further, as to the free ports of Amapala and Porto Caballo.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Tegucigalpa, Honduras, February 13, 1871.

SIR: Owing to the very unsettled state of affairs between the republics of Honduras and Salvador, and the possible contingency of a war between the two republics, and in such event invasion of Honduras by the forces of Salvador, your excellency will permit me to make reference to a treaty existing between the Government of the United States and the government of Honduras of July 4, 1864, more especially the guarantees by the Government of the United States to the government of Honduras, with reference to the route, building, and permanence of the Interoceanic Railway, particularly referred to in article 14 of said treaty, a part of section 2 of said article reading as follows: "In consideration of these concessions, in order to secure the construction and permanence of the route or road herein contemplated, and also to secure for the benefit of mankind the uninterrupted advantages of such communication from sea to sea, the United States recognizes the rights of sovereignty and property of Honduras in and over the line of said road, and for the same reason guarantees positively and efficaciously the entire neutrality of the same so long as the United States shall enjoy the privileges conceded to it in the preceding section of this article, &c. &c."

I have perfect confidence that nothing, under any circumstances, will occur that shall in any manner interfere with or interrupt the friendly relations and kindly understanding now existing between the governments of the United States and Salvador.

Allow me to express a most earnest hope that the present differences existing between the republics of Honduras and Salvador may be amicably arranged, and that the horrors of a war may be avoided.

With the assured best wishes for his excellency, the President, and the continued peace and prosperity of your favored republic, I have the honor to be, with many regards,

SAN SALVADOR, March 6, 1871.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your excellency's dispatch of the 13th ultimo, wherein, in view of the misunderstanding existing between this government and that of Honduras, and for the contingency of the invasion of the latter country by the forces of Salvador, you call the attention of my government to the treaty concluded between the United States and Honduras July 4, 1864, and especially to the guaranty, stipulated in article 14, of the neutrality of the line of the railway, stating, at the same time, the confidence which you feel that nothing will be done by this government in contravention of the friendly relations which exist between the United States and Salvador.

The desires of his excellency the President of this republic being in harmony with those of your excellency with regard to the avoidance of any cause of misunderstanding with the Government of the United States, on account of the neutrality to which you allude, he had already determined to respect the stipulated neutrality; but my government has considered, on the other hand, that if that of Honduras does not respect the neutrality agreed upon, making use of the territory of the railway for operations against Salvador, the guaranty of the United States will be converted into a privilege highly prejudicial to this republic, and, in view of this fact, it has required, as a condition, that the government of Honduras shall not violate the same on its part. Unfortunately, my government has received positive information that various vessels have left the port of Amapala, armed and equipped for warlike purposes, so as to capture vessels from the smaller ports of Nicaragua bound to this city: and finally, one of said vessels has committed the manifestly hostile act of seizing and holding as a prisoner of war, at Amapala, Lieutenant José Maria Ballecillos, who was on his way to this republic, likewise maltreating the mate of the vessel on board of which he was. It is, moreover, positively known that the government of Honduras has forbidden the sailing of small vessels between the ports of Amapala and La Unión, which act is in direct violation of the afore-mentioned neutrality, according to which no alteration can be made in private relations in the port of Amapala. Events of this character, which may continue to occur in Honduras, with the connivance of that government, and in violation of neutrality, would undoubtedly relieve Salvador from any obligation contracted by it with regard to respecting the guaranty of the United States; wherefore, by order of the President of the republic, I must inform your excellency, as I informed General Torbert, that the government of Salvador positively recognizes the neutrality of the territory of the railway, but it demands an effective reciprocity on the part of the government of Honduras, as I have already stated.

I thus reply to your excellency's aforesaid dispatch, and in so doing I have the high honor to subscribe myself your very obedient servant.

SIR: The government has this day learned that a division from Salvador, under the command of General Miranda, invaded the territory of the State on the 22d instant, at

Goazcoran, and that a portion of these troops occupied that town, while the other had gone to Langue.

As it is very possible that the expedition may advance on this capital, which is one of the most important points on the line of the railway, because the engineers in charge of the works have their workshops established here, and as the government has not taken this as a base of operations, on account of its being neutral ground, I declare to your excellency, in the name of my government, that in case the forces of Salvador occupy this capital, its inhabitants and their interests are under the protection of the great powers that have guaranteed the neutrality, one of those powers being the great American republic, which your excellency worthily represents in this country.

The government, therefore, hopes that your excellency will be pleased to take the necessary steps to protect this city, and others on the line of the railway, from a crime, since there is not even a pretext for their being occupied or molested by the enemies of Honduras.

By order of the government I address the present communication to your excellency, hoping that you will be pleased to answer me in due time, and to accept the assurances of my respect and consideration.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 24th ultimo, informing me that the government had been informed of the invasion of Honduras by a division of Salvador troops, commanded by General Miranda, and that it is very possible that the expedition should intend to move against the capital, and in such case it would be highly detrimental to the interests of the interoceanic railway.

Permit me to say that the attention of the government of Salvador has been called to the existing treaty of July 4, 1864, between the United States and Honduras, and particularly to the guarantees of neutrality affecting the route, building, and permanence of the Interoceanic Railway, and that my Government will most assuredly hold the government of Salvador responsible should it disregard or ignore the terms of said treaty.

I inclose herewith a copy of my communication to the secretary of foreign relations of Salvador with reference to the treaty of 1864, and its guarantees, and a copy of his reply thereto for your information.

MY DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 24th ultimo, officially asking protection for the city of Comayagua in case of its occupation by the troops of Salvador, (as you say is to be feared,) which you doubt not I will give, in virtue of the existing treaty. In reply, permit me to say that the government of Salvador is well aware that Camayagua is on the line of the Honduras Interoceanic Railway, and being apprised of the treaty existing between the United States and Honduras of July 4, 1864, both myself and the United States minister resident in Salvador (General Torbert) will most assuredly give it due consideration.

It would, in my opinion, be exceeding my authority to officially authorize the raising of the United States flag as a signal of protection in the principal plaza of Camayagua, (as you suggest,) in case of the occupation of the city by the troops of Salvador; but permit me further to say that the government of Salvador will be held strictly accountable by my Government for any disregard of the conditions and stipulations of the referred to treaty.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 12, 1871.

SIR: Your dispatch No. 25, of the 1st ultimo, has been received. The Department has already instructed you in regard to the obligations of the United States to maintain the neutrality of the railway between the two oceans, through Honduras. That obligation can in no event be construed as imposing upon this Government the duty of forcible intervention in quarrels between Honduras and her neighbors, even if the advantages promised to the United States were available by the completion of the railway. If that work were in a condition to perform the service between the Atlantic and the Pacific for which it was intended, and that service were to be forcibly obstructed or interrupted by a foreign power, especially with a view to divest Honduras of her right of eminent domain in the railway, it would be incumbent upon their government first to remonstrate against such obstruction or interruption. If this should be unheeded or persisted in, the aggressor might then be warned of the consequences, and if this warning also should be fruitless, the President might then apply to Congress for authority and means to carry the guaranty of neutrality into effect. That guaranty, however, by no means implied that the United States are to maintain a police or other force in Honduras for the purpose of keeping petty trespassers from the railway. This would be a measure contrary to the dignity of Honduras as an independent republic, and contrary to that cardinal policy of non-intervention in ordinary cases, which has hitherto characterized the United States.

UNITED STATES LEGATION, YOKOHAMA,
Japan, January, 20, 1871. (Received February 20.)

SIR: I have the honor to inform you of the attempted assassination in the streets of Yeddo on the 14th instant of two British subjects, Messrs. Dallas and King. They were very seriously wounded by the sword of the assailant, who approached them from behind, in the night, while they were walking quietly along the streets. Both are stated to be now in a fair way of recovery.

The attack further proves the insecurity of foreigners in Japan when not constantly guarded, and forms rather a curious commentary on a proclamation issued by the British minister here to his subjects only a very few days prior to the date of this attack, assuring them that they were perfectly safe to go anywhere within the treaty limits of Yeddo without guards.

Soon after this assault was made I received the inclosed letter (inclosure No. 1) from their excellencies the ministers for foreign affairs, informing me of it, and of the measures that had been taken to arrest the offenders. I at once replied to them, thanking them for their courtesy, expressing my regret over the unfortunate occurrence, complimenting them upon their activity in attempting to arrest and bring to punishment those would-be assassins; but assuring them that in addition to the arrest and punishment of men for acts of this nature, I felt compelled to call upon them to adopt some measures to prevent a repetition of such occurrences, and suggesting to them the enactment and enforcement of a law by their government compelling a general disarming of their people, except officers and soldiers on duty within the limits of treaty ports where foreigners were allowed to go. (Inclosure No. 2.)

At a conference of foreign representatives, held on the 17th instant, and after I had written and dispatched the foregoing letters upon the subject, it was agreed that we would all address them a letter of a similar character, but calling for, or recommending this disarming process to apply throughout the empire.

I consented to this for the sake of co-operation, and forwarded to them a letter such as was agreed upon, a copy of which I inclose. (inclosure No. 3,) although my own judgment was that the position assumed by me in the first dispatch was the more correct one, namely, to ask its operation only within limits where our people are allowed to go, and where we might, I thought, reasonably claim to be heard about what laws should be adopted. And also, as it would be from its narrow limit more easy of execution, our recommendation would soon probably be effectual.

TOKU, the 24th of the 11th month, 3d year Muji.

YOUR EXCELLENCY: We regret to inform you that two English subjects, Mr. Dallas and Mr. King, in the employ of the Japanese College, have been attacked from the rear by certain Japanese, on the street Kanda Nabechio, last night, the 23d of the 11th month, about 10 o'clock, thereby they have received seven wounds on their backs: and they ran immediately into the house of Yamatoga Kechibu, near the place where the accident happened; accordingly the master of the said house hastened to the guard-house, stationed in its vicinity, to give notice of the occurrence, and also he sent for two Japanese doctors in its vicinity, by whom medical attendance was given to their wounds. We are exceedingly sorry to say that the offenders have escaped from the spot and their trace is unknown. Every possible means, however, to secure them was at once taken by the Tokrifu.

With respect and consideration,

Mr. DeLong to Minister for Foreign Affairs.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,
Yokohama, January 15, 1871.

Your excellency's dispatch of yesterday, conveying to me the startling information of the assault made upon Messrs. Dallas and King, was received by me to-day. Thanking you for it, and complimenting you and all of the authorities of your government for the remarkable degree of activity manifested in the attempts to arrest the perpetrators, I beg leave to assure you of my great regret for this most important affair.

Such occurrences as these, I beg leave to assure you do more to impair the credit of the Empire abroad than years of effort on the part of your well-disposed people can do to build it up.

These acts discourage your friends, and will develop a disposition in the foreign mind for retaliation which may one day assume form and involve your government in the gravest consequences.

I beg leave to assure you that I am convinced of the utter insecurity of foreigners, even within the treaty limits of the open ports of your Empire.

Something should at once be done, not merely to avenge this or similar atrocities, but to prevent their recurrence.

I can see but one way of effecting the result desired, and that is for your government to prohibit by law the carrying of arms by your people within the treaty limits where foreigners are allowed to go, excepting, of course, your officials, soldiery, and officers on duty. This is a simple, and will prove an efficacious remedy, and I can see no other.

Outrages of this kind must be expected so long as one-half of the Japanese people in these cities are allowed constantly to carry two swords about with them.

I beg leave to urge upon you and your government the expediency of at once adopting a law of this nature for the government of the treaty ports.

With respect,

C. E. DeLONG.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,
YOKOHAMA, JAPAN, January 30, 1871.To their Excellencies the Ministers of Foreign Affairs, &c., &c. :

I beg leave to inform your excellencies that since having answered your communication conveying to me the sad intelligence of the unfortunate assault recently made in Yeddo upon Messrs. Dallas and King, I would add to what I have already said, the assurance that the foreign representatives have heard of this outrage with deep concern. We had hoped that the establishment of the government of His Majesty the Tenno, would have been distinguished by a cessation of attacks upon the lives of foreigners, and we regret, therefore, to see in the present instance a repetition of so grave a crime. The two Englishmen had not provoked the attack. They were walking quietly in the streets when one or more Japanese stole up behind them under the cover of darkness, and cut them down with the long swords usually carried by the armed class. It is only too evident to all of the foreign representatives, that in the ranks of the Japanese sworded class there are men who are ready to use their weapons for the worst purposes, and who think little of taking the lives of their fellow-men. It is, also, evident that the disposition to crime is greatly encouraged by the light degree of restraint to which these dangerous men are subjected, and by the permission given them to wear their deadly weapons on all occasions.

The sword should be the symbol of honor and distinction, and should be intrusted only to those who will not disgrace it, but how frequently many men of the sworded class are seen in the streets of Yeddo in an excited state, threatening defenseless people with their weapons, and cutting at dogs, or committing other offenses. Surely, such men are not worthy of the privilege of carrying arms, and how can the government who allows them to do so disclaim responsibility for the violence they commit.

I trust that the measures now being taken by the government to bring to justice the Japanese who attacked Messrs. Dallas and King, will speedily prove successful, as the value of punishment in so serious a case depends greatly on the promptitude with which it is inflicted. But the foreign representatives all feel that the punishment due in the present instance will not alone suffice to protect their countrymen in Yeddo, or elsewhere, against the recurrence of similar violence, and they consider, therefore, that it is the duty of the Japanese government to take more resolute measures than they have hitherto done for controlling disorderly men of the sworded class. It is obvious that such danger would be avoided if officers only were allowed to wear their swords habitually, and if men of the common class were forbidden to carry these arms except when engaged on some public duty. The foreign representatives consider themselves bound, therefore, to earnestly urge on the Japanese government the adoption of a measure of this nature. If the latter should think from the trouble that it may entail it would be well for them to reflect on the danger to which they will expose themselves by allowing the lives of the subjects and citizens of all the treaty powers in Japan to be imperiled by a particular class of unruly Japanese, and on the reproach which the latter brings upon the country by such outrages as those of which the foreign representatives now complain.

With respect,

C. E. DELONG.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 21, 1871.

It is to me inconceivable that there are no courts in Japan. There must be tribunals, or officers of some kind, for settling civil controversies. The sixth article of the treaty of 1858 (Consular Regulations, page 157) refers to such courts. The treaty in effect, remits American creditors of Japanese subjects to such courts, and on general principles they must accept such remedies as the government of Japan provides for its own subjects, waiting for diplomatic intervention, till the case of a denial of justice is established. If the minister will instruct his countrymen on this subject he will be relieved of the duties of an attorney in private controversies. * * *

It is not deemed advisable to propose or ask of Congress, a measure providing for an examiner of claims in Japan. The minister should not be deprived of his full responsibility about urging claims, but it would be well for our ministers everywhere to refrain from anything like a peremptory presentation of a claim until after it has been examined in this Department, except in cases of urgent emergency. The Government has frequently found itself at quite an advanced stage of the discussion of a doubtful claim before this Department had any information, or, if any, inadequate information for a judgment upon the case.

SIR: Referring to my dispatch to you by the last mail, No. 155, about the attempted assassination of Messrs. YOKEI, 26th of 12 month of 3d year Myi.

YOUR EXCELLENCY: We have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's dispatch of January 20. Our government has actually, and in accordance with your excellency's request in that dispatch, instructed the strictest and minutest search, with the object of arresting the perpetrators of the attempt to assassinate the two Englishmen in the streets of Yokei, on the night of the 13th ultimo. They have already been apprehended and are being interrogated.

Your excellency in that dispatch declares it to be your opinion that, in order to insure that the measures to be taken by our government for preventing the recurrence of such acts of violence in the future may be effective, unofficial persons and the lower class of officials should cease to wear swords. This proposal has been suggested by your excellency's desire to insure the permanence of the friendly relations which exist between our respective countries, and, from a foreign point of view, we agree that the belief that order easily could be kept by adopting a principle which strikes at the root of the matter is a natural and a just one.

The wearing of the sword by the Japanese Samurai, however, arose originally out of the lawless condition of the middle ages, when every man made fighting his business, and distrust and uneasiness were so great that it became necessary to wear a sword in self-defense. Since the power of government has been in the hands of the military class, the sword has become a thing demanded by etiquette, and the practice is one of gradual growth.

Even at the present time it is the ingrained habit of every soldierly heart to look upon the absence of the sword as a breach of etiquette. The proof of its being a thing of etiquette is, that farmers and tradesmen distinguished for eminent services have come to have the privilege of wearing the sword, and this being considered a special distinction, is in accordance with the theory of the government which has existed for many years. If we were to suddenly revolutionize this practice, without creating some distinction to replace the sword, and making the Samurai class discover and accept the reasonableness of not constantly wearing these weapons, the Samurai and the common people would be discontented, and we have great fears that they might resort to other weapons for malicious purposes. For these reasons, we are of the opinion that it would be very difficult to adopt at the present moment the proposition contained in your excellency's letter.

We shall, of course, carefully remodel the arrangements for the preservation of order in the three metropolitan cities and at the different open ports, and especially strict laws will be enacted for the arrest of Samurai or others who commit lawless acts. Although prohibitory laws exist already against those who are a nuisance in the streets, who get drunk or incapable, or wildly make an improper use of their swords to kill animals or frighten women and children, we intend to increase the strictness of these laws, and to punish, in proportion to the offense perpetrated, any Samurai of the upper or lower classes, and even persons of high rank, by taking away the sword in certain cases, never to be returned, and generally to put in force all the legislation by which such acts may be prevented.

We have lately commenced to take a census, but have as yet been unable to complete it throughout the country.

We intend to begin with Yokoi, and inquire into the origin and antecedents of every person residing here; and as there are many persons who wear swords without being entitled to do so, we shall, without admitting any representations, strictly enforce the discontinuance of the practice in their case. And in this way our government is of the opinion that before long the result will be successfully obtained, and that the streets will be quiet, and men will be able to walk them by day or by night with a perfect sense of security.

With respect, &c.,

UNITED STATES LEGATION,
Yokohama, Japan, March 8, 1871. (Received April 24.)

SIR: For some time past the Japanese authorities have been making frequent application to the foreign representatives to have a game law put in force at the different treaty ports. Finally, at the request of my colleagues, I drew up a draught of such a law, which we submitted to the Japanese ministers, who, after having it under their consideration for some time, finally advised us that what they really wanted was not a game law, as we understood it, but a law to prohibit hunting by foreigners in temple-groves, castle-moats, and on game-preserves, and also a law to prohibit the use of fire-arms in cities, and near inhabited dwellings, &c. We then told them to write to us, letting us know exactly what they did want, and on the 15th day of February, 1871, I received a letter from them on this subject. (inclosure No. 1.) My colleagues also received identical letters, and we discussed with each other what action we could take to carry out the ideas and wishes of the Japanese. My suggestion at first was that the Japanese should promulgate a law of this nature, with a penal clause in it, and that then the foreign representatives should notify it to their people, and instruct their consular officers to enforce it. In reply to this suggestion, my British colleague said that British subjects could only be tried and punished in Japan for violation of British law, and called my attention to the fact that such was the rule with all other foreigners.

Referring to the first subdivision of Article 4 of the treaty of 1857, (see consular regulations No. 153,) you will find that such is indeed the rule.

This left me at a loss to know just what to do. Subsequently I received the inclosed letter (inclosure No. 2) from my colleague, Sir Harry S. Parkes, accompanied with a draught of regulations on the subject, that he proposed to issue, (inclosure No. 3) I at once replied to him (inclosure No. 4) submitting in return a draught of certain regulations, which I proposed, with your consent, to issue, (inclosure No. 5.)

This matter again brings squarely before us the necessity for Congress to legislate generally for our people here, or vest the power with the representatives to make regulations, and give them the force of law until passed upon by Congress.

You are aware that we have but little Federal legislation regulating mere municipal matters, defining crimes, or providing punishments for many offenses. We have no common law on the subject; but have left each State to regulate these matters for itself. I therefore find myself unable to help these authorities, to prevent these mean wrongs that foreigners here occasionally engage in; such as shooting birds and hares in temple-groves, burial-grounds, &c., and shooting ducks and geese in castle-moats, and in a hundred other ways outraging Japanese ideas of civility and decency, besides imperilling themselves and the peace of each community. This is but a fair illustration of the necessities that almost daily arise for some legislation for the government of our people in Japan.

With due respect, I submit this matter to you for advice and instruction.

I have the honor, &c.,

C. E. DE LONG.

TOKEI, the 20th of the 12th month of the 3d year of Meidi.

YOUR EXCELLENCY: At the last general conference held between us and foreign representatives, the matter respecting the shooting regulations was not concluded, because some articles of the said regulations cannot be applied both to the foreigners and Japanese; consequently we are desirous to adopt the following rules for the time being:

That the chasing of all kinds of beasts and birds is forbidden within the inclosures as well as the different places granted to the Japanese by the government for chasing at their occupations, and also in the compounds of churches and temples where the chasing is generally forbidden, although they are in the treaty limits; on such places the law of prohibition of chasing is posted on board in the Japanese, with foreign translation, for the guidance both of foreigners and Japanese.

That any person who shall have brought any damage on crops by chasing, shall pay a proper compensation to the proprietor.

That any person who violates the foregoing rules shall be arrested by the Japanese policemen, and conducted to the consul of his nationality, who will duly punish such offender according to his own law.

We request you to notify the foregoing to your countrymen without delay, and as soon as we hear from you on this subject, a notification will be issued among the Japanese.

With respect and consideration,

Harry S. Parkes to C. E. De Long.

HER BRITANNIC MAJESTY'S LEGATION,
Yokohama, March 6, 1871.

SIR AND DEAR COLLEAGUE: With reference to the consultations of the foreign representatives, held among themselves and with the Japanese ministers, relative to the regulations claimed by the latter for the prevention of the improper use of fire-arms by foreigners when in pursuit of game, I have the honor to forward a copy of a draught of two regulations which I have prepared for the above purpose, and which I am empowered to establish in the case of British subjects, and beg you will be so good as to inform me whether you concur in the adoption of regulations of this nature, and also as to the course which you propose to take in order to meet this demand of the Japanese government in the case of the United States.

I have the honor, &c.,

H. S. PARKES.

Draught-Notification.

The Japanese government, having applied to the undersigned and the representatives of the other treaty powers to establish regulations which shall prevent the improper use of fire-arms, or the pursuit of game by foreigners near to temples or to the dwellings of the people, or in inclosed preserves, the undersigned, in pursuance of sections 85 and 86 of the order of her Majesty in council of the 9th day of March, 1865, and by virtue of any other power enabling him in behalf, have made and established the following two regulations, which, having been approved by her Majesty, and such approval having been signified to the undersigned through _____, her Majesty's principal secretary of state for _____, are hereby published for the information of her Majesty's subjects, and will take effect in each consular district in Japan one month after the date of publication and exhibition therein, in the manner provided by the order in council aforesaid.

Regulations as to the use of fire-arms and the pursuit of game.

I. Whosoever shall willfully and without reasonable cause discharge any gun, rifle, pistol, or other fire-arms within the limits of any city, town, village, or hamlet, shall be deemed guilty of an offense, and, upon conviction thereof before any British consular or other court, shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding one month, with or without hard labor, and with or without a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars, or a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars without imprisonment.

II. If any person shall enter or be upon any inclosed land kept by the Japanese government, or their agents or lessees, or any other person duly authorized thereto, as a game-preserve, or shall enter or be within the boundaries of any temple, sanctuary, place of worship or burial, in search of or pursuit of any game, bird, or covey, such person shall be deemed guilty of an offense, and, on conviction thereof before any British consular or other court, shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding one month, with or without hard labor, and with or without a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars, or a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars without imprisonment.

SIR: I beg leave to solicit from you permission to retain my native clerk and interpreter, Mr. Tozabro Hyashi, whom, as I have informed you, I engaged for three months, at a salary of fifty dollars per month.

He is a young man who has been in Europe and America, is liberally educated, and is a brother of one Maximoto, formerly physician to the Tycoon. I am enabled through him to obtain early and useful information relative to many matters transpiring here that is quite unobtainable except through native sources. He is a very reliable person, and from his rank and relationship he is familiar with officials and with the history of the country. In evidence of his intelligence and usefulness, I beg leave to transmit to you a copy of a statement in writing that he made to me about the history of the Christian religion in Japan, and the present condition of the native Christian converts, and of the laws of this empire in the past and the present upon this subject, (inclosure No. 1.) I believe this statement to be literally true, and it serves to throw much light upon this subject, otherwise so very mysterious.

Also, I beg leave to inclose to you a little explanation made by him to me, at my request, of the term "Meidi," used by this government in denominating the present time, (inclosure No. 2.) It is true that this matter in itself is unimportant, yet it will serve, I trust, to illustrate to you how such an assistant materially aids me in my position to understand much in the language and manners of this people with whom I have to deal that would be otherwise very mysterious.

Inclosures.

No. 1.—Statement of the history of Christianity in Japan.

No. 2.—Definition of the term "Meidi."

Tozabro Hyashi to C. E. DeLong.

YOUR EXCELLENCY: In reply to your request for me to give you the definition of the term "meidi," I have to say: The Emperor of Japan gives a certain title to the year when he ascends the throne, and thus counts the years of his reign as first, second, third, fourth, &c., of such title. Formerly, if there occurred during the course of his reign any great calamities, such as great earthquakes, famines, tempests, &c., he would change the title, and commence to count the years anew from that time, thinking the title unfortunate and productive of bad results. This superstition was originally introduced here from China about one thousand two hundred years ago. This usage has been so long in force here that the people have become accustomed to it.

"Meidi" is the title given to the year by the present Emperor at his succession to the throne, which was four years ago, this being the fourth year of "meidi."

By the present law of this empire, our Emperor is not allowed to name the year but once during his reign, therefore the present title, "meidi," which means "peace after enlightened manners," will continue until the present Emperor dies.

Respectfully, &c.,

TOZABRO HYASHI.

YOUR EXCELLENCY: In reply to your request for me to state to you in brief what I know about the history of Christianity in Japan, and the present condition of native Christian converts, I beg leave to state: That about the sixteenth century Christianity was propagated with so much success in this country that the Tycoon, Nobunagaya himself, is said to have confessed his belief in the faith. A certain essential part of a castle is always built in imitation of the steeple of a Christian church, which the chief of the castle at that time used as a place of worship. This part, which is called "Tenshu" (meaning dedicated to the Heavenly Lord,) continued to be built long after the prohibition of Christianity in this empire, thus proving that this religion was still, for some time, tolerated among natives.

The Christian missionaries, seeing their growing influence over the consciences of the people, commenced to meddle with the politics of the State, whereupon the Dutch warned our people of the danger from this. Acting upon this suggestion, the government prohibited its propagation, and compelled all foreigners, except the Dutch, to leave the country.

At the siege, and subsequent fall of Osaka, the final victory of the ancestors of the Tokugawa family was gained, and many leading officers who were in the city escaped to Shunabarra, near Nagasaki, where the people generally professed Christianity, and excited them to open insurrection, by deluding them into the belief that the government intended to prohibit Christian worship. Those people, laboring under this delusion, rebelled against the government, and maintained their opposition for over two years; and soon after they were overcome they still continued to be rebellious and fanatical, mixing their religious belief with party spirit. This caused the government to take steps to prohibit this worship entirely throughout the empire; therefore, on this account, and not on account of the belief itself, it was prohibited. This is further proved to have been the motive by the fact that Buddhism was not also prohibited, which is not the faith of the Mikado, he being Sintoo in his faith. These things occurred about the year 1630.

At the time Commodore Perry entered Yeddo the Tycoon made the treaty with him in opposition to the sentiments of several of the great daimios, who, having long been jealous of the Tokugawa clan, (of which the Tycoon was a member,) took advantage of the anti-foreign sentiment of the people then prevailing, and pretending also to make war to uphold the religion of the Mikado, rebelled against and overthrew the Tycoon, and put his Majesty, the Mikado, on the throne in his stead. In fact, they made use of the Mikado as a puppet, to execute their desires in his name and seemingly by his authority.

The present government, owing to its declarations, was necessarily severe against any who followed any foreign religion. Against those who professed Buddhism—which being generally professed in the empire—they took measures only against the priests, who were deprived of many privileges hitherto granted to them.

Whatever promises may have been made by it relative to the mild treatment accorded to native converts, their punishment continues to be severe and cruel.

Under the late government the punishment was the crucifixion of the convert, but by the law of this government the punishment extends over eight families, to wit: parents, grand-parents, elder and younger brothers and sisters, uncles, aunts, sons, daughters, grand-children, and male and female cousins of the convert, and is death. It certainly has done away with the punishment by crucifixion, but simply doing this can hardly be called mild treatment.

Those converts who were imprisoned year before last would have been killed according to this law, but for the remonstrances of the foreign representatives. They are yet kept in close confinement.

Respectfully,

T. HYASHI.

No. 203.]

UNITED STATES LEGATION,
Yokohama, Japan, June 17, 1871. (Received July 24.)

SIR: At the risk of being disagreeable in so persistently urging upon your attention the imperfections of our laws to meet and provide for the wants of American citizens in Japan, I shall venture in this dispatch to call your attention to imperfections in our existing laws, and to the manifest necessity for other and further legislation. I perform this labor at this time that my suggestions, if any of them should be fortunate enough to meet with your approval, may be laid by you before Congress at its next session, with such recommendations as the President or yourself may see proper to make.

Calling your attention in the first place to the provisions of the sixth article of our treaty with Japan, signed at Yeddo, July 29, 1858, (see bound volume of treaty with Japan, page 33,) which reads as follows: "Americans committing offenses against Japanese shall be tried in American consular courts, and when found guilty shall be punished according to American law," I presume that I am justified in saying that Americans resident here cannot be tried or punished for violating any Japanese law or regulation unless a similar law or regulation exists in our country. Following this, I beg leave to refer you to section four, act of June 22, 1860. (See new consular regulations, page 245.) This provides a similar limitation over our judicial tribunals, directing them to exercise their jurisdiction, civil and criminal, "in conformity with the laws of the United States;" but it also further provides as follows: "But in all cases where such laws are not adapted to the object, or are deficient in the provisions necessary to furnish suitable remedies, the common law, including equity and admiralty, shall be extended in like manner over such citizens and others in the said countries; and if defects still remain to be supplied, and neither common law, including equity and admiralty, nor the statutes of the United States, furnish appropriate and suitable remedies, the ministers in the said countries respectively shall, by decrees and regulations which shall have the force of law, supply such defects and deficiencies."

In your dispatch to me, No. 48, of the 20th of December, 1870, you give a construction to this act limiting my powers in issuing decrees and regulations; to directing a mode of procedure for the enforcement of existing laws, and not to the creation of law.

This construction drives the judicial officer here in punishing a citizen to the terms of some act of Congress or some provision of the common law of equity or admiralty.

In fact it drives the officer in punishing crimes to the common law, because we have no statutes of the United States defining crimes and providing punishment except in a very few and generally inapplicable cases. Equity and admiralty, of course, are civil exclusively.

Driven, then, to the common law in exercising our judicial powers for the prevention of crimes, allow me to ask what common law are we to be governed by?

Statute law of the several States of the United States can hardly be called common law, but if by a stretch of imagination they are included, then it follows that no uniform rule exists, because in one State the law is different from that of another, and a judge would be left to mete out hanging and uncertain punishments for the same offense, and bring ridicule and contempt upon our tribunals here, besides inflicting serious injustice upon individuals.

If, then, it is the common law of England that is intended for us to execute when no United States statute covers the case, we find in many cases an absence of any express or well-known provisions for the government of many cases. For instance, the rule of the road in driving or riding in England is to turn to the left, and that rule has been adopted by the Japanese; with us, on the contrary, it is to turn to the right.

Now, supposing an American, in riding or driving, adhering to his own laws on this subject, willfully collides with a vehicle driven by some other foreigner here, or by a Japanese, and damage is caused, or a personal injury is inflicted, how is the man to be punished?

Again. In this community gambling is openly carried on in defiance of the laws of this empire and of the expressed wishes of the Japanese authorities; houses of ill-fame are openly and sometimes boisterously conducted in the city; furious riding and driving is indulged in in the streets; and the use of fire-arms in cities is made in a way dangerous to life; yet in the common law we find no suitable provisions for enabling us to regulate or prohibit these things.

Unfortunately, owing to the proximity of Japan to California, many of the very worst characters of both sexes that infest these ports and are guilty of these offenses are American citizens, and upon our country, its officers and institutions, are inflicted the disgrace which these things entail.

We have cities here without any town councils or mayors, each quota of its inhabitants being left, for all general and special government, to the ministerial and consular authorities of their own countries for government.

My brother officers here and myself, while not desiring to exercise doubtful or extraordinary powers, are still desirous of being armed with sufficient authority to preserve as good order among our people as other authorities among theirs; yet we find it quite impossible.

For these reasons I again call this matter to your attention, in hopes to secure from you such recommendations to Congress as will cause that body to legislate for this community in a manner to free us from these difficulties.

In connection with these remarks, I beg leave to call your attention to the imperfections in the act of July 1, 1870. This statute is, in my opinion, almost wholly wrong, and I respectfully submit that it should be repealed.

I invite your attention to the following brief review of it:

Section 2 of that act, in its first provisions, takes from the consul general, or the consul residing at the capital, the judicial powers vested in him by the act of 1860, and confers the same on you. Those judicial powers are simply all of the powers vested in me as minister, both appellate and original.

To illustrate the operations of this statute, allow me to imagine a case.

Suppose I should leave Japan temporarily, or that I should die, and during the period of my absence, or before the vacancy caused by my death was filled, a person should wish to bring an action against one of our consular officers, or an action in which one of our consular officers should be a material witness; where would he bring such action? By the law of 1870 he would be compelled to commence his suit before you, the Secretary of State of the United States. The plain unconstitutional nature of that provision I think should of itself warrant its repeal; but besides this, it is palpably violative of our treaty with Japan, which promises Japanese suitors that their complaints against Americans shall be tried in the courts of the United States in this empire. (See article 6, treaty of Yedo, of July 29, 1858.)

In addition to this, it is impracticable, and calculated to retard and defeat justice by driving litigants into a strange field, at an immense distance from where they reside and where their evidence is obtainable.

Actions of this nature are quite frequent. I have tried several such cases, and now have four or five pending before me.

Section 3 of the act of 1870 is open to still more serious objections, and it seems to me needs only to be carefully read to prove this assertion.

In the first place, it provides for an appeal from a judgment rendered by a minister in a criminal proceeding, when he sits as a court of original jurisdiction, when no law confers any original criminal jurisdiction upon the minister. This is harmless but useless. But the remaining portions of that section are extremely odd, and, I think, mischievous.

A party is given the right of an appeal from a judgment in a capital case, but is not allowed a stay of proceedings, unless the minister, the very officer who must by the law concur in the judgment to make it effectual, shall stultify himself by certifying that there is probable cause for such an appeal.

In other words, a minister who has approved a sentence as being regular and just, to grant a stay of proceedings pending an appeal, must issue his certificate certifying that the judgment is probably irregular or unjust.

But still the party may appeal, the advocate of the law of 1870 may say; so he may, is my reply, but, without the benefit of an order staying proceedings under the judgment, the appellant may be hung before his appeal is heard, and his heirs be left the benefit of a reversal of the judgment.

Sections 4 and 5 are objectionable, in my opinion, for the following reasons:

In the first place, consuls in Japan are not educated lawyers, and their courts are not conducted in accordance with the strict rules of practice governing courts of law at home. In fact, I believe all of their judgments would, upon appeal to the United States district court, be very liable to be reversed, if that court should hold strictly with them the same rules governing its decisions ordinarily. In other words, errors of form and in practice would compel these reversals, for however much that court might wish to allow for the exceptionable condition of these courts, still it could not admit two classes of decisions into its records, and what would be held to be error in a strict court of law at home would be held to be error here. Thus litigation here would be rendered vexatious and unending. Neither can you prevent this by a system of liberally-drawn rules, for at last you must provide that certain things must be done which, if left undone, would be error, and then what? Strange as it may seem, this law of 1870, in all of its provisions, says nothing about what disposition is to be made of a cause reversed upon appeal. Is it to be tried anew, and if so, where?

The author seems to have intended that upon the appeal the cause should be heard and decided upon the record above, as certified upon appeal; and that the judgment of the district court in all cases should be final, and no new trial be had.

Suppose, on the trial in the consular court, the appellant had offered to prove a certain fact, and the court had refused to admit the testimony offered; that an exception had been taken thereto, and formed one of the grounds of error presented to the district court on the hearing of the appeal; that the district court should regard this ruling of the consular court as erroneous, and hold that the appellant should have been allowed to have proven that fact if he could. Then suppose, further, that the fact that the appellant offered to prove was a material one—one that, if established, would entitle the appellant to a judgment—what in such a case could the district court do, except to reverse the judgment, and remand the cause to the court below for a new trial? It cannot be said that the district court in such a case should act as if the proof had been admitted and the fact proven, and made judgment accordingly, for it frequently happens in practice that a party offers to prove a fact that he would fail to be able to establish, even if allowed to proceed. This is sometimes done to make error in the record, and sometimes it is offered in good faith, and the party, when allowed to proceed, is disappointed in his own evidence or overcome by his adversaries. Then, too, if the district court in such a case was to assume that the appellant could and would have adduced the proof he offered and which was excluded, by what system of reasoning can that court conclude that the respondent might not have offered evidence against it sufficient to have disproven what the appellant sought to establish? It could not do this, nor would not; hence I insist that, notwithstanding the author's intentions, new trials must necessarily follow reversals of judgments in many cases. Consider, then, the consequences of this system. Japanese litigants, notwithstanding the clause in our treaty that I have quoted, are in common with all other litigants, driven into courts five thousand miles distant, where they have no acquaintances or agents—about the rules of which they are in entire ignorance. Their business then falls in with the mass upon a calendar, to come up for disposition at some distant day, and if the judgment is reversed and a new trial ordered, if they are fortunate enough to try it anew in a proper court, another appeal may be taken, and thus delays obtained so vexatious as absolutely to be destructive of the principles for which courts are established.

I think that when the operations of this law are known and understood by business men here of all nationalities, that it will be regarded by them as being calamitous, and result in a person's sacrificing on large demands a very great portion of the sum justly due in order to obtain immediate payment and avoid the expense and delay that litigation under this statute will entail.

Sections 9 and 10 of the same act, although not very important, I regard as being unwise and unjust.

I know of no reason why the appropriations for jail and other expenses at Shanghai should be twice as much as at Kanagawa—a place of greater necessities in this line, as it is the naval station of several powers, besides bearing as important a mercantile character. But this is a matter that I am indifferent about; it is the residue of the sections that I object to. I do not think the system of appropriating a sum total for the several consulates is a good one. Neither consular officer knows, or has any means of knowing, how much of the prison fund has been drawn out by the other; nor has he any means of knowing until his drafts are dishonored because the fund is exhausted. I would recommend a change in this regard, so as to give to each a sum certain as a maximum. The appropriation need be no more in the aggregate, and yet each consul would know the limit of his yearly allowance, and avoid drawing for any excess.

With due deference, I submit that this act is almost wholly wrong and should be repealed. The tediousness of communicating one's views by writing is such that I shall forbear pressing other views that I have, at least this time. I think, perhaps, that it would be well for me to visit Washington and confer personally with you about these and many other matters, including the course of action you wish me to follow in revising the treaties next year, in regard to the residue of the Semonosikei indemnity, the native Christian matter, &c. Should you deem it advisable for me to come to Washington and meet you, I shall only say that I shall be happy to do so, starting in October or November next.

SIR: I have the honor to advise you that a few days since I received from the minister for foreign affairs of this empire a note informing me that, in pursuance of the provisions of the thirteenth article of the treaty of 1858, that a revision of said treaty would be claimed by their government. (Inclosure No. 1.)

I at once replied thereto, (inclosure No. 2,) reminding them of my having served them with a similar notice verbally on the 5th day of May last. I did so, acting under the belief that our Government would desire to revise the treaty at that time, but if not, that the notice might be recalled, and no harm be done by it.

YOUR EXCELLENCIES: The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America in Japan, begs leave to acknowledge the receipt of your excellencies' note of date the 30th of June last, notifying your intention to "require a revision of the treaty at present existing between our two governments."

At the same time the undersigned begs leave to remind your excellencies of the fact that at an interview, held with you at the foreign office on the 5th of May last, the undersigned, in behalf of the Government of the United States, had the honor of giving you a similar notice.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,
Yokohama, Japan, July 15, 1871. (Received August 22.)

SIR: I have the honor to advise you of my receipt to-day of a note from their excellencies the ministers for foreign affairs, requesting me to invoke your aid to procure for their government a competent legal adviser; and informing me that Mr. Mori, chargé d'affaires for Japan, will be instructed to confer fully with you.

I beg leave to assure you that I consider this a very complimentary and important request; one that I trust will be so fortunately complied with as to secure for this government the services of a gentleman of unquestionable honor and ability, both as a lawyer and as a diplomat.

Such a person, in my opinion, will be in a position in a short time to wield a great power for good with this nation.

His rapid advancement to a highly honorable position, where great reputation may be won, I consider very certain.

I have very earnestly urged upon all of these authorities the great importance, to their government, of their at once selecting and employing such an assistant; as they have constantly to deal with questions of foreign law, of which they know comparatively nothing.

This application proves that I have at least been successful in influencing them to take this step. Guided by my instructions, I have in this as in all other similar matters, refused to mention any person as suitable; but while recommending the measure, I have referred them to you to select the man. The importance to our Government of having one of our own people selected for this position, is that it prevents the selection of some other for that office, who, by being partial to another nation's interest, might thereby become inimical to our own. It secures to our Government a friend at this court, who while honestly serving Japan, may probably, and doubtless would, prevent erroneous opinions from becoming generally entertained relative to the American Government, its institutions and policy.

I infinitely prefer having this one selection being intrusted to us, than I would to be given the appointment of many persons to minor positions. Such appointments serve a trifling purpose, most often entirely personal, and are not in any way freighted with important consequences; whereas it is not very improbable that the person whom you may select for this place may have almost the whole foreign policy of this government intrusted to him, for management, in time; indeed, his influence may extend further, and when he has once succeeded in gaining the confidence of the government in his ability and honesty, he may be able to do much to get it to open its doors full width to the stream of civilization so anxious to pour in, and thus materially aid in the great work of the moral and political redemption of this people. In this connection I beg to suggest that the person whom you may select, shall be one not indifferent to the cause of religion. I would not desire an enthusiast, but a person who, when he sees an opportunity to help in that cause, will not allow it to pass wholly unimproved.

The president of the government college at Yeddo is an American, and so are many of his assistants. At that institution hundreds of the youths of this land are being daily instructed. Another American gentleman is teaching a class of young men at the foreign office, who are being educated in languages and law, with the intention of qualifying them for positions in the various departments of this empire. Numbers of young Japanese noblemen are leaving here now monthly for America, and entering our numerous institutions of learning. All in my power I have constantly done to stimulate this emigration, and to foster and encourage these schools, believing that in this way, more surely and thoroughly than in any other, these people would become able to correctly judge of matters for themselves, and thus in that way, slow, to be sure, but, as I consider it, certain, the influence of our Government with this nation may be raised from the low position that it now seems to occupy.

All of the treaties with Japan are to be revised next year; that hour will be an important one for this empire, and at that time it will sorely need an able counsellor.

It may be thought that it would be more in the interest of our Government, and that of other civilized powers, that Japan should not at that time have such assistance than that it should, but I dissent from this view. I believe that all advantages foreign powers might gain over them through their ignorance of international law, would be far less in importance, besides being more unworthily gained, than what will result from having them represented by an able advocate, who, while he would prevent unworthy advantages from being taken of this government, would also counsel them against insisting upon unjust and unreasonable things, likely to produce mischief and trouble.

I trust that in contracting, a clause will be inserted giving to this gentleman a rank sufficient to entitle him to meet with the privy council of the sovereign, and not have him at the mercy of any chief of a department who, through ignorance or malice, might by misrepresenting his views at court, ruin his influence.

Trusting to your kind approval of my course in this affair, and earnestly hoping that you will exert yourself to assist in the proper accomplishment of this matter in conjunction with Mr. Mori, I have, &c.,

No. 238.]

UNITED STATES LEGATION,

Yokohama, Japan, September 4, 1871. (Received October 16.)

SIR: I am, as yet, quite unable to furnish you with the full information promised in my dispatch No. 233 by the last mail, in regard to the great changes going on in the administration of the affairs of this empire. I will roughly sketch, for your information, some of the most important that have occurred within my knowledge, and give you my surmises as to their intended effect, but I beg you not to place too much reliance on the deductions that I may draw, as all here is still confusion, and such information as I have received relative to the political bearing of these events has been hastily gleaned and needs some further verification.

On the 31st of August last I received a note from Mr. Sawa, former minister for foreign affairs, advising me of his removal from that position, (inclosure No. 1,) to which I at once replied, (inclosure No. 2.)

On the same day I received a note from Mr. Ewackura, advising me of his appointment to that position, (inclosure No. 3,) to which I also at once replied in a friendly and cordial spirit, (inclosure No. 4.)

I beg to assure you that I felt deeply all I said in both of my replies, as my relations with both of these gentlemen have ever been, since the date of our first acquaintance, most cordial both officially and personally.

On the 1st instant I received from the minister for foreign affairs a note advising me of the abolishment of the Hans throughout the empire. (Inclosure No. 5.) Hans means what we call prince or daimio.

On yesterday, at the foreign office, where I met the ministers Ewackura and Serashunia, I urged my inquiries about this matter, and learned that by a decree all daimios had been removed from office, and directed in the ninth Japanese month (two months from now) to assemble in Yeddo, and thereafter to constantly reside in that city, they to be allowed ten per cent. of their former revenues as a means of support, but to be allowed no commands or any rank or office except to rank generally as noblemen; to be eligible to office under the central government, but not otherwise than by selection by the central government to have any official position; their Daimies or provinces to be directly under the administration of the central government, which would for the present retain the former local officials under the daimios in their respective positions, but subject to such changes as the central government might see proper from time to time to make. I inquired if any resistance to this decree was feared or expected, and I was given to understand that, on the contrary, many of the larger daimios had solicited the issuance of the decree.

To you this will doubtless seem exceedingly strange, as it seemed to me, but my own conclusions are these: That these daimios have, for a long time past, been more nominal than actual rulers of their provinces, the real control of which has been vested in a local legislature, presided over by a kiro or dai-san-gu, who, reaching his position by merit and not from birth, has gradually assumed more and more power, until, as a class, these kiros are more properly the head of the respective clans than their lord the prince has been; that the daimios, thus finding themselves as a class being gradually supplanted in actual power, while they had entailed upon them the expense and responsibility of the position of actual lord, are happy to escape all responsibility, and the expenses of their sham sovereignty, and retire to a position of ease and no responsibility, when they will perhaps have, from the one-tenth of their former revenue devoted entirely to their individual use, more money to thus expend than they formerly had when receiving their full revenues.

This reasoning finds some support in the fact that some six or seven of these kiros have been called to fill high offices in the central government and elsewhere retained in their former positions. Some of these kiros, for the first time in the history of this reign, have been appointed chief ministers of their respective departments; as, for instance, Okubo is chief minister of finance; Goto, of public works; while Okuma (saigo of Satsuma's clan) and numerous others are created sanji, or counselors of His Majesty.

The outlook of this whole affair to me is that it has been resolved to in fact do away with hereditary rights of office below His Majesty himself.

Thus to push one side the koongays, or old court nobility, daimios and all others who have no other claim to title or office except by birth-right, and at the same time dispense with innumerable useless offices, leaving these same koongays and daimios eligible to office, and assigning them to such positions as their characters and talents warrant them to be capable of in the opinion of His Majesty; to thus centralize the government by practically extinguishing clanship, and placing all under one supreme head. This plan is one that is certainly wise and desirable, and if it can be executed without bloodshed or trouble, will advance this nation in a day, as it were, to a position that it has taken some nations years to accomplish, and which some have never reached.

That I wish this government success in its efforts to work this reform I need not assure you, or that I will lend it every kindly aid by counsel or otherwise. Another thing of interest to foreigners is observable in the changes that have taken place, especially in the acceptance by Mr. Ewackura of the office of minister for foreign affairs.

Originally, when the Mikado's government assumed control, swayed as it then was by the strongest kind of anti-foreign sentiments, the department of foreign affairs was seemingly made as low and unimportant as possible, to even make it appear to the native mind to be in fact no department of the government at all. To this end the office was located near the foreign concession, in Yedo, in a miserable building, in what they consider the fishermen's quarters of the city, while all the other departments had their offices in or adjacent to the palace.

Gentlemen of first merit and talent in the government sought other posts, but appeared to scorn this; in fact it is said that it was looked upon more as a mark of royal neglect or contempt than one of favor or preferment to be appointed to any position in the foreign department.

The daily increasing importance of the foreign relations of Japan with the lapse of time has revolutionized this idea, until I believe the Japanese court have learned to look upon this department in its true light, as being in fact the one of the very greatest in point of honor and difficulty of any that they have to fill. This is evidenced by Mr. Ewackura's acceptance of a post to-day that one short twelve months ago I believe he would have regarded as most demeaning for him to accept.

I have long believed, and still believe, him to be one of the very foremost men of this government, both in point of ability and power. He has held, and I believe he still holds, the rank and position of chief dainegon, that is, first counselor of His Majesty, next to the prime minister, Sanjo Daijen.

That I have had some little share in producing this last-mentioned result, I am happy to have some reason for believing.

During last month, annoyed and perplexed by having a stream of claims poured in upon me for adjustment, matters properly for courts, and meeting in one case what I considered to be unconscionable delay in the Foreign Office, I addressed an appeal to the dainegons (inclosure No. 6) asking for the necessary reform of having courts established here in which my countrymen could sue and obtain relief, without thus constantly burdening me with their unusual and improper business. During the course of my interview with Mr. Ewackura on yesterday, he informed me that my appeal had caused the counselors of His Majesty to seriously deliberate for several successive days over the suggestions I had made, and fairly intimated, although he did not say so, that this document had assisted in causing the government to properly estimate its department of foreign affairs.

If I had imagined that my appeal would have met with such distinguished consideration, I should have prepared it much more carefully.

His excellency Mr. Ewackura, in view of my departure for Hakodada, day after to-morrow, has sent me word that he wished a confidential interview with me to-morrow, and for that purpose will visit me at Yokohama. If, from that conversation, any new light should be shed, I will write you a hurried statement that evening before sailing.

YOUR EXCELLENCY: Your note advising me of your appointment to the office of chief minister for foreign affairs of this empire has been received.

I sincerely believe that the department, of which you are now the chief, is the most important one in your government. Through it all the business of your government with foreign powers should be conducted; consequently, in its keeping is confided the great duties of conducting affairs with nations, that Japan may be kept at peace with all the world, and enjoy the honor and respect of every nation.

In the discharge of your high and honorable duties, it will be my greatest pleasure at all times to render you every possible assistance; and I sincerely hope that you will honor me by calling upon me for such assistance, whenever you feel that I can serve you. My Government has no higher or other desire than to maintain her present cordial relations with your own, and to see Japan advance constantly in dignity and power. Thus, when I can in any way assist your government I will be carrying out the wishes of my own.

Our personal acquaintance, so pleasantly commenced, I sincerely hope may continue to grow more intimate and cordial as time passes.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

YOUR EXCELLENCIES: The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America in Japan, in accordance with the privileges allowed by the laws of your empire, begs leave to address, in a most respectful manner, to your high and honorable body this appeal from the action and conclusions of the minister for foreign affairs of your empire, in a certain matter of business that he has had occasion officially to place before them. The undersigned begs leave to assure your excellencies that, in addressing this appeal to you, he does so in no spirit of complaint or fault-finding with their excellencies, the ministers for foreign affairs, or with any of them, with all of whom the undersigned has ever sustained, and trusts always be able to sustain, the most cordial and friendly relations. Neither is the undersigned moved to take this appeal by any sense of the importance or necessity for haste that there is attending to the settlement of the special matter upon which this appeal is founded, but the undersigned thinks that the present system pursued by your government, in its management of affairs of this nature, is grievously faulty; and with a view of being able to convince you that reforms are needed, and of showing you in what manner the reforms desired might be worked, this appeal is taken.

The undersigned begs leave, therefore, to premise by advising your excellencies of certain rules and principles that obtain in American and European countries, in meting out justice and settling disputes between people, whether native or alien, and the reason why such rules are followed.

One of the first objects of all law is to mete out justice; another object is to make justice pursue quickly on the heels of wrong; for justice delayed often fails to properly indemnify the injured party, especially in business transactions; therefore, when a system is found to be so faulty that a wrong-doer may, for a long time, by tricks and artifices avoid doing justice, it should be so remodeled as to permit the officers of the law, whose duty it is to see justice done, to prevent such unreasonable delays. The next object of the law is, in all cases, to ascertain the truth. To do this, in judicial investigations, it has for a long time been admitted by the jurists and statesmen of all civilized countries that witnesses, men called upon to declare the truth about transactions within their knowledge, should be subject in their examinations relative to such matters to examination and cross-examination, by and in the presence of both the parties to the controversy. In this way the conscience and knowledge of the witness is best sifted, so that the judicial eye can the clearest see the truth. Another object our law has in view, in the adoption of rules for the government of trials, is that thus all claimants and defendants are treated alike, and none may complain of the course that is pursued with all.

To that end, when one person wishes to commence in our courts a civil action for the enforcement of a claim for money or damages against another, our law compels him to file a written statement of his grievances, stating concisely who his claims are against, and upon what grounds he asks for his relief. The court then issues a writ called a summons, notifying the party complained of (called by us the defendant) of the complaint made against him, and of the relief or judgment that is asked, and notifies him to appear within some certain specified time, (usually regulated by the distance where he is when he is summoned from where the court sits before which he is to appear.) and file with the court his written reply, if he has any to make, to the complaint filed against him. If he fails to obey this summons, in some cases our courts, without further investigation, decree the complainant the relief he seeks; or the court may, notwithstanding the defendant offers no defense, call upon the complainant to prove his case before awarding him a judgment.

If the defendant in reply to the summons admits the truth of the complainant's statement, judgment is at once rendered against him. If, however, he answer, denying in whole or in part the complaint of the complainant, the court causes at once a copy of his reply to be given to the complainant, so that he may know which of his statements stand contradicted, and may, therefore, correctly judge what he will be called upon to prove. Thus he is saved the necessity of going to the expense of procuring witnesses to prove uncontroverted assertions. Then the cause is set for trial at a certain place on a certain time, and both parties are notified to be there present with their witnesses. At that time the examination proceeds in the presence of the court, which first hears the witnesses for the complainant and then those for the defendant, and finally any additional evidence that may be proper.

When a party who produces a witness has concluded his examination of him, the other party is allowed to question him, and thus in the presence of the court a witness is often detected in telling an untruth, the sagacity of the court being aided and reinforced by the knowledge of the opposite party who is interrogating the witness. After such examination the court renders judgment by the light of the law, to which all must cheerfully submit. This course, to which all foreigners are accustomed, is not followed by either your local governors or ministers, to whom consuls and representatives are compelled to address the demands of their countrymen for examination and determination. No known rules in regard to the time within which cases will be tried and decided, or rules of evidence by which causes are determined, are published and made known so as to be understood by foreign officers, who are, therefore, compelled constantly to grope in the dark in transacting business of this nature with your government.

Your courts examine by themselves, unknown to us, the defendant and his witnesses; we do not even know what is in dispute or what is necessary or unnecessary for us to prove. While foreign officers are thus situated, in attempting to obtain legal redress for their countrymen against Japanese subjects, all foreign powers having treaties with Japan hold courts constantly open, governed by published and proclaimed rules and laws, that may be known to all, and Japanese claimants are kept constantly advised as to what time trials will be held, what they will be required to prove, and are allowed to be present to hear what the witnesses may have to say who testify against them and to ask of such witnesses all proper questions. In this way foreign tribunals mete out justice to Japanese subjects by the same rules that it is administered to the citizens or subjects of their own or other states. This system brings content and satisfaction to all classes, but, above all, it inspires the masses with respect for and confidence in the laws, and thus secures the ruler in his place by inspiring obedience. When, therefore, I present a claim or demand on behalf of any of my people at the Foreign Office, I should, I think, be given to understand within what time the officers, han, or individual complained against would be compelled to answer my complaints. When the answer is filed, I should, without delay, be furnished with a copy of it, and the cause set down for hearing at some certain time, within which the attendance of the necessary witnesses can be procured, and a trial follow, participated in by both parties, with all of the witnesses present. I can best illustrate the grievances of which I complain by stating the facts of the case upon which this appeal is based:

On the 28th day of May last, I presented to the minister of foreign affairs a claim of Messrs. Walsh, Hall & Co., American citizens, against the Uki han for some twenty-three thousand dollars, the value of a certain quantity of rice sold and delivered by them to that han under contract bearing the seal of the han. From time to time I inquired what had been done or was being done about this matter, and was answered that the governor of Kanagawa was investigating the case, under the direction of the Foreign Office; that his report might soon be expected, and then I would be fully advised, and thus the matter continued. I did not know, nor could I find out, what investigation was being made; whether our claim was disputed or admitted, and, if disputed, what grounds of defense were assigned; neither do I know at present. I was informed that it was alleged that the seal of the han had been stolen and used by a discharged officer. I urged upon the minister that we could prove that the han had received our rice, and hence we ought to be allowed our money for it, regardless of whether the seal of the han was properly placed on the paper or not; hence, that I did not think it proper that our claim should be delayed pending an investigation which was being made, not to determine whether our claim was just or not, but to determine whether a certain man ought to be punished or not. I waited patiently until yesterday, when their excellencies informed me that the report of the governor had been received, but it was not satisfactory, and a further investigation had to be made.

When I inquired how long it would be before I could find out about this matter I was advised that no reply could be promised for thirty days. I then felt, and still feel, that such delays amount to a denial of justice. An investigation is pending that I am not allowed to participate in, or know anything about, and which is to decide a right of my countrymen.

One of the main witnesses on my behalf has been imprisoned by your authorities, and has died in prison; thus we are deprived of his evidence.

I have now no more assurance as to when I may expect judgment, or what kind of judgment I may expect, than I had three months ago; whereas, in the meantime, one of the officers, and the main one who conducted this business with Walsh, Hall & Co., is daily in our sight; even the other day was engaged in attempting to negotiate a large loan of money at one of the foreign banks in Yokohama, apparently having plenty of money, his full liberty, and fairly laughing to scorn all attempts to make him do justice.

This condition of affairs leads to immeasurable evils. Foreigners, in dealing with Japanese, are led thereby to charge them unreasonable prices for moneys loaned, or goods sold on credit, because they calculate the difficulties and delays in obtaining justice, and they increase their charges proportionally. They make secret and unreasonable contracts with Japanese, seeking to avoid and conceal their transactions from their own and the Japanese authorities, because of their fear of them, and their want of confidence in them.

Troubles are increased on every hand, not alone to the foreign, but to the Japanese authorities, and all because foreigners, not understanding your methods of settling disputes, are afraid to trust to your tribunals. Evil-minded persons spread about reports to the effect that subordinate officers in the departments, if paid money, will expedite or retard the collection of claims; hence some of them resort to attempts to bribe your officers, and if, in the conduct of their business, your officers decide against them, instead of being contented with their decisions, they are discontented and troublesome; they imagine that our officers have been corrupted, and so, constantly, false and infectious impressions are allowed to gain ground, to the injury of the good name of His Majesty's government abroad.

The injustice of allowing this condition of things longer to continue will be manifest to your excellencies when you read that clause in your treaty with the United States which reads as follows: "The consular court shall be open to Japanese creditors, to enable them to recover their just-claims against American citizens, and the Japanese courts shall in like manner be open to American citizens for the recovery of their just claims against Japanese." This clause of the treaty the American Government has fully and constantly carried out, whereas the Japanese government has wholly failed to do so.

I am aware that your government has taken steps to do so, and to that end has sent to my Government for men learned in the law to assist in this work but, pending the arrival of those people, and until such courts are established, the reforms that I suggest should be adopted. My Government does not desire that its representatives here should have anything to do with claims such as are ordinarily tried and determined in courts. It is business that in other lands, ministers have no connection with. Their duties are higher, and are confined to the management of diplomatic affairs exclusively, while here, seven-tenths of the business I have to do, and that is done by your minister for foreign affairs, is the settlement of claims and demands of a purely private nature. It is exceedingly unfitting that officers charged with the high and responsible duties of managing the diplomatic affairs of state, should be expected to daily try causes, and differ and dispute about mere private demands.

I have consented to, and followed this course, so far, to accommodate your government for the present, and until you have the time and the assistance necessary to enable you to open regular courts, where my countrymen may bring actions, try the same, and obtain civil redress in the usual manner. This labor, that I do gratuitously, that is so unpleasant in its nature, should be made by you as easy as possible; this is a simple act of justice, that I feel that I have a right to ask for and expect.

Observe, if you please, the great difference that exists between your system and that of my Government, and its different results. My people purchase of yours annually nearly the whole tea crop of Japan, amounting to millions of pounds; also large quantities of silk, cabinet-ware, bronze, &c.; and yet your people are rarely ever defrauded of their dues. The reason why this is so is because our judicial system is such that justice outsteps fraud, and evil-doers are deterred from attempting to do wrong by the knowledge that they cannot escape with their ill-gotten gains. Thus you will observe that it is the certainty of punishment and the speedy retribution of our law that prevents wrongs.

Were the consular courts of the United States to be closed but for one month against Japanese creditors, and this fact become generally known among my people, I am of the opinion that evil-disposed men would defraud your people out of millions of dollars' worth of property. Hence you will observe that if I should allow myself to be governed by passion, or a desire to retaliate against you, for the non-fulfillment by you of that clause of your treaty above quoted, the greater loss by far would be with you, for your people sell more property to mine than they purchase from them. Such a thought as this has never entered for one moment into my mind, and has only been referred to here to show you what a disastrous result would follow such a course should I adopt it. When a Japanese creditor wishes to bring an action against an American creditor, he finds our consular courts always open and ready to receive his complaints. As soon as it is filed in the court, the party complained against is summoned to answer the demand; as soon as his answer is filed, the Japanese plaintiff is advised of its nature, and can have a copy of it, if he desires; if the defendant admits that he owes the money, a judgment is at once entered against him, and his property is at once seized to satisfy the judgment. If he denies the demands, a day is set for the trial of the action; the plaintiff at once advised, and invited to be present with his witnesses. He knows from the answer of the defendant just which portion of his assertions in his complaints are denied, and which are admitted; he, therefore, knows that he will only be expected to prove those in dispute, and he is saved the necessity of bringing numerous witnesses. At the trial he hears what the defendant's witnesses say, and has the privilege of asking them questions; thus truth is elicited, and justice done. May I not with propriety ask of your high and honorable body the adoption of some such rules governing the conduct of this kind of business in your Foreign Office? I ask it with all due respect to your excellencies, ministers for foreign affairs, whose labors in the dispatch of this kind of business are most severe and continuous. I willingly accord to them all praise for their uniform courtesy, integrity, and assiduity, but the system they are compelled to follow, while it materially increases their labors, as well as my own, subjects them, as well as myself, to constant complaints made by people pressing for a settlement of their claims.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,

Yokohama, Japan, September 4, 1871. (Received October 16.)

SIR: I have the honor to advise you of the safe arrival in this empire, by the last steamer, of General Capron, with his staff, composing the scientific commission; also, by the same steamer, Lieutenants Wasson, Dunwoodie, Jones, Hoag, and Poillon, all in good health.

General Capron, Lieutenants Dunwoodie, Wasson, and others produced to me your letters, as also those of Messrs. Davis and other officers, and I did all in my power, and will continue to do all I can conveniently for all of these gentlemen.

I trust, however, you will bear in mind that one clause contained in the printed instructions furnished me, when I was appointed to this position, provides, "that I shall recommend no citizen of the United States for any position under the government to which I am accredited."

This clause of my instructions I have always respected as strictly as all others; but in the matter of these gentlemen, I have accepted the letters received as a special license, and I have gone far enough, at least, to aid them somewhat.

General Capron and staff have been most cordially and honorably received. They have already been called upon by most of the government authorities, and from those officers highest in power, and whose opinion I most value. I learn that all are favorably impressed with the general and assistants.

I have been active in my operations to influence the government to give to this commission the widest possible range for its labors, and I feel sure that, in the highest degree, the commission will prove a success so complete that it will most materially aid in stimulating the tide of good feeling now setting in so strongly in Japan for our country and its people.

Mr. Ewackura, the new minister for foreign affairs, in our interview yesterday, spoke of the commission with great pride and pleasure as having been sent by the United States Government to Japan; that is, that the United States Government, out of kindness for Japan, had spared and sent out of its high offices this commission, for which they felt greatly obliged, and wished me so to assure you.

The commissioners are now temporarily quartered in the "Siba Temples," those temples so noted as being the finest in Japan, and also as being the burial-place of the tycoons.

I called on the general there yesterday, and found him surrounded with all comforts and convenience, in high spirits, and looking hopefully forward.

I rejoice in the arrival of this commission; it will greatly aid my efforts here, I am sure; but what is still more desirable, it will cause our people to study more closely this country and its people, and the more quickly arouse them to the realization of the fact that Japan is a great nation, well deserving the most earnest efforts to be assisted in its march from the barbarism of the past centuries to the high civilization to which it is now in some degree tending, and to achieve which seems now to be the controlling passion of its statesmen.

UNITED STATES LEGATION, HAKODADI,
Japan, October 8, 1871. (Received November 25.)

SIR: In view of the near meeting of Congress, of the increasing duties of my office, and of the present position of this legation, I beg leave, with due respect, to urge again upon your attention and that of the President, the necessity for some reforms in legislation affecting my office.

In a few months the treaties between the United States and Japan are to be revised. This will add greatly to the labors of my office, as constant conferences with my colleagues and with the Japanese authorities must ensue; to keep you well advised of these proceedings an immense amount of writing will have to be done. In addition to this the judicial business of my legation increases monthly, there being now in my court some half dozen cases on my trial calendar, some of them involving very large amounts, and necessitating long trials. These considerations make it almost a necessity that I should be allowed a secretary of legation.

That I need an interpreter is of course true; for, otherwise, I am at the mercy of those I deal with or dependent on the charity of my colleagues.

That it is impossible to get a competent person to act as both secretary and interpreter for a salary of $2,500 per year is a fact that my efforts for the last year fully attest.

What I ask for very earnestly is a secretary, at a salary of $3,000, and an interpreter, at a similar salary. If this cannot be allowed, let the office be made that of secretary and interpreter, at a salary of, say, $5,000 per annum.

This latter course would be better than nothing, but still not what is needed, for my interpreter cannot well fill both offices. He cannot carry on a conversation and write at the same time, neither can I find any person here whom I could recommend as an interpreter, whom I would also be willing to recommend as secretary, who would accept the position.

The secretary, I submit, should be a commissioned officer competent to take charge of the legation in case of a minister's absence or death, and also competent by his counsel and advice to assist his chief and aid in the transaction of business.

An interpreter, on the contrary, need not be a man of any commanding ability or of great qualifications, but need only be conversant with the language; but should at the same time, as I think, be immediately subject to the minister, liable to removal by him, at once, if found abusing his position or plotting with others for gain.

I hope that this request of mine may find favor and be recommended to Congress.

I shall take Mr. Nathan E. Rice with me as interpreter, and give him a trial. If I find that he is sufficiently conversant with the language, and he is disposed to serve for the salary allowed after trial, I will so advise you.

I hope that I may be allowed by Congress to draw for the undrawn appropriation for the last year for this office of interpreter, to pay Dr. Hepburn for the time he served, and also to pay Mr. Rice for such services in this capacity as he may render.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, November 16, 1870.

SIR: Your dispatch No. 292, dated September 29, has been received.

The accountability of the Mexican government for the losses sustained by citizens of the United States from the robbery and exactions committed at Guaymas, in May last, by the armed force under the command of Fortino Viscaino, seems to be unquestionable. That person was a subordinate of Placido Vega, as appears by the orders of the latter to him, dated at Teacapan the 18th of May. Those orders directed Viscaino to proceed in the vessel (meaning the Forward) and perpetrate the very acts complained of. The orders were fulfilled. It is true that Mr. Sisson, the United States consular agent at Mazatlan, in his letter to you of the 13th of June, represents that since the evacuation of Mexico by the French the government of that republic had had no other authority in the canton of Tepic, where the expedition of the Forward was organized and whence it proceeded, than that connived at by one Manuel Lozada, of whom Placido Vega is supposed to have been an instrument. Mr. Sisson, however, acknowledges that the general government had appointed a collector and other officers in that quarter, but adds that they are creatures of Lozada. He also says that he had been informed by General Davalos, the commander at Mazatlan, and by Mr. Sessalveda, the inspector of the customs there, that the general government had directed that its troops must not invade the territory of Lozada. Whether this be a fact or not, that government, so long as it shall claim jurisdiction over that territory, must be held responsible for any injuries to citizens of the United States, there or elsewhere, by any force which may have proceeded from the same territory.

In times of peace redress for such injuries may, in the first instance at least, be sought through the judicial tribunals of the country where they may have been committed. When, however, they are silenced or overawed by the force of arms, it seems a mockery to be referred to them, especially if there should be any ground for the charge that the Mexican government has willfully connived at a defiance of its authority in the canton of Tepic.

You will, consequently, in a courteous way, make known to the minister for foreign affairs our views on this subject. The case will be taken into further consideration when the Department shall have received the reply which he may make.

SIR: A letter of the 7th instant has been received at this Department from the Secretary of War, in which it is stated that the depredations committed by bands of hostile Texan Indians, chiefly located in the Guadalupe Mountains, upon the settlements of the Rio Grande from El Paso to Del Norte, compel the authorization of military operations against them, which can only be successfully carried on in the winter season and with the co-operation of the Mexican authorities. I inclose herewith a transcript of the letter of the Secretary of War, above referred to, and have to request that you will endeavor to obtain the consent of the national government in the direction indicated. An authorization for the government of the State of Chihuahua to communicate and co-operate directly with the commander of the subdistrict of the presidio, whose headquarters are at Fort Davis, Texas, permitting, if need be, the troops of the United States to follow the Indians into Mexican territory, and using the Mexican troops to intercept the Indians in their flight, would seem to be especially desirable.

Washington City, December 7, 1870.

SIR: The depredations committed by bands of hostile Texan Indians, chiefly located in the Guadalupe Mountains, upon the settlements of the Rio Grande from El Paso to Del Norte, compel this Department to authorize military operations against them, and these operations can only be carried on successfully in the winter season of the year. It is believed that these Indians can be driven from their haunts, but only into Mexico, and it therefore becomes necessary to seek the co-operation of the authorities of that republic. If the national government of Mexico will consent to authorize the governor of the State of Chihuahua to communicate and co-operate directly with the commander of the sub-district of the Presidio, whose headquarters are at Fort Davis, Texas, permitting, if need be, the troops of the United States to follow the Indians into Mexican territory, and using the Mexican troops to intercept the Indians in their flight, it is expected that a winter campaign will so cripple the power and subdue the spirit of the marauders as to afford sensible relief from apprehension of danger and actual loss of life and property to the exposed citizens of both countries.

It is understood that the authorities of the State of Chihuahua are favorably disposed toward the plan herein described, and if the necessary order and authority for their direct co-operation can be obtained without delay, it will enable the operations to be pursued this present winter.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Mexico, December 22, 1870. (Received January 14.)

SIR: The Mexican congress during its recent session failed to consummate, by appropriate legislation, the extension of the free zone, and adjourned on the 15th instant, leaving the tariff bill, of which the free zone forms a part, in an unfinished state.

In order to ascertain from an official source the present legal status of this question, on the 21st instant, I addressed a note to the minister of the treasury, inquiring if the action of the congress at its recent session had resulted in the extension of the free zone, and if further legislation was not required before the extension could become a law, (A.)

On the same day Mr. Romero replied that the congress of the union approved, in the session of the 5th of November, the fifty-third article of the tariff bill, which decrees the subsistence of the free zone and its extension to the northern frontier, and that in the session of the 7th of the same month, the proper committee withdrew the fifty-fourth article of the bill, in order to present it in another form. It was not presented, however, during the remainder of the session, nor did congress finish the discussion of the tariff bill; consequently it remains pending for the next session. Mr. Romero further says that, although a portion of the bill was sanctioned by congress, as it was not finished, nor sent to the executive for promulgation, it cannot be enforced, even in regard to the portion sanctioned. For this reason, although the article relating to the extension of the free zone was approved by congress, it cannot be enforced until the remaining articles are approved and sent to the executive for promulgation. This cannot, in any case, be done until the next session, which will commence on the 1st day of April, 1871, (B.)

A new congress will be elected in June next, which, it is to be hoped, will exhibit a more judicious and enlightened policy upon this important subject, more in conformity with the wise statesmanship of the executive department of the government.

MEXICO, December 21, 1870.

MY ESTEEMED SIR: I have just received your letter of this date, in which you ask me two questions in regard to the free zone.

I have the honor to state, in reply to these questions, that the congress of the union approved, in the session of the 5th of November last, the fifty-third article of the tariff bill, which decrees the subsistence of the free zone and its extension to the northern frontier, and that, in the session of the 7th of the same month, the proper committee withdrew the fifty-fourth article of the same bill, in order to present it in another form. It did not present it during the remainder of the session, nor did congress finish the discussion of the tariff bill, consequently it has remained pending for the next session. Although a portion of the bill was sanctioned by congress, as it was not finished, nor sent to the executive for promulgation, it cannot be enforced, even in regard to the portion sanctioned. For this reason, although one of the articles of the bill which relates to the free zone was approved by congress during its last session, this article can not be put in practice until the approval of the remaining articles and the sending of the whole tariff, or at least the part already voted, to the executive for its promulgation. This cannot be done, in any case, before the next session, which will commence on the 1st of April, 1871.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Mexico, January 10, 1871. (Received January 25.)

SIR: On the 4th instant I addressed a note to the secretary for foreign affairs, in which I inclosed a copy of your dispatch dated December 12, 1870, relating to the depredations committed by bands of hostile Indians, chiefly located in the Guadalupe Mountains, upon the settlements of the Rio Grande from Paso del Norte downward. I also inclosed a copy of a communication from the Secretary of War to the Department of State, dated December 7, 1870, on the same subject. In compliance with my instructions, I asked the Mexican government to consent to adopt the suggestions of the Secretary of War in respect to the said Indians, and to authorize the government of the State of Chihuahua to communicate and co-operate with the commander of the sub-district of the presidio at Fort Davis, and, if necessary, to permit the troops of the United States to follow the Indians into Mexican territory and, with the aid of the Mexican troops, to intercept the Indians in their flight. In view of the emergency, requiring immediate action in the premises, I invoked the favorable answer of the Mexican government with as little delay as possible, (A.)

On the 7th instant, Mr. Lerdo replied that, desiring to co-operate so far as depends upon the executive in the plan proposed in my note and the inclosures, the President has decided to authorize the government of the State of Chihuahua to communicate with the commander of the sub-district of the presidio at Fort Davis, and to co-operate with him toward the success of the proposed plan, causing the forces which the governor of Chihuahua may employ for the purpose to intercept the flight of and to pursue the said hostile Indians who may flee to Mexican territory. With this object, Mr. Lerdo says he has communicated this authorization to the governor of Chihuahua, and also to the war department, recommending to the latter that, in order to take advantage of the present winter season, the said governor should be charged to lend efficient co-operation to the proposed plan with all the forces at his disposal. In regard to the permission for the troops of the United States to follow the said Indians into Mexican territory, the secretary adds that the executive has not the power to grant it, as the constitution of Mexico reserves that right to congress, which is not now in session, but will again meet on the 1st of April next, and that if I will then make it known that such permission is still desirable the subject will, in that case, be submitted to that body, (B and C.)

In this connection I beg leave to call the attention of the Department of State to the proposition of the Mexican government contained in the note of the secretary for foreign affairs, dated April 16, 1870, which was inclosed in my dispatch No. 216, (bis), concerning the removal of certain fragmentary bands of Indians from Mexico to their proper reservations within the territory of the United States. In that note Mr. Lerdo said that "the government of Mexico can co-operate with pleasure in furthering the object of the Government of the United States of America, an object both just and humane, the preventing of the depredations which the scattered bands of Indians are in the habit of committing on the frontier. This co-operation can consist in this, that if the Government of the United States should think proper to give notice of the time and place of the arrival on the frontier of the agents who may be sent to visit and unite the scattered bands of Indians, the government of Mexico would, at the proper time, place a force at the point designated to give to such agents the aid desired."

It is to be hoped that the Congress of the United States, during its present session, in the interests of humanity and for the peace and prosperity of the frontier, will make the necessary appropriation for the removal of the said Indians from the soil of Mexico to their reservations within our own territory.

Your obedient servant,

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Mexico, January 4, 1871.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose a copy of a dispatch from the Secretary of State of the United States, dated December 12, and also a copy of a communication from the Secretary of War of the United States, dated December 7, both of which relate to the depredations committed by bands of hostile Texan Indians, chiefly located in the Guadalupe Mountains, upon the settlements of the Rio Grande, from El Paso to Del Norte.

The Secretary of War states that his Department is compelled to authorize military operations against these Indians, which can only be successfully carried on in the winter season; that they can be driven from their haunts, but that they will flee to Mexican territory, and that therefore it becomes necessary to seek the co-operation of the authorities of the republic of Mexico. The Secretary of War further says that if the national government of Mexico will authorize the government of the State of Chihuahua to communicate and co-operate directly with the commander of the sub-district of the presidio, whose headquarters are at Fort Davis, in the State of Texas, permitting, if need be, the troops of the United States to follow the Indians into Mexican territory, and using the Mexican troops to intercept the Indians in their flight, it is expected that a winter campaign will so cripple the power and subdue the spirit of the marauders, as to afford sensible relief from apprehension of danger and actual loss of life and property to the exposed citizens of both countries.

The said Secretary is advised that the authorities of the State of Chihuahua are favorably disposed toward the plan indicated, and that if the necessary order and authority can be obtained without delay, for their direct co-operation, it will enable the operations to be pursued this present winter.

In compliance with the instructions of the Department of State of the United States, I respectfully request that your excellency's government will consent to adopt the suggestions of the Secretary of War, in respect to the said Indians, and to authorize the government of the State of Chihuahua to communicate and co-operate with the commander of the sub-district of the presidio, at Fort Davis, and if necessary to permit the troops of the United States to follow the Indians into Mexican territory, and with the aid of the Mexican troops to intercept the Indians in their flight.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

Mexico, January 7, 1871.

SIR: I have the honor to reply to your excellency's note of the 4th instant, with which you sent me annexed copies of a dispatch from the honorable Secretary of State, and of a note from the honorable Secretary of War of the United States of America, dated respectively the 12th and the 7th of December last, both relating to the depredations committed by bands of hostile Texan Indians, chiefly located in the Guadalupe Mountains, upon the settlements of the Rio Grande from Paso del Norte downward.

In these two notes the necessity is set forth of undertaking military operations against those hostile Indians, which can only be successfully carried on in the winter season; the probability that, on being pursued, those hostile Indians would take refuge in Mexican territory; the necessity of seeking the co-operation of the authorities of the State of Chihuahua; the convenience of their being authorized by the national government of Mexico to communicate and co-operate with the commander of the sub-district of the presidio, whose headquarters are at Fort Davis, in the State of Texas, permitting, if need be, the troops of the United States of America to follow these hostile Indians into Mexican territory, and using the Mexican troops to intercept them in their flight, and the information had that the authorities of the State of Chihuahua are favorably disposed toward the plan indicated.

Desiring to co-operate, so far as depends upon the executive of Mexico, in the plan proposed in your excellency's note and its inclosures, the President has decided to authorize the government of the State of Chihuahua to communicate with the commander of the sub-district of the presidio, whose headquarters are at Fort Davis, Texas, and to co-operate with him toward the success of the proposed plan, causing the forces of the said governor of the State of Chihuahua may employ for the purpose, to intercept the flight of and to pursue the said hostile Indians who may flee to Mexican territory.

With this object I communicate this authorization to the governor of the State of Chihuahua, and also to the War Department, recommending to the latter, that in order to take advantage of the present winter season, it immediately charge the said governor to lend efficient co-operation to the proposed plan with all the forces at his disposal.

As to the permission for the troops of the United States of America to follow the hostile Indians who may flee into Mexican territory, the executive has not the honor to grant this permission, as the constitution of Mexico reserves it to congress, which is not now in session, but will again meet on the 1st of April next. Therefore, if your excellency shall then make known that such permission is still desirable, it will in this case be submitted to congress.

Mexico, January 23, 1871. (Received February 15.)

SIR: I herewith transmit further information concerning the cruise of the steamer Forward, consisting of a copy of a note from me to our consul at Guaymas, dated October 1, 1870, (A;) also an extract from a communication from the said consul dated November 14, 1870, (B;) also a copy of a communication of the said consul dated November 18, inclosing a letter from Charles J. Jansen, (C;) also a copy of the said letter, (D;) also a copy of a communication from the said consul dated November 18, in reply to my interrogatives, (E;) also a translation of the official account, by authority of the federal custom-house at Guaymas, of the raid of the Forward, (F;) also an extract from a private letter from our consul at Guaymas dated July 10, 1870, (G.)

These papers and documents, in connection with those I have heretofore sent, will perhaps be sufficient to settle the questions as to whether the government of Mexico should be held liable for the damage inflicted by the Forward, and whether, in fact, any property belonging to American citizens was seized or destroyed by her officers or crew.

Your obedient servant,

THOMAS H. NELSON.

LEGATION OF UNITED STATES,
Mexico, October 1, 1870.

SIR:

In your dispatch No. 20, of July 10, 1870, and also in a private letter of the same date, you state that "no American property or citizens were molested" by the Forward at Guaymas. Please report to this legation whether you have subsequently learned that American citizens sustained any losses by the raid. If so, please state the name and place of residence of each person, and the amount of injury he suffered. Did the commander of the expedition show to you or give you a copy of the order (alluded to in his note to you of May 29) of Mr. Louis Schumacher, of San Francisco, authorizing him to take possession of certain fire-arms, the property of the said Schumacher? If a copy of the said order can be obtained please transmit it to me.

Have you any information concerning the real object of the Forward when she left San Francisco? Was there any arrangement or understanding between Placido Vega and the owners or officers of the Forward before she sailed, or afterwards, in regard to the purposes of the expedition? Was the charter-party which was signed by Charles J. Jansen and others in San Francisco executed in good faith? Have you any reason to believe that Captain James C. Jones was implicated with Vega or Vizcayno?

Please respond to these inquiries at your earliest convenience.

I remain, &c.,

THOMAS H. NELSON.

[Extract from a letter from A. Willard, esq., United States Consul at Guaymas, dated November 14, 1870.]

For the want of time (as there is only three hours from the arrival to the departure of the mail) I cannot possibly answer in detail the questions which you ask about the steamer Forward, (although there is but little more to communicate than what I have previously written.) I will by the mail of the 18th proximo address you more at length on this subject. As mentioned in my dispatches, no American goods or citizens "were molested" further than those mentioned as belonging to the house of Rodger, Meyer & Co., of San Francisco, known as an English house, whose goods were taken or seized at the house of Ortiz Hermanos, along with other consigned goods from Mazatlan. These goods of the said house of Rodger, Meyer & Co., may be American goods. As yet nothing has been done toward presenting proofs of the same, by the owners, with the view of making reclamations. A protest was made at the time of seizure, against the act of Colonel Vizcayno, by a clerk of the house of Ortiz Hermanos, but since then nothing has been done through the medium of this consulate either by the partners, Ortiz Hermanos, or the owners of the goods.

The order to take the fire-arms which Colonel Vizcayno stated he possessed from the owner, Mr. L. Shumacher, was not shown me, nor do I know of any one in Guaymas or elsewhere who saw it.

No notice was taken of my request for a copy of the same, which was one of the causes of my refusing to withdraw my protest, when requested verbally to do so by the aid of Colonel Vizcayno.

Your obedient servant,

A. WILLARD.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Guaymas, Mexico, November 18, 1870.

MY DEAR SIR: I enclose you herewith a private letter from Charles J. Jansen, received by me in September last; and as it refers to one of the inquiries answered in my dispatch of this date, I send it, so that you can see what he says in relation to the Forward. I am not personally acquainted with Mr. Jansen, and have never seen him to my knowledge, and the only letter received by me from him, previous to the one now inclosed, was in regard to a permit to ship ore (copper) from the copper mines on the Lower California coast, in which he was interested. To my reply to the enclosed letter I have received no acknowledgment. All that I know about Jansen is from hearsay, and he is represented as an energetic man of business, and has been connected with this coast in ships and shipping for some years.

The authorities view him as a friend of Vega, and believe him implicated more or less, but have not the proofs sufficient to make it clear. As Captain Jones was tried at Mazatlan and released, the facts elicited at the trial could be (and perhaps have been) sent you by our commercial agent at that place.

Your obedient servant,

A. WILLARD.

D.

Mr. Jansen to Mr. Willard.

SAN FRANCISCO, July 21, 1870.

DEAR SIR: I had this pleasure months ago; this time on a more painful subject.

You are too well acquainted with the raid on your city in the steamer Forward for me to repeat. A strong impression, I have reason to believe, exists in your city and Mazatlan, that in some manner or other I am or was in collusion with the enemies of the federal authorities of Mexico, and particularly those of the States of Sinaloa and Sonora, and who possessed themselves of the steamer Forward, on no other ground, to my knowledge, in theory or fact, than that I fitted that steamer and dispatched her from here.

The Forward left here on as legitimate a voyage and enterprise as ever a vessel left this port. A thorough investigation in this respect, had at Mazatlan on her arrival there, should divest all fair-thinking minds of all doubts. If no other in theory, such impression is still more absurd, since it was equally convenient to have dispatched the steamer to San Blas, the headquarters of the revolutionary party, as to Mazatlan. The fact is that public as well as private information all tended if not full assurance that Placido Vega had abandoned all hope of further disturbing the public peace, and had retired to private life at the time the steamer Forward left San Francisco, and she was sent to Mazatlan in preference to San Blas as a further guarantee of protection, and to prevent being tainted even with suspicion; and in my opinion there was collusion between Vega or his adherents and the liberal authorities of Mazatlan, in contriving to take Captain Jones away from the steamer, without at the same time providing protection for the boat, virtually taking her out of his and the owners' hands; and but for this (indicating the course for Vega to pursue) the misfortune would never have happened.

I make this explanation to you in hope that my name and character may not suffer at your hands in a private or national character. If I have succeeded in convincing you, I feel solicitous for your influence with others of your place whose good opinion I highly esteem.

I understand that five or six of the crew of the ill-fated Forward will be or have been sent to your city for trial. By what I can learn from those returned here, Holden, the mate, is grossly culpable and deserves little sympathy. The theory of the men returned here for acquiescing in proceeding in the Forward is that she should or was to go to Altata, for which she was said to have a clearance, there take in specie and other freight, and from there proceed direct to this port; and that the destination was Guaymas they had no knowledge until compelled by force.

I will not hold myself responsible for any expense or liability contracted by the crew of the steamer Forward that were taken at her destruction, and remain very truly, yours,

CHARLES J. JANSEN.

E.

Mr. Willard to Mr. Nelson.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Guaymas, Mexico, November 18, 1870.

SIR: I have the honor, agreeably to my last dispatch of the 14th instant, of answering more in detail the questions asked in your communication of October 1 last, pertaining to the raid on this port (28th of May) by the faction of Vega, commanded by one Colonel Fortunato Vizeayno, brought here by the steamer Forward.

1st. "To report whether I have subsequently learned that any American citizens sustained losses; and if so, to state the name, place of residence, amount," &c.

As mentioned in my former dispatches, no United States citizens residing here were molested or their property injured, excepting as far as the federal custom-house duties are concerned; all of said duties unpaid and pending were paid by the merchants irrespective of nationality, they being called to the custom-house by Vizeayno in the name of the collector, who at the time was a prisoner. The firm of Roundtree & Lubbuk paid $1,000, the amount due by them for duties, and W. H. Behrendt $1,400, the same being due. These are the only United States citizens who had duties pending; they refused to pay until the proper receipt, (carta pago), duly signed by the collector and other officers, was furnished them, and which was done, the same kind of receipt being given to all on payment of the amount due for federal duties.

Goods seized.—The house of Ortiz Hermanos was the only house which sustained loss by forcible seizure, Vizeayno notifying the said house to pay him the sum of $25,000, or he would take goods by force to double that sum. No one appearing to represent the house, on the evening of the 29th of May an officer of Vizcayno presented himself at the store-house and demanded that the doors should be opened, which was done by a clerk of the house, and goods of various classes taken, amounting in the aggregate to $40,000. (I herewith inclose, marked No. 1, a list of the same furnished by one of the partners of the said Spanish and Mexican commission-house of Ortiz Hermanos, a copy of the same being on file in this consulate.) A protest was made at the time before me by a clerk of the said house against this act of Vizcayno. Among the goods thus taken were a portion of those consigned to Ortiz Hermanos from the house of Rodger Meyer & Co., of San Francisco, California. This house, I am informed, is known in San Francisco as an "English importing house." One of the founders of the firm—Rodgers, an Englishman—having died some years ago, an interest in the house was purchased by an American named Dean; still the "firm name" remains unchanged. Meyer, one of the partners, I am informed, is a German. As mentioned in my dispatch of the 14th instant, the goods of the said house of Rodger, Meyer & Co. may be American property, but as yet nothing has been done through the medium of the consulate or otherwise, that I am aware of, in presenting proofs of the nationality of the said firm, either by Ortiz Hermanos or by the said firm itself.

2d. "Did the commander of the expedition show or give a copy of the order (alluded to in his note to this consulate dated May 28) of Mr. Louis Schumacher, of San Francisco, authorizing him to take possession of the fire-arms, the property of the said Schumacher? and if so, and it can be obtained, transmit a copy of the same."

This order (if one existed) was not shown to me, nor do I know of any one who says that they saw it; and no notice was taken of my request for a copy of the same, and, as mentioned in my dispatch of the 14th instant, was one of the causes why I refused to retire my protest, stating to the Aid of Vizcayno, "if Vizcayno would show me the legitimate order, and give me a guarantee that the duties on said arms would be paid to the general government of Mexico, amounting to rather more than $4,000, that I then might consider the propriety of retiring my protest, but it would then only be by guaranteeing that said arms would be taken to the United States, and not landed on the Mexican coast."

3d. "Concerning the object of the steamer Forward when she left San Francisco, and whether I have any information as to an arrangement or understanding between Vega and the owners or officers of the Forward before she sailed from San Francisco, or afterwards, as to the purposes of the expedition?"

I have no information of any kind, more than the reports that were afterward published in the papers; and when the steamer Forward was detained at Mazatlan by the authorities, it was said here that this steamer was in the interest of Vega, and the same was reported in regard to the American vessels, Francis Palmer and Harrison, who were at that time at or near San Blas.

4th. "The charter-party, signed by Charles J. Janson, whether executed in good faith, or have I any reason to believe that Captain James C. Jones was implicated with Vega?"

Of this, likewise, I know nothing. I learn from private sources that Charles J. Janson contends that he fitted out the steamer for the purpose of "fishing for oysters," and the object was a legitimate fishing expedition, and that it was sent to Mazatlan, with the proper clearance papers, in preference to San Blas, &c.; but the proofs as to this being so, or the contrary, I cannot assert for want of the necessary information. As to the complicity of Captain Jones with Vega or Vizcayno, I know absolutely nothing, and have heard but few comments. As this port is so far away from the base of Vega's operations, the statements received here are garbled and unreliable. Mazatlan having been the object of Vega, and being nearer his base, no doubt you have received from there more full and reliable information in regard to the two last inquiries in this dispatch.

I beg to inclose (marked No. 2) the official account of the raid on this port by the Forward, as published in the official paper of Sonora; being sent by the first officer of this custom-house to the government at Mexico, dated May 29 last.

I have the honor, &c.,

A. WILLARD,
United States Consul.

Official account, by authority of the federal custom-house at Guaymas, of the raid of the steamer Forward, May 28 and 29, 1870.

[From the Eco de Sonora of November 11, 1870.]

DISTRICT COURT, State of Sonora.

CITIZEN MINISTER: I regret to inform you that on the morning of the 29th instant this town was surprised by insurrectionary forces of the Ex-General Vega, which landed about four leagues from this port from on board the war-steamer Forward, bearing the flag of San Salvador, under the command of the Ex-Colonel Fortuno Vizcayno, with the object of recovering about four thousand muskets which were in deposit at the barracks of the stationary companies, for the non-payment of duties at this custom-house, by order of the treasury department. As this port was at that time defenseless, these forces obtained full possession of it, and attacked the treasury officers, whence they obtained, by means of the pending credits, about $70,000, taken violently from the employés and from merchants. Besides this, they sacked the stores of Ortiz Brothers; and on their departure, which they effected the night of the 29th, on learning the approach of the forces which the active general, citizen Garcia Morales, had collected, they carried with them the citizen administrator, who, from the night before, was on board with his employés, being the only person who remained in their power, notwithstanding the good offices of the consul of the United States, who put in requisition every means to save him, and labored actively to prevent still greater scandals in this city.

In order to carry off the arms and goods, they embargoed the national brigantine schooner Colima and pilot-boat San Pablo, but did not tow away the national vessel Sonora, on account of the haste with which they fled from the shots of the advance guard of the government forces, then at the spot known as Punta de Lastre, at the entrance of the bay. The employés who were captured, the accountant in charge of the collector's office, citizen Andres Fenochio, and the subscriber who was in charge of the accounts when the delivery of the money in hand and of the pending credits was demanded of them, refused to comply, alleging that, as they did not recognize in Don Fortuno Vizcayno any legitimate authority, they absolutely declined to surrender the said property, and the more so, since from the very moment when the place was taken by forces opposed to the supreme government they considered themselves as private individuals, and no longer as employés. Both these officers were then forcibly compelled to place their signatures, as the merchants requested, upon the letters of credit and notes, which were presented to them without comparison with the books, which the citizen administrator and the subscriber, by his order, did, after protesting against the validity of all such acts, and stating the above considerations to the persons interested, who in turn protested, and, as it would seem, paid over the amounts of their debits.

About 12 o'clock yesterday I found means to escape, the administrator still remaining a prisoner, who, I am informed, afterward escaped also; but as I do not know where he now is, I take upon myself to inform you of these unfortunate but important events, hoping that the citizen administrator will, by the first mail, give you fuller particulars, since I do not yet know all the details, and am now away from my office, which I left closed, for which reason the present letter is sent without an official seal or the proper number, which I hope will be pardoned.

Country and liberty! Guaymas, May 29, 1870.

Extract from a private letter from Alexander Willard, etc., United States Consul at Guaymas, dated July 10, 1870.

In my dispatch No. 20 I state no American property or citizens were molested, and I still believe so, although among some here, the house of Ortiz Hermanos, they state that Rodger, Meyer & Co., of San Francisco, California, is an American house, and as they lost some goods it is American property. I have always heard this house spoken of as an English house, and although Rodgers, the founder, has been dead some years, and a Mr. Dean (an American) has purchased, as I have been informed recently, an interest, the firm name of the house remains unchanged, and it is looked on by merchants as an English importing house, the same as Cross & Co., of San Francisco. In my letter to our commercial agent at Mazatlan, immediately after Vizcayno's raid at this port, I stated no American property was molested; not with an idea of influencing Mr. Sisson either one way or the other, but because I believe so; and also regarding a ship of war, I wrote, this is too delicate a matter for me to give you advice upon, (in your district.) The Forward was here under San Salvador colors, (I believed so,) and Vizcayno called her his transport. Captains of ships of war have their own ideas of overhauling vessels that are mixed up in the family quarrels of Mexico. The German consul, Mr. Thaumhauser, and yourself can consult as to what had best be done in case there is a vessel of war in your port. I protested against the arms being taken officially, and also the coals, but they did as they pleased; the coals, as I stated, have been paid for

This is the substance of what I wrote to him, the official dispatch the same as the No. 20; and the German merchants, who have been the sufferers by this raid, pronounce my letter out of place, as I did not urge on Sisson positive advice and use stronger language condemnatory of the affair.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, February 7, 1871.

SIR: I transmit a copy of the reply of the Secretary of War to the letter of this Department which was accompanied by a copy of your dispatch No. 336, of the 10th ultimo, relative to Indian affairs. It will be noticed that General Belknap deems it advisable that the required consent of the Mexican congress to the entrance of United States troops into that republic, near the frontier, for the purpose referred to, should be obtained. You will, consequently, adopt such measures for that purpose as may seem to you proper and likely to be successful. In a matter, however, which must, if not judiciously managed, wound the sensibilities of a people so averse to anything like an invasion of their soil by foreigners, it will be necessary to move with great delicacy and caution, not merely with a view to compass the object desired, but to avoid giving offense by even proposing it. Confidence, however, is reposed in your discretion.

I am, &c.,

HAMILTON FISH.

[Inclosure.]

Mr. Belknap to Mr. Fish.

WAR DEPARTMENT,

Washington City, February 3, 1871.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge your reference to this Department on the 28th ultimo of a copy of a recent dispatch from the United States minister to Mexico, informing the Department of State that, in accordance with the request of this Department, the Mexican government has authorized the governor of the State of Chihuahua to co-operate with the United States military commander at Fort Davis in a campaign against the hostile Indians in Texas; but that the United States troops cannot be permitted to pursue the Indians into Mexican territory without the consent of the Mexican congress; also, calling attention to the offer of the Mexican government to assist the United States authorities in restoring to the territory of the United States certain straggling bands of Indians now in Mexico.

In reply, I have the honor to inform you that the military commander at Fort Davis has been led to expect the co-operation of the governor of Chihuahua in his campaign against the Indians, and it is, therefore, only necessary now to ask that, with a view of assisting any future operations that may become desirable for the protection of the citizens of both sides of the Rio Grande, the Mexican congress be requested to grant the requisite authority for the troops of the United States, under such conditions as may be deemed proper, to pursue within the Mexican border such hostile Indians from the United States as may flee into Mexico to escape their merited punishment.

With regard to the removal of the fragmentary bands of Indians, you are informed that the Indian Bureau is now engaged in the necessary arrangements for their removal, an appropriation of $25,000 having been granted for the purpose.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF STATE.

No. 279.

Mr. Nelson to Mr. Fish.

No. 353.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Mexico, February 10, 1871. (Received February 27.)

SIR: On the 4th instant a rumor of the capitulation of Paris was circulated in this city, causing intense excitement on the part of the German and French residents. On the following day several contradictory telegrams appeared, some affirming and others denying that news, which was not fully verified until the arrival at Vera Cruz, on the 8th instant, of a steamer from New Orleans. On the 6th instant, however, in consequence of new telegrams received via Galveston, Matamoras, and San Luis Potosi, the Germans became so fully convinced of the fact that they raised the flag of the German Empire over their clubhouse, where they gathered in the evening to celebrate the event with illuminations, music, and boisterous conviviality.

The French population became, thereupon, so exasperated as to openly threaten an attack upon the German club, and scenes of bloodshed were imminent. During the day the French succeeded in obtaining an order from the government for the lowering of the German flag, as being a demonstration unauthorized in a neutral country.

At about half past five o'clock p. m. of that day, I received a communication from Mr. Ernest Burdel, in charge of the archives of the French legation, a translation of which is herewith inclosed, (A,) in which, after referring to the great excitement consequent upon the receipt of the telegraphic news above mentioned, he invoked my good offices with the Mexican government, for the purpose of preventing any public manifestations on the part of the Germans, which, considered as a provocation by the French, might result in deplorable excesses.

I replied to Mr. Burdel immediately, (B,) promising to do everything in my power for the prevention of such tumults, and addressed a note to the department of foreign affairs, (C,) inclosing Mr. Burdel's communication, and inviting the Mexican government to take timely measures for the maintenance of public order and tranquillity.

On the 7th instant I advised Mr. Burdel of the steps which I had taken in compliance with his request, (D,) and received from him another communication, (E,) thanking me for my good offices, but deploring that the steps taken by the government had not been more effective.

On the same day Mr. Manuel Aspiroz, the acting secretary for foreign affairs, addressed me a note, (F,) in which he informed me that immediately upon the receipt of mine of the day before, proper measures were taken to preserve order, in addition to those previously taken by the government of the district.

At an early hour of the evening, an allegorical transparency, allusive to the recovery of the Rhine by the Germans, was placed in front of the clubhouse. Soon after the French residents began to gather in the street to the number of two or three hundred, all armed; the windows of the building were stoned, several shots were fired, and the transparency destroyed. After some time the police appeared, along with a cavalry force, and dispersed the rioters, wounding some and carrying others to prison; the illumination was extinguished, and, by the aid of the police, the Germans were enabled to conclude their festivity in quietness. An inflammatory account of the transaction appeared the following day in the French paper, the Trait d'Union, a translation of which is herewith annexed, (G.) Several personal collisions have since occurred, and the state of feeling between the French and Germans continues to be very much embittered. I trust that the course which I thought proper to pursue as the friend of both nationalities, and in their common interest, will meet the approval of the Department of State.

Your obedient servant,

THOMAS H. NELSON.

ARCHIVES OF THE FRENCH LEGATION,
Mexico, February 6, 1871.

MR. MINISTER: Telegrams from San Luis which have announced the capitulation of Paris have excited emotion among the Germans and the French residents of this capital, which the slightest incident may cause to break out into excesses which would be very deplorable.

Although I do not doubt that the authorities are disposed to take all the measures which prudence and impartiality suggest for the prevention of a conflict, I nevertheless think it my duty to request from your benevolence that you will invite the administration to prohibit on the part of the Germans any public manifestation which might assume the character of a provocation to the French.

You will undoubtedly agree with me, sir, that it is better to prevent the evil than to allow it to take place, and that it is in a moment which fills us with sorrow and clothes us in mourning that it is most befitting for you to discharge the high protective mission which the Government at Washington has conferred upon you.

Be pleased to accept the assurance of the sentiments of respect, with which I have the honor to be, Mr. Minister, your very humble and very obedient servant,

ERNEST BURDEL.

MEXICO, February 6, 1871.

MY DEAR SIR: I received your note of this date at 5.30 p. m., and called immediately upon Mr. Beneke, the German consul, (the Baron Von Schlozer being absent from the city,) to ascertain whether it was the purpose of his countrymen to make a public demonstration, by way of rejoicing over the report of the capitulation of Paris. Mr. Beneke informed me that he had been invited to a reunion at the German club, but was not aware of any intention to have a public demonstration at this time, but that he would ascertain and communicate to me the facts without delay. In the event that a public demonstration is contemplated which might result in tumults and excesses, I will do everything in my power, both officially and personally, to prevent it.

Very truly, yours,

THOMAS H. NELSON.

SIR: I herewith inclose a note I have just received from Mr. Burdel, who is in charge of the French archives in this city, in which he expresses the apprehension that a public manifestation of rejoicing by the German residents in this city over the report of the capitulation of Paris, would result in tumults and excesses, and requests me to invite the Mexican government to prohibit any public demonstration which might assume the character of a provocation to the French.

I send the note to you immediately, so that proper and timely measures may be taken to prevent a disturbance, if the information communicated by Mr. Burdel should prove to be correct.

MY DEAR SIR: Having learned that there were indications of a tumult in front of the German club last evening, at 7½ o'clock, I addressed a note to the department of foreign affairs, in which I inclosed your note of yesterday, so that proper and timely measures might be taken to prevent any collision between the French and German residents of this capital. I was advised that the said notes were immediately communicated to the governor of the federal district, and that means were employed to prevent a disturbance.

MY DEAR SIR: I received yesterday afternoon and to-day the letters which you have been so good as to address me with a promptness which elicits my deepest gratitude. I regret that the authorities charged with the maintenance of order have not proceeded with a decision and a moderation which might certainly have prevented the lamentable scene of last night. However this may be, there is reason to believe that, as a result of what has happened, not less than of the wise prohibition of the President of the republic, such events will not again occur.

I beg you to accept, my dear sir, along with my thanks, the assurances of my very devoted regard.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Mexico, February 7, 1871.

SIR: Yesterday at 8 o'clock p. m. I received the note which your excellency addressed me, accompanied by a communication from Mr. Burdel, in charge of the archives of the French legation in Mexico, in which he expresses the fear that a public manifestation of rejoicing made by the German residents in this city, on account of the news of the capitulation of Paris, might result in tumults and excesses, and requests your excellency to address the Mexican government, inviting it to prohibit any public demonstration which might have the character of a provocation to the French.

In view of the facts, your excellency was pleased immediately to remit the communication of Mr. Burdel, in order that the proper measures might be taken to prevent disorder, in case the information furnished by Mr. Burdel should prove correct.

In reply, I have the honor to state to your excellency that, at the moment of receiving your note, the proper measures were taken to preserve order, in addition to those already taken by the government of the district.

I have much pleasure in improving this occasion to express the very distinguished consideration with which I have the honor to subscribe myself, very respectfully, &c.,

[Translation of an article from the Trait d'Union of February 7, 1871.]

THE GERMAN FESTIVAL.

With deplorable levity, the German residents of Mexico, even before receiving any confirmation of the news of the surrender of Paris, have, as it would seem, determined to put to some use the flags, transparencies, and trophies which they have had ready for use for more than three months, and which were beginning to mold.

During the morning a tri-colored flag, probably that of their new German empire, was hoisted over their club-house, to the great scandal of the French population, and of the vast majority of the Mexican population, who have regarded this act merely as an imprudent and odious provocation.

It became necessary to procure an order from the President himself, to oblige them to lower this flag, illegally raised over a private edifice, to the great detriment of public order.

In the evening they wished to take their revenge by illuminating their club and placing upon the balcony a transparency upon which was an allegorical painting insulting to France. The French population became violently excited in consequence of this insult in a neutral country, and very grave disorders were to be feared. The police was summoned to the spot, several shots were fired, many persons it is said were wounded by the police, and the famous transparency was torn in pieces.

The Germans of Mexico are playing a villainous game. This mode of celebrating a false piece of news by public manifestations in a neutral country, where so large a number of French reside, does no honor either to their good sense or to their character. They have acted in the same manner at Colima and at Vera Cruz when the news was received of the capitulation of Metz, and we strongly advise them to abandon this custom, for they have neither hundreds of thousands of men nor Krupp cannons here to enable them to act as savages. They are not in a conquered country, and they may fare the worse for their folly.

At the time of the Italian wars, the French abstained from all public demonstrations out of regard for the nationalities which such manifestations would have wounded. If the Germans are so proud of the exploits of their countrymen, who shoot women and old men, and rob France like real bandits, they are free to be so. The Comanches also drink fire-water and dance around their prisoners before massacring them; but let them rejoice in their own homes and their own circle, and no one will be the worse for it. This would be more dignified and less dangerous.

MINISTRY OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Mexico, February 7, 1871.

Yesterday, at eight o'clock in the evening, the note was received which your excellency was pleased to address me, together with a communication from Mr. Burdel, in charge of the archives of the French legation at the city of Mexico, in which the fear is expressed that public rejoicings on the part of the Germans residing in this city, on account of the news of the capitulation of Paris, will cause a riot, and your excellency is requested to address the Mexican government, asking it to forbid any public demonstration which might be calculated to provoke the French.

In view of which your excellency saw fit to send Mr. Burdel's communication immediately, in order that the proper measures might be taken to prevent any disorder, if the information furnished by Mr. Burdel should prove correct.

In reply, I have the honor to inform your excellency that, as soon as your note was received, proper steps were taken to preserve order, in addition to the measures which had already been taken by the government of the district.

I am very happy to assure you of the very distinguished consideration with which I have the honor to subscribe myself, very respectfully, your excellency's obedient servant,

MANUEL AZPIROZ.

His Excellency THOS. H. NELSON,
Envoy Extraordinary of the United States of America, in Mexico.

[From the Two Republics of February 11, 1871.]

THE GERMAN DEMONSTRATION.

Upon receiving intelligence of the surrender of Paris, the German residents of this city made their arrangements for a suitable celebration of the great triumph of their countrymen in Europe. During the day they hoisted their national banner over their club-rooms, at night their building was brilliantly illuminated, and they assembled in large numbers with their guests in the rooms, where the most enthusiastic interchanges passed, with music, song, toasts, and speeches. Among their guests were several gentlemen distinguished as eminent writers. Our colleagues of the Siglo, who were present upon this joyous occasion, speak of it as a happy and enthusiastic reunion, exhibiting an overflow of patriotism and a laudable love of Fatherland. They speak in the highest terms of the spirit of hospitality, kindness, and good feeling which pervaded the assemblage. They make honorable mention of Mr. Ignacio Altamirano, his political flights and happy oratorical figures.

We were honored with an invitation to participate in this just tribute to the brave soldiers of Germany; but imperative circumstances deprived us of that great pleasure. No member of the club felt more gratification than ourself upon the receipt of the joyful intelligence of an event which indicated the long-wished termination of the distressing war which was afflicting Europe, and which carried sorrow to the firesides of numbers in every other country. That the Germans would celebrate the greatest triumph of their country, more, the greatest in the history of the known world, was to be expected. Our French fellow-residents, though bowed down in affliction at the sad reverses of their countrymen, though their honor and military pride were chastened, though smarting under the agonizing pressure of repeated defeats and ultimate conquest of their country, could have expected nothing more nor less than that the Germans, having the right, would celebrate, as the French would have done under a reverse of circumstances, that is, if the occasion had been the surrender of Berlin. We regret that our French fellow-residents, exasperated and chafed at the misfortunes of their country, did not possess the fortitude, resignation, and dignity sufficient to have remained silent and passive.

The Germans could have restrained the yearnings and outpourings of human nature, and, content with the glories of their countrymen which are now filling the minds of all men, have abstained from any demonstration whatever; and doubtless, so far as their own feelings were interested, would have done so; but they were actuated by the most laudable and honorable feelings. It was not their triumph, it was not the result of their deeds of prowess, it was not the achievement of their genius and chivalry, for which they had assembled to celebrate. It was that of their countrymen in Europe, it was a debt of honor and gratitude which they felt bound to acknowledge upon the first suitable occasion. It was with this object they met in festive assemblage, and not to wound the already lacerated feelings of their French fellow-residents; and neither were they justifiable in so constraining the conduct of the Germans. In this the latter may have been mistaken; it may be insisted upon that their demonstration was in bad taste, or the result of bad judgment. Yet the French inhabitants were to be pitied more than blamed for their delirium, for to us it appears nothing less, but they are not blameless for their tumultuous and disorderly proceedings. In these they violated the hospitality which had been so generously extended to them by the Mexicans; they are inexcusable for taking into their own hands the right to resent, remedy, and punish what they considered, in their inflamed imaginations, as an insult.

We understand that the proceedings within the club-rooms were orderly, harmonious, cool, and prudent, while outside the assemblage of the excited French were tumultuous, law-breaking, and indecent; they denounced and execrated, threw stones and fired shots at the windows and the emblematic transparency of the club-room; and continued their proceedings until a number of them were arrested and the others dispersed by the military. Although it is estimated that over two hundred persons marched in a body through the streets to the club-rooms, we are happy to be informed, and to make this statement, not over forty or fifty were engaged in the riotous proceeding referred to; that the larger number had followed from curiosity, and most of them in front of the club-rooms were inactive spectators; from which we are to infer that the respectable French population neither participated in nor encouraged the outrage; and we are happy to think that the proceedings were confined to the ruder or more disorderly class.

We trust that ere long after the halcyon news of peace has been received, these asperities which have grown up during the war will wear off, as it should, between the people of two nations that have shown on the part of each so many of the attributes of patriotism and chivalry.

THE AMERICAN MINISTER.

Some persons animadverting upon the course of Mr. Nelson in the matter of the German and French troubles on last Tuesday, misunderstand his proceedings and attitude upon the occasion. During the day, Mr. Burdel, the French representative, called upon Minister Nelson, and informed him that in consequence of the Germans making preparations for a public demonstration in reference to the events of the war, the French regarding said movements as insulting to their nationality, and intended to wound their personal feelings, were becoming very much excited; and it was his opinion that, if the preparations proceeded, serious disturbances would follow and the public peace would be disrupted. At the same time Mr. Burdel reminded Mr. Nelson that he (Mr. Burdel) had no official position near this government; that the French population had no representative, further than what they might expect from his good offices, and appealed to his benevolence to place this matter before the government in its true character, that the unhappy consequences which were expected might be averted. Whereupon Mr. Nelson immediately addressed Mr. Aspiroz, the mayor official in charge of the state department, informing him of the unpleasant condition of things. At this point the proceedings of Mr. Nelson ceased; he could do nothing less than he had done, standing, as he did, in the attitude of the representative of a Government that was friendly to both nations, and before one where the French had no representative. He lent his good offices for a laudible purpose, and which ended in a happy result. Immediately upon receipt of Mr. Nelson's communication, Mr. Aspiroz laid the matter before the local authorities, and measures were adopted to prevent any serious collisions between the excited parties, which were effectual, with the exception of a few persons being slightly wounded and a few others being carried off to prison.

CASUALTIES OF THE RIOT.

The Revista of the 9th instant furnishes the names of a number of persons who were injured in consequence of the riot of the French in Calle San Francisco, on Monday night: Mrs. Michaud, of the restaurant Nacional; Messrs. Meyer, Haramboure, Loudon, and Reville, all French; besides a young Mexican, whom the editor saw with a dislocated arm.

The Revista further mentions Messrs. Donde, Kampfner, Fuentes, Noreña, and Loudais, all Mexicans, who were victims of the riot.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, February 25, 1871.

SIR: A copy of a letter of the 19th instant, and of the protest to which it refers, addressed to this Department by the Hon. Benjamin F. Butler, of the House of Representatives, is herewith inclosed. General

Butler writes on behalf of the Lower California Company, which, as you are aware, has a grant of land bordering on Magdalena Bay. One of the stipulations in the contract of the company with the Mexican government is that they shall settle two hundred families on their tract before the 1st of May next. This will obviously be impracticable unless the vessel in which the members of those families may embark shall be landed at the spot, instead of first proceeding to the remote port of La Paz, which the Mexican consul at San Francisco declares to be the only port of entry in that quarter. You will consequently suggest to that government the expediency of at once establishing a port of entry at Magdalena Bay, in order that the technical obstacle to the landing of colonists and of supplies for them there may be avoided.

This Government has no disposition to connive at any voluntary violation or evasion of the laws of Mexico by citizens of the United States. When, however, the government of that country enters into a contract with those citizens, it is not conceived to be right or generous on its part to withhold any reasonable facility which may be necessary toward carrying the contract into effect. If, as is supposed to be the case in this instance, the facility should be indispensable, that government would justly be accountable for refusing it.

In order, however, that the character of your proceedings may not constitute an inconvenient precedent, they will be limited to personal and unofficial representations.

I am, &c.,

HAMILTON FISH.

[Inclosure.]

General B. F. Butler to Mr. Fish.

WASHINGTON, February 19, 1871.

(Received February 21.)

SIR: I have the honor to ask to have filed on the archives of the State Department the inclosed protest of the agent of the Lower California Company against the action of the Mexican consul in forbidding the clearance from San Francisco of any vessel for Magdalena Bay, which is the headquarters of our colony.

This action of the Mexican authorities is of the gravest import to the Lower California Company. That company is very vigorously pushing its colonization enterprise in order to fulfill, beyond all question, the terms of its grant to colonize two hundred families before the 1st of May next. This action of the Mexican consul tends to prevent this consummation. It can hardly be possible that Mexico can refuse to let us land with provisions upon our territory, and then complain of the company for not fulfilling its contract by not landing. But this matter has still graver import. We have already landed a large number of men, whom, for the present, we must supply with provisions for their immediate necessities, tools, seeds, materials for houses and other comforts of life, to enable them to sustain themselves and to carry out their enterprise. Now, if we cannot send them these supplies the colonists may starve, and great suffering ensue. So that we present herewith to the State Department the case of American citizens going upon land purchased and paid for to the Mexican government, and carrying on an enterprise in conformity with the order, decrees, and contract of the Mexican government, and then an interference with the business necessary to be done by Mexican agents, which will result in great loss to the company and great wrong to American citizens; and for this we ask the prompt interposition of our Government, as well in behalf of the company as of its citizens who have placed dependence upon Mexican faith.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, yours,

BENJ. F. BUTLER.

HON. HAMILTON FISH,
Secretary of State.

CONSULATE OF MEXICO,
San Francisco, January 27, 1871.

Public notice is hereby given that La Paz, being the only port of entry at present open to foreign trade in the territory of Lower California, the landing of merchandise or provisions at any other point of that peninsula renders the vessel and cargo liable for infringing the Mexican revenue laws.

ISAAC RIVAS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, City and County of San Francisco, ss :

Whereas the foregoing attached notice or advertisement appeared in the Evening Bulletin, a daily newspaper published in the city and county of San Francisco, State of California, in its regular issue of Saturday, January 28, 1871 ;

And whereas the effect of said notice or advertisement has been, and will be, highly detrimental and injurious, and cause great loss and damage to the "Lower California Company," a corporation organized under the laws of the State of New York, of which corporation Drake De Kay, esq., is the secretary, agent, and attorney in fact on this coast ;

And whereas the consul of the Mexican Republic refused to give clearance to the brig Curlew, loaded with colonists and provisions and goods for the use of and belonging to same, dispatched by said Lower California Company in the fulfillment of the condition of the contract made and existing between the Mexican government and I. P. Leese, in Saltillo, in March, 1864, and revalidated on 4th May, 1866, which condition makes it obligatory upon the said Lower California Company to introduce into the peninsula of Lower California two hundred colonizing families before the 4th day of May, A. D. 1871 ;

And whereas, the said refusal of the Mexican consul has caused the withdrawal of a vessel previously advertised to continue the work of fulfilling the contract aforesaid, has seriously alarmed a large number of families already prepared to emigrate to Lower California, has prevented the shipment of a full cargo of lumber from another port to Magdalena, on the wharf and ready for shipment, has greatly frightened ship-owners here who were preparing to engage in the business, and has already absolutely suspended a large number of contracts entered into and being negotiated for the furtherance of the company's interest, and the compliance with the aforesaid condition of said concession : in fact, it has, at one blow, nullified all the effect of the elaborate and expensive machinery organized by the Lower California Company for the rapid peopling and development of the conceded lands of Lower California, which system had, in the face of and notwithstanding the opposition and discouragement offered by the governor of Lower California, who, although referring the questions raised by him to the decision of the supreme government, nevertheless officially stated and repeated that he could not conform himself with the action of the company in Lower California, thereby intimidating the agents of the company and those colonists invited to the company's lands, making every one of them feel that he went to the country at risk of life and property, and, although so hampered, had the effect of placing in the said territory a large number of colonists of the best class, no paupers or persons of bad character being permitted to go there, and of day by day, week by week, increasing the applications of families to go there, until now some one thousand families were prepared to make homes for themselves there, when this notice or advertisement so evidently hostile, absolutely preventing either emigration to, or shipment of supplies down, or produce back, stopped short the whole business, causing incalculable loss in money and great injury and damage to the company, also casting reproach and opprobrium upon the agents, directors, and share-holders thereof ;

And whereas the said Drake De Kay, as such agent, secretary, and attorney of said company, as aforesaid, has requested F. I. Thibault, a notary public in and for said city and county of San Francisco, State of California, to make his protest and this public act thereof, and that the same may serve and be of full force and value as of right shall appertain ;

Now, therefore, the said Drake De Kay protests, and I, the said notary, F. I. Thibault, at the special instance and request of said Drake De Kay, do hereby publicly and solemnly protest against the acts aforesaid, against the said Mexican consul, against his said notice or advertisement and the legality thereof, against the refusal of said consul to give clearance to said vessel, against the Mexican government and any of its agent or agents, and all persons acting by or under said government, and against whomsoever else it shall or may concern, for all costs, charges, losses, damages, injuries and expenses already incurred, or to be hereafter incurred, by said Lower California Company, its agents, directors, share-holders, and all other persons, for, or by reason or on account of, said notice or advertisement, and the publication thereof, the said consul's refusal as aforesaid, and any and all of the matters aforesaid.

Thus done and protested in San Francisco, this 30th day of January, A. D. 1871.

In testimony whereof, as well the said Drake De Kay as I, the said notary, have subscribed these presents, and I, the said notary, have hereunto affixed my official seal this 30th day of January, A. D. 1871.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Mexico, February 27, 1871. (Received March 20.)

SIR: I have received from our consular agent at Tehuantepec a copy of an anonymous proclamation of an extraordinary character, which has been widely circulated in the towns and villages on the isthmus. The denunciatory language therein employed against several citizens of the United States, and the incitements given to violence and assassination, impelled me to call the serious attention of the Mexican government to the subject. Accordingly, on the 24th instant, I addressed a note to the department of foreign affairs, and inclosed a copy of the proclamation, (A and B.)

Your obedient servant,

THOMAS H. NELSON

Mr. Nelson to Mr. Aspiroz.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,
Mexico, February 24, 1871.

SIR: I deem it my duty to call the attention of the Mexican government to the inclosed anonymous proclamation, which I am informed has been profusely circulated in the various towns and villages of the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, immediately after the close of the late expedition of the forces of the State of Oaxaca against the rebels of Juchitan.

The denunciatory language therein employed against several citizens of the United States, and the incitements given to violence and assassination, would seem to deserve the serious attention of the government of Mexico.

I have the honor to remain, with great respect, your obedient servant,

THOMAS H. NELSON.

[Translation.]

People of the Isthmus :

You have already witnessed the great losses which we have suffered on account of four miserable foreigners having defied the legitimate government of the State of Oaxaca; four wretches whom we have seen not long ago clothed in garments so ragged that the lice needed to be rope-dancers, and were occupied in performing gymnastic exercises.

You now see the cook of the Louisiana company, John A. Wolf, demanding of our impoverished nation, with the utmost cynicism and impudence, half a million and odd dollars.

You now see Francis Dubois, the coachman of Don Thomas H. Wolrich, demanding also nearly four hundred thousand dollars.

You now see Don Alexander Gibbs accumulating every year a great fortune by means of our sweat and labor. You see him in this moment, when he has brought anarchy upon us, selling powder to the rebel chieftains, actuated solely by the ignoble interest of making money. You also see the immense heaps of salt which he has in the salt springs called "of Juchitan," but which ought to be called "of Gibbs." You well know that for a miserable stipend in money or in intoxicating liquor he robs us of our labor, making us pile up the salt from which he reaps such exorbitant profit.

What benefit do we derive from the fact that these springs bear the name of Juchitan, when no advantage from them falls to our people, but only to the pocket of Don Alexander, who has bought up our principal chiefs with a box of wine or a few yards of his contraband cloth? If the government orders, in accordance with the laws, that the value of these salt springs be estimated, you will see the people of Juchitan petitioning that the matter remain in its present state—that is to say, under the domination of the law of the strong hand, and of whoever may collect the greatest number of armed imbeciles to use as beasts of burden. And who form this people? Pineda and Don Alexander. And will these jesuitical foreigners aid us to rebuild our houses that have been burned?

How can Gibbs maintain his innocence if the testimony of his fellow god fathers Che Pedro Pineda and his accomplice H. be taken? And which of the Chees is not an accomplice of the innocent Gibbs?

People, open your eyes and behold your executioners, who, under the masks of hypocrites, and actuated by a thirst for money, sink thee in misery! People, learn who are the real "Binos Gadas," and make them disappear by the use of your daggers!

You now see these priests Cecilio Reyes, Vera, and Bonifacio Villalobos, each of whom has at the lowest calculation, at this time, twenty children and seven or eight concubines, bedecked and bejeweled with the money which they extort from us by their machinations and invocations of Saint Vincent! Why should I mention their names, since you well know them? What advancement can our town ever make, as long as it suits the convenience of these monks that we remain in the most complete ignorance and the grossest prejudices? What future can we expect in case of the arrival of some other Don Alexander, as ragged as you well remember this one to have been, to enrich himself at our expense by the sacrifice of our labor and our prosperity?

Accursed a thousand times be all those who have counseled our poor town to embark in a revolution in which we have lost even the image of our patron saint, merely for the vile interest of making us believe that the troops of the government carried it away!

People, all this cries out for a vengeance proportionate to the magnitude of our grievances, which we hope yet to wreak upon the real "Binos Gados."

SIR: I have just received the inclosed communication from the United States consul at Guaymas, in regard to the refusal of the governor of Sonora to surrender, upon the requisition of the governor of Arizona Territory, certain fugitives from justice, who are known to have murdered and robbed three American citizens at a place called Mission Ridge Camp in Arizona Territory in December last. I also inclose the documents referred to in the letter of the said consul, which will place within your knowledge the facts of the case. I trust that the supreme government will not hesitate to direct the necessary instructions to the governor of Sonora to deliver the said criminals to the persons duly authorized to receive them by the governor of Arizona, as soon as they can be arrested.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Mexico, March 8, 1871.

SIR: With a note from your excellency, dated the 25th of February ultimo, I received another from the consul of the United States of America at Guaymas, a letter from Mr. George Cooler, agent of the governor of Arizona Territory, and some newspaper slips, all which refer to the assassination and robbery which it appears was committed by certain Mexicans in the territory of the United States of America, and to the requisition for the surrender of the supposed criminals, made by the governor of Arizona upon the governor of Sonora, and the refusal of the latter to give them up, in case of their being found within the limits of that State.

Your excellency makes known your belief that the Mexican government, as soon as it shall become cognizant of the facts stated in these documents and papers, will not hesitate to send to the governor of Sonora the necessary instructions for the surrender of the accused parties. Your excellency probably formed this opinion without knowing the fact that the persons whose surrender is solicited from the Mexican authorities are themselves Mexicans.

Your excellency will please to note, in the same documents and papers, which I now return, according to request, that this circumstance is therein expressed with at least as high a grade of credibility as the statement of the crimes committed and the attending circumstances thereof.

I expect from your excellency's well-known high sense of justice that this single circumstance will suffice to excuse the Mexican government from ordering the surrender of the supposed criminals, as demanded by the governor of Arizona Territory from the governor of the State of Sonora, since its action in the case should be in strict conformity with the stipulations of the treaty of extradition between the United States of Mexico and the United States of America, now in force, and with the practice observed by the Government of the latter toward the Mexican government in similar cases.

SIR: I herewith enclose a copy and translation (A and B) of a communication from Mr. Fernandez, the chief of the commission of engineers appointed by the Mexican government to co-operate with the United States surveying expedition on the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, which was addressed to the minister of public works.

Your obedient servant,

THOMAS H. NELSON.

B.

Mr. M. Fernandez to minister of public works.

COMMISSION FOR THE EXPLORATION OF THE ISTHMUS OF TEHUANTEPEC:

As I had the honor to state at the time to your ministry, I awaited the return of Mr. Fuertes, the chief engineer of the American commission to Chivela, to begin our surveying operations, in accordance with the instructions given me at my departure from the city of Mexico.

On the arrival of Mr. Fuertes, I learned from him that the river Ostnta is not available as a canal-feeder, and that it was necessary to make a survey of the Coatzacoalco River, as the only stream remaining for that purpose.

After surmounting various obstacles which had prevented Mr. Fuertes from making that journey, on account of the lack of co-operation on the part of the authorities and inhabitants of the village called Santa Maria Chimalupa, the members of the Mexican commission, along with the American engineers, set out from Chivela for that village. Other difficulties delayed our departure from that place until the 19th of February, when we again started, and with great difficulty reached, on horseback, the river Blanco, a tributary of the river Coatzacoalco, and from this point we followed up the left bank on foot, since the nature of the ground does not admit of any other mode of traveling.

In some portions of its upper course the Coatzacoalco runs between high banks, forming rapid and powerful currents; but as we ascended we could see that its bed became gradually wider and the falls of less height, but without any great diminution of the volume of water, as we found no other important tributary above the river Blanco, and it would seem that the river continues thus, with little variation, throughout most of its upper course.

Two measurements of the volume of water, made at 8 and 12 kilometers above the confluence of the river Blanco, exhibited 30 cubic meters per second, a quantity which has been estimated sufficient to feed the canal.

We were then on the left bank of the river, about 34 kilometers to the east of Santa Maria, and the barometer showed that the water level was nearly the same as that of Chivela, when the Indians of Santa Maria Chimalupa refused to go any further, and returned to their village, obliging us to go back from lack of provisions. We had obtained, however, one important result, namely, to have ascertained that the river Coatzacoalcos can supply enough water, and at a sufficient height to feed the canal, since it is confidently believed that a little further up the river a level higher than the plain of Tarifa will be reached without any considerable diminution of the volume of water.

In order to ascertain the exact figures and the means of conducting the water in the most economical and convenient manner, Mr. Fuertes has started again for the river, with a part of the American commission, to perform the necessary operations. Meanwhile I shall proceed with the commission under my charge to explore the rivers Chicapa and Ostuto, which we have not yet surveyed, and we shall then return to the Contzacoalcos.

I have also the honor to inform you that the exploration of the southern lagoons has been commenced by the officers of the American war-steamer sent for that purpose.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

SIR: I transmit a copy of a letter, and of the accompanying papers, addressed to this Department by Albert Champion, from Brownsville, Texas, complaining of a robbery of nine horses belonging to him, by armed persons from the Mexican side of the Rio Grande. Mr. Champion intimates that some of the stolen horses had been seen on the estate of the Mexican General Cortina, now in command at Matamoras, and some of the testimony tends to show that the robbers were soldiers under him. The frequency of acts of this kind and the virtual impunity of the offenders demand some more efficient check than any which the treaties between the United States and Mexico seem to afford. You will consequently make an earnest representation upon the subject to the government of that republic. You will state that, as it is obviously for the interest of both countries that the government of each should do whatever may be in its power toward restraining and discouraging such lawless proceedings, it is hoped that the Mexican government may take efficient steps for that purpose. If, however, that government should unfortunately be powerless in the matter, or should be backward in exercising such authority as it may have, it may be difficult to prevent retaliation by raids of armed parties from Texas into Mexico, which could not fail to peril the peaceful relations on the border.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Mexico, April 12, 1871. (Received May 22.)

SIR: In fulfillment of the promise contained in my dispatch No. 365, of March 23, I now proceed to furnish some data concerning the railroad now in process of construction between this city and the port of Vera Cruz. I went carefully over the completed as well as much of the unfinished work on this line, accompanied by several officers of the railway company, who supplied me with every facility for thorough observation.

The total length of this railway, when completed, will be two hundred and sixty-one miles. A branch, thirty miles long, now connects the main line with the city of Puebla; it leaves the main line at the station of Apizaco, eighty-six and a half miles from the city of Mexico. In 1864 a contract was entered into for the construction of this line, a small portion of it being then in operation for traffic, though in a very imperfect condition. The contract by an English company (Smith, Knight & Co.) included the purchase of the open sections, and the putting them into a thoroughly satisfactory condition. In October, 1864, the engineers of the company, Colonel Talcott and Mr. Samuel, were both in Mexico, and the contractors' agent commenced work, and carried it on vigorously, until the month of May, 1866, when the works were suspended in consequence of the non-payment of the subvention by the so-called government of the empire.

In November, 1866, Colonel Talcott resigned, and Mr. Alister Fraser was appointed to act as resident engineer in Mexico. A new arrangement was entered into, by which the works were to be carried out by Mr. George B. Crawley as contractor, in place of Smith, Knight & Co. After a series of interruptions and difficulties, during the siege of Mexico, a new commencement was made, and the company's resident engineer, Mr. Fraser, became engineer for the contractor. Mr. Samuel was made consulting engineer to the board in London, and Mr. William Cross Buchanan was appointed the company's chief engineer, in direct charge of all the works. Unfortunately, Mr. Fraser was shortly taken ill, and was obliged to go home. As soon as Mr. Crawley, the contractor, became aware of this, he appointed Mr. Thomas Braniff as his agent in Mexico, and the works have been steadily pushed on for the last two years in a very satisfactory manner. Mr. Braniff is a citizen of the United States, a man of great energy and administrative ability, and has achieved an honorable reputation in connection with the construction of railways in the republic of Chili. The branch to Puebla was finished and opened to the public on the 16th day of September, 1869, and the works in the Tierra Caliente were started afresh on a new survey in November, 1869, and on the 1st of January of the present year some seven and a half miles of the most difficult work on the line were completed and opened to the public.

Several large works have been successfully erected on the lower section just opened; and the line has been completed from Vera Cruz inland for a distance of fifty-five miles.

Mr. Braniff has the work well in hand, and expects to have the line finished by July as far as a place called Fortin, about seventy miles from Vera Cruz. Several bridges have been erected of iron and stone, three of them over 100 feet in height, and in spans of from 140 to 66 feet. At the Fortin mentioned above a very large barranca or gully occurs. Various designs were submitted for a bridge over this, and the last one, designed by Mr. William Cross Buchanan, was a suspension-bridge of 900 feet span, to be principally of steel. These designs were, however, all abandoned, and a new line was surveyed which will pass down on one side of the barranca, cross the Metlac River on a comparatively small bridge, and, rising on the opposite side, join the original line at a convenient point. This line will cost much less, and be a solid road throughout, with gradients of 1 in 40, or $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and 1 in 33, or 3 per cent., and no curve less than 350 feet radius. A very great saving to the company will be effected by this new line, and at least twelve months will be gained in time.

The total distance at present open to the public (including the branch) is one hundred and sixty-three miles, leaving one hundred and twenty eight miles to complete. A very large portion of these one hundred and twenty-eight miles is partially completed already. In one portion, a distance of over seventy miles, 90 per cent. is finished of the earth-works; and over the portion called the Cumbres of Maltrata, where there are curves of 350 feet radius, and a continuous grade for twenty-two miles of 4 per cent., or one in twenty-five, over 60 per cent. of the earth-works are finished.

Two years' steady work would complete the whole line, and when opened to the public will, in my opinion, be one of the best paying lines in the world. There could be no competition, and every pound of traffic that now is carried over the roads on mules or in wagons would go by rail. To the traveling public diligence journeys would become a dream of the past, and Mexico would advance, as all nations do where railways exist.

The management of this railway is in the hands of a board of directors in London, and in Mexico there is a local board composed of five directors. The opened sections are managed by a traffic manager appointed by the company.

When completed, the Mexican Railway will be, in an engineering point of view, one of the exceptional railways of the world, and in a commercial view I believe it will be a most perfect success. From the present returns of traffic it is impossible to calculate what the future returns may be. Railways in most countries have created a traffic for themselves, and Mexico will not be behind in this respect. Wars and pronunciamientos will gradually cease, and peace and prosperity will follow in the track of the locomotive.

The obliging superintendent of traffic, Mr. W. H. Mills, has furnished me the following:

Memorandum of the receipts and expenditures on the two opened sections of the line:

MEXICO AND PUEBLA SECTION.

Length, 115½ miles.

Total receipts for the six months ending December 31, 1870.....	$332,233 95½
Total working expenses for the six months ending December 31, 1870 ...	166,989 22½
Balance.....	165,244 72½
Total receipts for the two months, January and February, 1871.....	$107,473 29½
Total working expenses.....	53,089 48½
Balance.....	54,383 81½

VERA CRUZ SECTION.

Length, 47½ miles.

Total receipts for the six months ending December 31, 1871.....	$96,937 25½
Total working expenses.....	92,147 28½
Balance.....	4,789 96½
Total receipts for the two months, January and February, 1871.....	$46,902 26½
Total working expenses.....	35,277 86½
Balance.....	11,624 39½

The amount of money that is annually paid to this company by the federal government of Mexico amounts to about $1,000,000, viz, $500,000 as subvention, and 15 per cent. of the importation duties on all the custom-houses.

Upon my return to the capital I addressed a brief note to the department for foreign affairs, announcing my arrival, and returning thanks for official courtesies, (A,) to which Mr. Aspiroz replied on the 28th ultimo, (B.)

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Mexico, March 28, 1871.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your excellency's polite note of yesterday, in which you inform me of your return to this capital from Vera Cruz.

The supreme government is pleased to learn that your excellency made your journey without accident, as well because it takes an interest in your excellency's personal prosperity as because your presence near the government of Mexico is a valued guarantee of the friendship and cordial relations which ought to bind the Mexican republic to that of the United States of America.

With this occasion I have the honor to reiterate the high and distinguished consideration with which I am your excellency's very obedient servant,

MANUEL ASPIROZ.

No. 385.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Mexico, April 29, 1871. (Received May 12.)

SIR: Pursuant to the letter and the spirit of the instructions contained in your dispatch No. 136, and consequently bearing in mind the delicacy of the request, in the present critical aspect of Mexican politics, I addressed, on the 12th instant, an unofficial note to Mr. Aspiroz, (A,) asking the opinion of the Mexican government as to the feasibility of its submitting to the national congress at this time the question of authorizing the passage of our troops into Mexican territory in pursuit of hostile Indians.

Upon the 20th instant Mr. Aspiroz replied that the executive had taken the subject into consideration, and had arrived at the conclusion that the present time would not be a favorable occasion for submitting such a proposition with any reasonable chance of success. A copy and translation of this note is herewith annexed, (B and C.)

On the same date Mr. Aspiroz addressed me another note containing the tragical particulars of the murder, on the 4th ultimo, of Mr. Charles Keerl and party by savage Indians in the State of Chihuahua, (D and E,) and inclosing a report upon the same subject from the governor of that State to the minister of war, (F and G.) Mr. Aspiroz deploras, and apparently with good reason, that a combined movement of American and Mexican troops had not taken place in time to prevent this invasion.

On the 25th instant I replied to Mr. Aspiroz, (H,) acknowledging receipt of his dispatches, and promising to transmit them with their inclosures to my Government.

Your obedient servant,

THOMAS H. NELSON.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Mexico, April 12, 1871.

MY DEAR SIR: Referring to my note of January 4, and to the reply of the Mexican department of foreign affairs, dated January 7, 1871, in which your department informs me that "if, on the reassembling of Congress on the 1st of April, it should still be deemed desirable by the Government of the United States that permission should be granted by the Mexican congress for the troops of the United States to cross the Mexican frontier in pursuit of hostile Indians, the President will submit the matter to Congress," I have to state that my Government would still desire such permission if it can be obtained without exciting sensibilities which it has no disposition to wound. I would therefore respectfully ask the opinion of the Mexican government as to the feasibility of referring the matter to the Mexican congress during the present session, with the hope of a speedy and favorable decision by that body.

Very truly and faithfully yours,

THOMAS H. NELSON.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Mexico, April 20, 1871.

SIR: In reply to your excellency's note dated the 12th instant, in allusion to that of this department of the 7th of January last, concerning the permission solicited by the Government of the United States of America for the passage of its troops into Mexican territory in pursuit of the savage Indians, I have the honor to state to your excellency that this government has lately taken into consideration the question whether it would be expedient to submit this subject to Congress, in accordance with the desire of the Government of the United States, as manifested by your excellency in your said note, and has arrived at the conclusion that the present would not be the most fitting occasion to solicit such permission from Congress with any well-founded hope of obtaining a prompt and favorable decision.

The Mexican government duly appreciates the delicacy with which that of the United States has again broached this subject, giving the assurance, through the worthy medium of your excellency, that it would wish to obtain the said permission, if it could be done without exciting susceptibilities which it has no desire to wound; and it (the Mexican government) expected no less, knowing as it does the sincere friendship that happily binds together the two governments.

The Mexican government has the satisfaction of having done what it could within the sphere of its facilities, for the reciprocal defense and security of the United States of Mexico and the United States of America, upon that part of the divisory line that is most exposed to the aggressions of the savage Indians, by acceding to the desire of the Government of the United States of America, transmitted by your excellency in your note of the 4th of January last, for the combination of military operations between the forces of the State of Chihuahua and those of the sub-district of the presidio, in the State of Texas; although, for some unknown reason, the commander of Fort Davis had not yet been able to come to an understanding with the governor of Chihuahua up to the 18th of March last, as your excellency will please to observe in my note on that subject and its inclosures, which I have the honor to send you separately.

This government judges that when once an agreement shall have been effected for the combination of the operations of both forces, the pursuit of the Indians can be successfully undertaken, and the neighboring settlements of the two countries will be freed from the hostilities of the savages.

I am, very respectfully, your excellency's obedient servant,

MANUEL ASPIROZ.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Mexico, April 20, 1871.

SIR: I transmit to your excellency, with sentiments of profound regret, the inclosed copies of a communication from the war department, in which is inserted another from the governor of Chihuahua, from which it appears that a party of savage Indians attacked and murdered Mr. Charles Keerl, his wife and seven traveling companions, only one of whom was saved from death, upon the Casas Grandes road, in the canton of Galeana, State of Chihuahua; and of an inventory of the effects belonging to the murdered party, that were recovered by means of the local authorities.

Your excellency may note that it was, perhaps, a lack of combination between the forces of the State of Chihuahua and those of Fort Davis that caused the invasion of the said party of Indians and the murder of Mr. Keerl and his companions. The governor of Chihuahua says that at the date of his communication—the 18th of March last—more than a month had elapsed since he had transmitted to the commander of Fort Davis the order from the Mexican government concerning the proposed combination of the movements of both forces, and that a formal campaign was about to be commenced against the Indians, who had invaded several portions of the State.

As to the effects mentioned in the said inventory, they will remain in deposit with the authorities who recovered them, and orders have already been sent directing that the said authorities hold them at the disposal of the person or persons who may lay claim to them, on the exhibition of the proper proofs.

The government of Chihuahua has also been urged, in case it has succeeded in coming to an understanding with the commander of Fort Davis, to proceed, in conformity with the order from the war department dated the 10th of January last, but in the contrary event, to undertake by itself the military operations necessary for the security and defense of the frontier, as far as it may be able.

I am, very respectfully, &c., &c., &c.,

MANUEL ASPIROZ.

MINISTRY OF WAR STAFF DEPARTMENT: THIRD TABLE.

In a communication dated the 18th ultimo, the citizen governor of the State of Chihuahua states to this ministry as follows:

"In a note of the 8th instant the citizen political chief of the canton Galeana makes to the secretary of the government this following statement:

"On the 4th instant, at about 4 p. m., the citizen Romaldo Piña reported to me that, being in the house of Don Tiburcio Pouce, distant about a league and a quarter toward the north from this place, there arrived an American wounded in three places by arrows, mounted upon a grayish horse which also had two wounds, and informed them that on the Casas Grandes road, about thirty-five Indians had attacked the foreigner Charles Keerl, and that it might well happen that before aid could arrive the Indians would have massacred the whole party. I immediately collected a party of thirty-three mounted men and sent them in several guerrilla bands to see if they could aid the persons attacked; but this was impossible, since they had all been killed at the hour of the attack, between 9 and 10 a. m. This event took place at the Chocolate Pass, seven leagues from this settlement. The said party remained there until the next day, collecting the corpses, and picking up the objects mentioned in the inclosed inventory. The caravan belonging to the said foreigner was composed of seven Americans besides his wife, of whom only two escaped. One of these got away on horseback with an arrow-wound in the belly, and at about a league and a half dismounted and remained there two hours; the other succeeded in hiding himself until the Indians went away, when he rejoined his companion, and taking his horse came on to give notice of the facts, leaving his companion where he was. The commander of the party when he found the wounded man had him brought to me by two men, and I took measures for his cure, but the remedies were unavailing. He died the next day, so that of all the party only one survived, and neither of the two who escaped alive from the massacre saved any fire-arms, all having fallen into the hands of the enemy, for which reason it is thought that the Indians led them into an ambush for the purpose of robbing them."

"And I have the honor to transcribe to you the foregoing, along with a copy of the said inventory, for your own information and that of the citizen president of the republic, to whom you will please say that, inasmuch as his supreme order concerning a combination, between the movements of the State forces and those of the United States of America for the pursuit of the Indians, was communicated more than a month since, to the commander of Fort Davis, only a few brief and partial expeditions had been prepared; but as the incursions of those enemies had become very frequent of late in the canton of Galeana, it has become necessary to organize as soon as possible a formal campaign against them to drive them from the places they have invaded. This will be done very soon with the aid of the forces destined for that purpose."

And I transcribe the above to you for your information, inclosing a copy of the document above cited, for the purposes that you may find convenient.

Independence and Liberty!

MEXICO.

H.

Mr. Nelson to Mr. Aspiroz.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Mexico, April 25, 1871.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note, dated the 20th instant, inclosing copies of communications from the war department of Mexico and from the governor of the State of Chihuahua, in regard to the murder of Mr. Charles Keerl, his wife, and seven other persons in the canton of Galeana, State of Chihuahua, by savage Indians, and also inclosing an inventory of the effects belonging to the murdered party that were recovered by means of the local authorities.

The want of co-operation between the forces of Chihuahua and those at Fort Davis, that resulted in the invasion by these Indians and the murder of Mr. Keerl and his party, is a subject of profound regret, and it is to be hoped that the commanders of the respective forces will come to a better understanding, so that by their joint efforts the savages may be driven from the frontier, and thus give protection to life and property. To that end I will transmit copies of these several communications to the Department of State at Washington.

In this connection I have also the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 20th instant, in reply to mine of the 12th, concerning the permission solicited by my Government for the passage of troops into Mexican territory in pursuit of the savage Indians, a copy of which I will also transmit to the Department of State.

I remain, with great respect, &c., &c., &c.,

No. 383.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Mexico, April 29, 1871. (Received May 12.)

SIR: The Protestant movement in Mexico has for the past year been making considerable progress, chiefly owing to the efforts of the American clergyman, Rev. H. Chauncey Riley, a letter from whom upon this subject was forwarded by me, forming an inclosure to my No. 38, of August 9, 1869. There are now about fifty congregations or assemblies of Mexican Protestants in this city and vicinity, and an equal or greater number scattered throughout the country. Most of these assemblies still meet in private houses, though in some small places of the interior they form a numerical majority and have therefore acquired possession of the parish churches. In this city, through the efforts and personal liberality of Mr. Riley, the Protestants have acquired two fine churches of those which were secularized and sold by the government some years since; one of these is the former convent of San Francisco, the most magnificent as well as the first one erected in Mexico. It is now being repaired for its new use. The other is the commodious church of San José de Gracia, which, having been thoroughly repaired, was dedicated to the Protestant service on Sunday the 23d instant, in the presence of an immense multitude. Two or three Catholic priests of some prominence have, within the past two or three months, joined the Protestant communion, and two them have ventured upon the decisive step of matrimony. One of the recent converts, Father Manuel Auguas, formerly an eloquent preacher of the Dominican order, has become the pastor of the new church. This event has caused a vigorous polemic in the newspapers of this city; the two papers considered especially Catholic have been filled with attacks upon the new religious movement, while most of the other papers have exhibited a commendable spirit of tolerance or even of good will toward the Protestants. I inclose an interesting article upon this subject from the Two Republics of to-day, translated from the Federalista, and written by M. Ignacio M. Altamirano, who is considered as the chief of the Mexican literary writers of the present day.

Your obedient servant,

THOMAS H. NELSON.

[Inclosure.]

A PROTESTANT CHURCH.

Yesterday a Protestant temple was dedicated in the locality which was formerly the church of San José de Gracia, and which was adorned with that Christian simplicity that characterizes the temples of the reformed religion, in which the second commandment of the decalogue is rigorously observed, i. e., that neither images nor idols are admitted.

The audience was immense, and completely filled the nave of the church throughout the day. We learn that 1,500 seats were placed, but they were not enough, and very many of the believers remained standing.

We were present for the purpose of observing the scene, as we do not profess the Protestant form of religion, and we were able to note:

1st. That the throng was made up of all classes, sexes, and ages—ladies, gentlemen, artisans, and numerous Indians; all were mingled in one sentiment of real fraternity, according to the spirit of the gospel, and all read from their prayer-books and participated in singing their hymns.

2d. That although the audience was so numerous, there was manifest a spirit of devotion such as we have never seen hitherto in any of the Roman churches of this city or country, inasmuch as we are accustomed to regard them rather as places of pleasure, of amusement, and of flirtation, than as houses of prayer.

3d. That the democratic sentiment is better developed by Protestantism than by Roman Catholicism, on account of its form of worship and the suppression of that species of fetishism imposed by the sacerdotal hierarchy among the Romans; since, though the Lutherans, for example, have bishops, they scarcely differ from presbyters, and do not present themselves in public with such a pompous staff of chaplains, familiars, secretaries, masters of ceremonies, cross-bearers mounted on mules, vergers, acolytes, and beadles, as causes such bishops to be considered almost as a fourth person of the Most Holy Trinity.

Among the Protestants this is not the case; the bishop is scarcely to be distinguished except by the greater amount of labor that he performs.

All day worship was kept up in San José de Gracia, the Presbyterian Aguas preaching, and another, who is the pastor of the new church, and in the afternoon two children were baptized.

Perhaps we were the only one who attended through mere curiosity, as all the others showed, by the handling of their prayer-books, that they were old Protestants.

Assuredly Protestantism is making rapid progress in Mexico, which forces us to congratulate the Voz de Mexico, since they constitute its triumph.

No. 398.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Mexico, May 22, 1871. (Received June 6.)

SIR: On the 11th instant, the Mexican government submitted to congress an "initiative" or draught of a proposed law, regulating the whole subject of foreign citizenship in Mexico, accompanied by a message recommending the measure to the prompt consideration of that body. With these documents was published in the Diario Oficial a circular addressed on the same date, by the acting secretary of foreign affairs, to the heads of the ministries, inserting and commenting upon a former circular, dated the 31st of January last, by which it was made known that no matter of business coming before any ministry, in which any foreigner may be directly or indirectly concerned, is to be decided without submitting copies of the documents in the respective cases to the department of foreign affairs, and soliciting therefrom information as to the antecedents of the said foreigner.

The project of law specifies a large number of cases in which the foreign resident is to be considered a Mexican citizen unless he shall, in each case, enter a new protest, before the competent authority, that he desires to preserve his original citizenship; and, what is still more singular, cases are indicated in which Mexican citizenship becomes a sort of arbitrary penalty, which may be imposed by the government upon a foreigner, in lieu of expulsion from the country, after trial, conviction, and punishment for fraud.

This project has naturally created great comment and some indignation among foreigners; but there is not the slightest probability of any such law being now passed by Congress.

I inclose copies and translations of the above-mentioned circular, (A and B;) of the message, (C and D;) and of the project of law, (E and F,) the latter in a printed slip from The Two Republics of the 20th instant.

Yours, &c.,

THOMAS H. NELSON.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS, CHANCERY SECTION.

Under date of the 31st of January last this department wrote to the department under your worthy charge, as follows:

"The department of foreign affairs needs to know all the subjects pending before the other departments in which foreigners are directly or indirectly concerned or interested even though they may not present themselves as such; and, by reason of its own attributes, possesses information and antecedents concerning foreigners which it is indispensable, or at least useful, to take into consideration in treating of such subjects.

"Therefore the citizen president of the republic has ordered that, for the final decision of every subject pending before any department, in which any foreigner may be directly or indirectly concerned or interested, information be previously called for from this department, supplying at the same time all the data necessary for the understanding of the said subject.

"All the executive departments may thus obtain the antecedents which they ought to consult for their greater precaution and judgment in the decision of the subjects coming within their own attributes which may be presented and which have any relation with the rights of foreigners or in any way affect them.

"Which I have the honor to communicate to you for the said purpose."

As the spirit of this order was not generally understood, probably on account of some obscurity in its terms, I now state that its object is, that there may be sent to this department the originals or copies of all petitions and documents upon matters which foreigners are in any way interested, before making any decision thereupon, in order that the department of foreign affairs may derive from such documents the data which may be useful, immediately or in the future, for the better decision of affairs coming within its own jurisdiction, in which the same foreigners may also be interested, and in order that the other departments may also render useful the information and data which that of foreign affairs will furnish them in its turn.

I have the honor to communicate this to you for your information and for the reasons mentioned, requesting you to order that the preceding decree be strictly and punctually obeyed in your ministry.

Independence and liberty! Mexico, May 11, 1871.

MESSAGE TO CONGRESS UPON CITIZENSHIP.

The peace and prosperity of a nation depend, in great measure, upon a prudent legislation that may define and regulate the rights and obligations of foreigners, and respecting the general principles which constitute the common law of civilized nations, and consulting the well-considered interest of this country itself.

Hitherto we have been destitute of a complete and consistent legislation under the above conditions, and from this fact there have certainly been derived many abuses of the quality of foreign citizenship; the inferiority which, in many cases, the position of native practically has, as toward that of foreigner; the inefficacy of the laws intended to promote colonization and foreign commerce for the benefit of the republic; and frequent disagreements with friendly governments respecting the methods which they are wont to adopt, and in the just decision of certain questions brought forward by foreigners.

The complete remedy for these inconveniences ought to be consigned in the international treaties which the republic may celebrate, and especially in the laws to which, by virtue of such treaties, foreigners should become subject from their entrance into Mexican territory.

It would seem that the first object to be thus obtained would be a sobriety in the declarations made in such treaties, limiting them to what is strictly required by the general and constant practice observed as just and safe by civilized nations, in order not to limit the sphere of the legislative power of the republic in the definition of the rights of foreigners; in this way the republic will always remain at liberty to provide for its own interests according to circumstances. Fortunately the existing treaties with friendly nations do not in any manner limit the right of this republic to establish, in all the extension which its convenience may require, the rules to which those foreigners are to be subject who come to the country under the protection of treaties and the national laws. But the task of forming a complete code of law respecting foreigners is difficult, requiring a length of time to finish, and an experience, perhaps longer than that hitherto acquired in the midst of difficulties and subversions of order, which have prevented the utilization of the results of several partial experiments of short duration.

It is, nevertheless, indispensable to begin the work immediately, by remedying the most noticeable inconveniences, and to this end the government now presents to the congress of the union a draught of a law, which it is hoped will, if passed, produce speedy and desirable results.

In it the means of naturalization are facilitated and extended; it is prescribed as an indispensable condition for the enjoyment of certain benefits hitherto common to natives and foreigners, but which ought to be reserved for Mexican citizens; the conditions upon which the rights of foreign citizenship may be preserved are laid down; these rights are accurately defined; the exchange of or traffic in nationalities is rendered difficult, if not entirely extirpated; and for possible future cases of such abuses, there are established penalties adequate to the necessity that such abuses should not be multiplied through the impunity which they have hitherto enjoyed. Care has been taken, throughout the draught, to conciliate what may now be called the assured principles of international law, and the stipulations of the international treaties now in force in the republic, with our national legislation, and with some new rules, in every respect that has seemed important for the interest of the country. The government does not pretend to submit to congress a perfect law, adequate to all emergencies; but it believes that if congress should adopt the draught proposed, and should make it a law, with the modifications that its wisdom and patriotism may deem just and convenient, the republic would advance much in the arrangement of its legislation upon foreign citizenship. I request you to lay the inclosed draught before congress, making known the urgent recommendation of the government that the subject be immediately considered, in order that the law be passed, if thought proper, before the termination of the present period of ordinary sessions.

Independence and liberty! Mexico, May 11, 1871.

Chief Clerk.

PROJECT OF LAW.

ARTICLE 1. Foreigners are naturalized in the country, and consequently acquire all the rights and obligations of Mexican citizens—

I. By obtaining naturalization papers issued by the federal government.

II. By marrying a Mexican woman without stating a determination to preserve the foreign nationality.

III. By the birth of their children within Mexican territory without making known the determination expressed in the preceding section.

IV. By becoming of age while residing in Mexican territory, without having made known within the precise term of three months from the date of such emancipation the same determination previously referred to.

V. By acquiring real estate within the republic without making known the same determination.

VI. By performing acts belonging only to Mexican citizens; unless the government, in view of the circumstances of the case, should refuse to concede them Mexican citizenship.

VII. By accepting any employment or post of an official character from the federation, or from any state or municipality.

VIII. By exercising any profession, employment, or industry that may be prohibited to foreigners.

IX. By acquiring a Mexican domicile.

ARTICLE 2. Foreigners, in order to acquire real estate situated within Mexican territory, must reside in Mexico, and even if they should preserve their foreign citizenship by making the declaration mentioned in section V of the preceding article, they shall be considered as Mexicans in all that relates to such real estate, and shall be subject to the provisions of the law of February 1, 1856, of those of article 8 of the law of March 11, 1842, with its interpretation of the 3d of October of the same year, and of those of other laws in force.

Foreigners who may acquire shares or privileges to be improved within Mexican soil shall be subject to the provisions of this article, with the single exception of the obligation to reside within Mexican territory.

ARTICLE 3. Every foreigner who shall celebrate a contract with the federal government, with that of any state or municipality, or with any person authorized by such government or municipality to celebrate it in its name, or who shall receive, even in a private capacity, any commission from any of the above-mentioned authorities, shall be considered as a Mexican citizen, and in no case can allege the rights of a foreigner in respect to such contract or commission.

ARTICLE 4. Transient visitors and residents, who shall not have been naturalized in accordance with the first article of this law, shall be considered as Mexican citizens, unless they prove their rights of foreign citizenship by a certificate from the book of registry of foreigners, provided for by the law of March 16, 1861, and of December 6, 1856.

ARTICLE 5. The rights which foreigners cannot enjoy without having a certificate of registry are the following:

I. Exemption from obligatory personal service in political, civil, municipal, and judicial administration, and also in the army, the navy, and in the militia of national guard of the federation or the states; in which service not included that of police, for the security and defense of settlements menaced by malefactors who have not the character of public enemies in civil or foreign war in default of the public force for security, and only for the time that the urgent necessity for defense may subsist, in the judgment of the chief local authority.

II. Exemption from every impost having for object the compensation for the obligatory personal service from which foreigners are exempt.

III. The other privileges contained in the treaties in force between Mexico and foreign nations.

IV. The right of recourse to the diplomatic channel for presenting claims against the federal government in case of denial of justice or of unjustifiable delay in its administration, after having sedulously exhausted all other legal resource.

ARTICLE 6. To obtain a certificate of registry, foreigners shall be called to prove either that they are natives of and still preserve the nationality of the country to which they claim to belong, by a certificate of some diplomatic or consular agent of that country, or of the Mexican republic, and in no other manner; or that they have been naturalized in the foreign country whose citizenship they claim, in which case they must present, as an indispensable proof, their naturalization papers, accompanied by their written protest that they desire to preserve said nationality.

ARTICLE 7. Every foreigner who shall solicit naturalization papers shall prove that he follows an honest and lucrative occupation, and that he resides within Mexican territory.

ARTICLE 8. National vessels, without any distinction, are considered parts of Mexican territory.

ARTICLE 9. The statement of the desire to preserve a foreign nationality in the case alluded to in sections II, III, IV, and V, of article 1, shall be made by extracting or presenting the certificates of registry, in accordance with article 3 of this law; and moreover, by having it recorded in the civil register or instrument. If in these documents it shall not appear that note has been made of the certificate of registry, and if the determination of the interested party to preserve the rights of foreign citizenship be not stated therein, those rights shall be held to be renounced.

ARTICLE 10. Every Mexican citizen or naturalized foreigner who shall fraudulently allege rights of foreign citizenship, shall be tried for fraud according to the laws.

ARTICLE 11. Every foreigner who shall fraudulently allege rights exclusively belonging to Mexican citizens, or to the citizens of another nation, shall be, according to the choice of the government, in consideration of the circumstances of the case, expelled from the national territory as a pernicious foreigner, or be brought before the competent tribunal to be tried for fraud and its consequences. In case of his being tried, the right of the government to expel him from the country as pernicious shall remain intact, even after the execution of the sentence, or to consider him naturalized, if the case should be that mentioned in section VII of article 1, if it shall think proper so to do.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Mexico, June 2, 1871. (Received June 23.) *

SIR: I herewith transmit a copy of a communication from William Schuchardt, esq., our commercial agent at Piedras Negras, addressed to B. J. Gautier, esq., our vice-consul at Matamoras, in response to certain inquiries which I directed to the latter, concerning Indian depredations on the northern frontier.

Yours, &c.,

THOMAS H. NELSON.

*Mr. Schuchardt to Mr. Gautier.*UNITED STATES COMMERCIAL AGENCY, Piedras Negras, Mexico, May 6, 1871.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, dated March 23, 1871, asking for information in regard to depredations on this frontier, committed by Indians from Mexico, and in reply I have to state as follows:

A great many of these depredations on the Texas frontier, there is no doubt, are committed by Kickapoo, Lipan, and Mescalero Indians, living off a short distance from the Rio Grande, and, so to speak, under the protection of the Mexican authorities, they sanctioning the sale of stolen animals by these Indians, and allowing the citizens to trade with and supply the murdering and marauding savages with ammunition and other things they need for making new raids into the settlements of a friendly country. Some time in December last a band of Mescaleros crossed the Rio Grande, at some place above here, into Texas; stole down the country for about thirty-five miles, where they at once commenced their depredations, killing a Mr. Adams, together with two vaqueros; stole all the horses in the vicinity; from there went up the country, attacked a Mexican cart train on the main road from Eagle Pass to San Antonio, took everything belonging to the train, and captured a little boy who had hidden himself near the said train. Thence they went to Mr. Spear's rancho, situated on the San Antonio road, crossing the Turkey Creek, where they took, in bright daylight, out of Mr. Spear's pen, all the horses they could find. The Indians wearing hats and other apparel of civilized people, the inhabitants of the rancho for some time took them for cattle-drivers, and when they became aware of their mistake had hardly time enough to escape into the bushes which surround the rancho.

The Kickapoo Indians, who, since the year 1863 or 1864, live near Santa Rosa, Mexico, about one hundred miles from here, also make their raids into Texas, leaving the ranchos of Western Texas for the distance of one hundred and twenty miles from the Rio Grande bare of good horses. Several times the owners have gone to Santa Rosa to claim their property, knowing it to be there and already sold to citizens of that place, and in some instances they succeeded in obtaining their property, but in others, where the horses or mules were found in the possession of influential men of the village, the delivery of them was refused.

The Mexican accomplices of these Kickapoos seeing that stolen horses were followed up to Santa Rosa by the owners, they thought that place no longer safe, and accordingly take the animals traded from the Indians further into the interior towns, where they have a ready market for any quantity of stolen property and any number of stolen stock.

I am informed that in Saltillo, Parras, and Alamo de Parras there is an immense number of valuable American horses obtained through the raids into Texas by the Kickapoos, the Indians knowing very well that, once across the Rio Grande into Mexican territory, they are out of the reach of their pursuers, and so always escape punishment.

In many instances the Indians stepped out of the river on the Mexican side when their pursuers arrived at the bank of the river on the Texas side, being mocked at by the Indians, safe in a territory where they could not be followed. Among the men here, all sympathizing with these Indians and their acts against the people of Texas, there is one who credited to a Lipan some $20 worth of ammunition and other things, to be paid to him by the Indian with the spoils of the raid; the Indian was then to make with others into Texas, and, sure enough, after some time, the man was paid by the Indian with a Spencer carbine belonging to the United States. The Indian related in a mocking way to a crowd of Mexicans, listening with great interest, how he had followed for some time a party of United States soldiers going up the country, and how he at last succeeded in cutting off one soldier, who had strayed a short distance from the command, and how this man begged him to spare his life, offering up arms, horse, and all that he had, but how he, however, killed him and took everything from him; the Mexicans listening to the Lipan's story all through as if it had been a very funny trick.

Here can be seen the unfriendly feelings of the Mexicans toward their American neighbors, manifesting joy at the misfortunes caused by raids of a cruel savage enemy from Mexico. In conclusion, I inclose a slip cut out of the San Antonio Herald; the contents only confirm my statements.

Besides the raids of the Indians at peace in Mexico, are those of the Mexicans, who are doing a wholesale cattle-stealing in Texas, and after once reaching the Mexican side with their plunder, offer openly and undisturbed, at very low prices, the stolen cattle, and there is no authority who interferes in this traffic, except when the owners of the stolen property follow the thieves over to Mexico; then the authorities are obliged to interfere, and after half of the stolen cattle is absorbed in costs of herding the same, &c., the cattle are given back to their owners; but there is always shown an indisposition on the part of the authorities to do justice to an honest foreigner against a thieving Mexican. I never heard yet that cattle-thieves were punished, even when detected, beyond a few days in prison, and they got out to commit the same crime again, but with more precaution.

It seems that the authorities consider the non-realization of profit and the loss of the stolen cattle sufficient punishment for these villains, as the crime was merely committed against a gringo, as they call the Americans, in the excess of their patriotic feelings.

A Mexican criminal is here considered as entitled to more consideration than an honest Texan, who is nearly driven to desperation through the continual suffering from Mexican outlaws, and they are excusable in some measure when they take justice into their own hands.

There is now a man in prison at this place for stealing cattle, who, only a few months ago, was surprised in the same crime fourteen leagues below this place, in the Presidio de Rio Grande, crossing stolen cattle over the river. He succeeded in escaping to this place and there never was any demand made for him. He had lived in Texas for the last five or six years and came here last year as a fugitive from justice, having killed a man near San Antonio, Texas; besides this murder, he was implicated either as principal or accessory in four or five others. Such men are running at large in all the frontier towns of Mexico, a small river being there safeguard against the laws they so often violate, and which they will continue to do, encouraged by having escaped all punishment heretofore.

Yours, &c.,

WILLIAM SCHUCHARDT,
United States Commercial Agent.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 26, 1871.

SIR: Your dispatch No. 409, of the 2d instant, relative to depredations of Indians from Mexico across the frontier of Texas, has been received. The frequency of those raids, the serious losses which they occasion, and the impunity of their perpetrators, merit grave consideration on the part of this Government. It is presumed that any remonstrances which may be addressed to the Mexican government upon the subject would have little or no effect. You may, however, say unofficially that it may become our duty at least to weigh the expediency of pursuing the hostile Indians into Mexico, without the consent of that government, if it shall not adopt measures toward checking the robberies referred to.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Mexico, July 20, 1871. (Received August 7.)

SIR: On the 18th of April last I addressed a note to the Mexican department of foreign affairs, (A,) complaining of the exaction of $200 as light-house dues from the Pacific Mail Company's steamer Sacramento, at the port of Mazatlan, whereas I am informed that such dues were abolished in 1860, and that they are not now collected either at Acapulco or Manzanillo, and requesting an investigation of the facts, in order that the said injustice may be remedied.

On the following day Mr. Aspiroz replied, (B and C,) informing me that he had requested the treasury department to make such investigation; and on the 4th instant, Mr. Mariscal communicated to me the results of it, (D and E.) From the documents annexed to his note, of which a translation is inclosed, (F,) it appears that such dues were really abolished in 1860, but re-established by the tariff law of 1868.

In reply, I addressed Mr. Mariscal a note, dated the 10th instant, (G,) promising to forward the documents of the case to Washington, and asking to be informed whether the said law discriminates between ports where there are and where there are not light-houses existing; and also whether there are any light-houses at the ports already named.

I am assured that there is but one light-house upon the Pacific coast of Mexico, and that that one belongs to the said steamship company.

Your obedient servant,

THOMAS H. NELSON.

*Mr. Nelson to Mr. Aspiroz.*LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Mexico, April 18, 1871.

SIR: The Pacific Mail Company's steamer Sacramento, having left San Francisco on the 4th of March last, touched at Mazatlan on the 10th of the same month, laden with passengers and merchandise, and was forced by the local authorities at that port to pay $200 as light-house fees. These dues, I have been informed, were abolished in 1860, and are not exacted either at Acapulco or Manzanillo; the port regulations of April 22, 1851, being again in force since January 30, 1860.

I respectfully request the department of foreign affairs to cause a proper investigation to be made, and if the facts and law are correctly stated, to require the said authorities at Mazatlan to make restitution of the said amount to the agent of the said line of steamers, and to prohibit similar illegal surprises in the future.

I have the honor to remain, with great respect, your obedient servant,

THOMAS H. NELSON.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Mexico, April 19, 1871.

SIR: I have received the note of yesterday, in which your excellency is pleased to state that the steamer Sacramento, belonging to the Pacific Mail Company, has been obliged at Mazatlan to pay $200 as light-house dues, while your excellency is informed that such dues were abolished in 1860.

In accordance with your excellency's request, I now address to the treasury department a copy of it, calling for the necessary data upon the two points embraced in the said note, in order to act with entire prudence in taking the necessary measures.

I am, very respectfully, your excellency's obedient servant,

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

Mexico, July 4, 1871.

SIR: In accordance with the promise made to your excellency under date of the 19th of April last, a report was requested from the treasury department as to the amount demanded from the steamer Sacramento, at Mazatlan, for the payment of $200 as light-house dues, whereas, according to information given your excellency, such dues were abolished in 1860.

To-day the reply of the treasury department has been received, and I have the honor to transmit a copy thereof to your excellency, and I hope there will soon be received in this ministry the reports of the custom-houses at Acapulco and Manzanillo, in order to communicate to your excellency the decision of the government upon this point.

With the highest consideration, I repeat that I am your excellency's very obedient servant,

IGNACIO MARISCAL

F.

Mr. Romero to Minister of Foreign Affairs.

[Translation.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, FIRST SECTION.

SIR: In order to meet the wishes of the department under your charge, as made known in the communication addressed me on the 19th of April last respecting the amount which the custom-house at Mazatlan may have had for collecting light-house dues from the steamer Sacramento, belonging to the Pacific Mail Company, which is the subject of the note from the minister of the United States sent me as an inclosure, it was necessary to call for a report from the first section of this department, which has been given in the following terms:

"The department of foreign affairs sends with the present communication a note from the minister of the United States of America in Mexico, stating that the steamer Sacramento, of the Pacific Mail Company, was obliged, at Mazatlan, to pay $200 light-house dues, and alleges that such dues were abolished in 1860, since which date the port regulations of April 22, 1851, have been in force, for which reason the said dues have not been collected either in Acapulco or in Manzanillo.

"The undersigned clerk would state that, in fact, the second article of the decree of January 30, 1860, excepted from the payment of light-house dues all vessels arriving at Mexican ports; but the tariff law of May 30, 1863, re-established the said light-house dues. The circular from the war department dated August 12, 1863, transmitted by the treasury department on the 25th of the same month, orders the observance without any change, of the provisions of the decree of January 30, 1860, in respect to the collection and disbursement of pilotage dues, without saying anything about light-house dues. The superior order of April 16, 1869, provides that the collection of light-house dues be made in conformity with the decree of September 26, 1856, in respect to coasting vessels, and puts in force the thirtieth article of the general customs regulations.

"The circular of this department dated May 12, 1869, makes the proper explanation concerning the real meaning of the circular from the war department, by which it appears that the light-house dues are to be paid, as having been re-established by the said tariff law.

"As to the statement made by the American minister that the said dues are not collected in Acapulco nor in Manzanillo, I would say that, inasmuch as by the order from this department dated the 17th of August last, in reply to various consultations made by the custom-houses at La Paz, Guaymas, and Mazatlan, and to the petition of Messrs. Melchers, agents of the North Pacific Steamship Transportation Company, it was ordered that light-house dues be collected once only on each trip of the said steamers, and at the first port entered by them, it is not improbable that these custom-houses have ceased to collect them on account of proof being offered of their having been previously paid elsewhere; and if this should not be the case, it would signify that the employes at the said ports have not obeyed the law."

And the president being satisfied with the preceding report, I transmit it to you for your guidance, adding that the custom-houses at Acapulco and Manzanillo have been interrogated as to whether, in fact, they have ceased to collect the said dues in all cases; and that the law of May 30, 1868, to which reference is made in the preceding report, says, in the first paragraph of article 1, which designates the various component parts of the tariff dues for that fiscal year, as follows:

"Tonnage, light-house, and pilotage dues, $150,000."

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Mexico, July 10, 1871.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's note of the 4th instant, in respect to the light-house dues paid by the steamer Sacramento at the port of Mazatlan, in which your excellency incloses a copy of a report upon this subject from the treasury department, to the effect that the said dues, though abolished in 1860, were re-established in the tariff law of May 30, 1868. Your excellency adds that the receipt of reports from the custom-houses at Acapulco and Manzanillo is awaited, in order that the government may arrive at a final decision of the case.

Thanking your excellency for the pains taken to obtain the necessary data, I would respectfully beg to be informed whether the tariff law of 1868 makes any discrimination between the ports where light-houses do or do not exist; and if such be the case, to be further informed whether any light-houses exist at the ports of La Paz, Guaymas, Mazatlan, Manzanillo, and Acapulco.

I embrace this opportunity to again assure your excellency of the very high consideration with which I have the honor to remain your excellency's obedient servant,
THOMAS H. NELSON.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, August 7, 1871.

SIR: I transmit a copy of a letter of the 1st instant, and of the accompanying papers, addressed to this Department by the Secretary of the Interior. They relate to an abortive attempt recently made by officers of that Department toward removing those of the Kickapoo tribe of Indians who dwell in Mexico to the abode of their brethren in this country. It seems that the attempt was defeated by the opposition of Mexican authorities. Mr. Delano requests that the consent of the Mexican government may be obtained to our entrance into the territory of that republic whenever it may be necessary to do so for the purpose indicated. A similar request was some time since made to the War Department, and you were instructed to make application to the Mexican government accordingly. This Department understands that that application was not favorably received, and was not acceded to. If you should be of the opinion that another effort to that end might have a better result, based upon the documents now transmitted, you will make it, and report upon the subject.

I am, &c.,

J. C. B. DAVIS.

[Inclosure.]

Mr. Delano to Mr. Fish.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D. C., August 1, 1871.

SIR: Before and during the war, portions of the Kickapoo tribe of Indians of the United States removed into Mexican territory. Understanding it to be desirable for them to be returned and remitted with the tribe to which they belong in the United States, Congress during its last session made an appropriation of $25,000 to defray the expenses of their return.

To accomplish this object, Mr. Miles was some time since appointed agent by the Indian Office, and directed to visit the Kickapoos in Mexico, and bring them back to that portion of the tribe remaining in the United States. On his arrival in Mexico he found himself embarrassed by the Mexican authorities and Mexican people, who seemed opposed to the return of the Kickapoos to the United States. A copy of Agent Miles's letter, addressed to Superintendent Hoag, dated June 7, 1871, is herewith inclosed, together with a copy of a letter of Commissioner Parker, transmitting the same to this office. This correspondence furnishes full information in regard to this question.

Since the writing of his letter, Agent Miles has returned to Mr. Hoag's superintendency, finding himself unable to accomplish the object of his mission. It is not deemed advisable at present for this Department to abandon the effort to bring the Mexican Kickapoos back to the United States, but it is impossible to accomplish this object without the co-operation of the Mexican authorities.

I have the honor, therefore, to respectfully request that you cause the Mexican government to be fully informed upon the subject embraced in this note, and that you will obtain, if possible, the authority of that government for the United States to enter Mexican territory, whenever it may be necessary to do so, and do such things as may be required in removing the Indians referred to to the United States, so that if it shall be finally decided to be the policy of the Government to return them, there may be no obstacles interposed by the Mexican government or Mexican people in accomplishing that object.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

C. DELANO,
Secretary.

HON. HAMILTON FISH,
Secretary of State.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C., July 20, 1871.

SIR: I have the honor to forward herewith a copy of a report of John D. Miles, United States Indian agent now in Mexico, charged with the removal of the Kickapoo Indians in that country, in accordance with the provision made by Congress for that purpose.

For a particular report upon the subject of the removal of these Indians, I would respectfully refer you to my communication of November 28, 1870, in which reference is made to a letter from the Secretary of State, inclosing a dispatch from Mr. Nelson, our minister to the republic of Mexico, upon the subject, dated October 22, 1870.

These papers having been returned to you with my letter of the above date, I have not a copy of said dispatch; but it was to the effect that the removal of these Indians had been the subject of some negotiation, and that the government of Mexico would look with favor upon the project, and that it would assist in gathering said Indians and transfer them to our agents, whenever they should be prepared to remove and locate them with the Kickapoos in the United States.

It was also understood that the Indians themselves were desirous of rejoining their brethren in this country, and that their removal would end the plundering raids into the frontier portions of Texas, of which there had been frequent and just complaint for many years.

Acting upon this information, Mr. John D. Miles, the Kickapoo Indian agent, was, on the 4th of March, 1871, instructed to proceed with a delegation of Kansas Kickapoos to the frontier of Mexico, and consult with the Kickapoos there, and, when gathered, accompany them to the Indian Territory.

It now appears, from the inclosed report of Agent Miles, that we have been misinformed as to the disposition of the Mexican authorities, and the Indians themselves, touching the removal of the latter, and that the Mexican people among whom they reside are hostile to the effort, and have interposed every obstacle in their power to prevent it, so that unless the work of collecting said Indians is performed by the Mexican authorities, the effort seems to be hazardous.

The Mexican people and local authorities desire the Indians to remain, regarding them as a protection against the incursions of hostile Apaches and Comanches from the north. Under these circumstances, Agent Miles, having entered the Mexican territory, finds himself regarded as an intruder, without credentials, and powerless to accomplish any result.

In view of this state of things, I would suggest the propriety of recalling Agent Miles, and deferring further effort for the removal of these Indians until a definite arrangement is had with the Mexican authorities on the subject. But in case you should deem it advisable that he continue his mission, I suggest that a commission be prepared for the agent, to be signed by yourself and countersigned by the honorable Secretary of State, and in some manner indorsed by the Mexican minister, to be transmitted to the agent, with such instructions as the present circumstances may seem to require.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. S. PARKER,
Commissioner.

HON. C. DELANO,
Secretary of the Interior.

MEXICO, SANTA ROSA,
Coahuila, 6-7, 1871.

ENOCH HOAG,
Superintendent Indian Affairs, Lawrence, Kansas:

We reached this place about one week ago, in company with Colonel Bliss, of Duncan, and W. Schuecharett, of Piedras Negras, United States consul or commercial agent, together with four or five persons as escort or guides. Passed two or three small camps of Kickapoos, all of whom seemed to be destitute, and glad to see some of their friends from the north. After the first day's drive we took in one of the principal men to guide us to the main camps, but owing to a break-down of one of our wheels, most of us had to walk for three days, and our Indian guide outwalked us, and went into camp one day ahead of us. We ran short of provisions, and were forty-eight hours without a morsel to eat, and that, too, under a scorching sun and "heated air," on the open plains, such as we had never before experienced. On arriving at Santa Rosa, we found near one hundred Kickapoos ready to meet their friends and hear from their folks up north. We find that a large portion of those who left Kansas in 1864 are dead, the mortality among this portion of the tribe being much greater than among those who have been raised in a southern climate. They are all but poorly clad, when clad at all, and present rather a wild and sorry appearance when compared with the tribe north. They are the most inconsistent beggars I ever saw, and many of them say they often starve for three days, and then get but little. In the past they have depended almost entirely on the "chase" for subsistence, and although they were induced to come into Mexican quarters, under promise of "bags of silver," and many other advantages, yet they had never received anything from the republic until within the last three weeks.

It appears that there had been appropriated by the general government of Mexico, about three years ago, the sum of ten thousand dollars, for the benefit of these Kickapoos, and was duly turned over to the governor of this State (Coahuila) at Saltillo, where it has been lying until last winter, when there was a commissioner appointed, and $5,000 of this fund directed to be turned over to him, to be expended for cows, horses, carts, corn, beef, cattle, &c., &c. This, we think, was all done after learning that our government had made appropriation for the removal of the Kickapoos. We find this commissioner here in the discharge of his duty, duly authorized by the State. On the second day after our arrival here, he bought and turned over to the Kickapoos fifty-two head of beef-cattle, and then drove them around by our quarters, to let us see that he was at no "child's play," but meant business. He had turned over to them a lot of corn only a few days before our arrival.

These are the substantial evidences that they are bringing to bear upon the Kickapoos to prejudice them in their favor, and the citizens here are very much opposed to their leaving, and assure them in every way possible that these things shall last, and that the Mexican government will continue to act in good faith toward them.

The local interest in this matter is this: the Kickapoos are on good terms with them, and as their numbers are sufficient to keep away all marauding bands of hostile Mescalero, Apaches, Comanches, &c., they are a sure protection for them, and the people of Santa Rosa say, if the Kickapoos leave them, they will be exposed to all the horrors of the arrow and scalping-knife. Santa Rosa is kept up almost entirely by its silver mining interests, and the leading miners, although of pure American blood, are bitterly opposed to the removal of the Kickapoos and against our presence here. The Mexicans tell the Indians that we are only setting another trap to get them over into Texas, and then repeat the terrible slaughter that was poured out upon them in 1865 by the rebel Texans, who sought to force them into the confederate service, and then, on account of their refusal, pounced upon them with fearful slaughter. The Mexicans have ever kept them in perfect ignorance of the conclusion of our terrible war, and have told them it still raged. This has been done in order to keep them from returning to their old homes north. The Kickapoos south still hold a bitter grudge against the Texans, and it is going to be quite difficult to get them to understand that it was not the representation of the loyal portion of our Government that punished them in Texas. They regard it as a mere chance that we passed through Texas safe. A large portion of the tribe is out on the hunt just now, and we cannot hold an official council among them until some of them return. Messengers were dispatched at once for them, and some squads have returned. The Indian portion of our delegation have been only some of their camps here, and report them in very destitute circumstances, and the women very generally express a wish to return north, while the men are disposed to question the propriety of the move, and have raised some very important points, which will be brought before me in general council, (if permitted to meet them in council. One is, "Where is Warren Station?" "How large a reservation is to be given us, and "Who are to be our neighbors?" and "Is the land good?" &c., &c. I am not authorized to answer any of these questions in my letters of instruction. Some say that before they will consent to go, they must send a delegation to see where they are to live; some are going to ask for ponies, so that they can take an independent course, and go independent of the military, of which they seem to have a dread. All these points that are being brought up by individuals unofficially. Here we are in a foreign country, regarded as intruders, with no official documents to show authority for crossing the Rio Grande to hold conference with these Indians, and yet, if we see them at all, it is absolutely necessary to go into Mexican territory. I should have had some kind of document from Commissioner Parker or Secretary Delano, and indorsed by the Mexican minister, and then the authorities here would not have thought so strange of our presence here. My only claim while on Mexican soil is that of an American citizen in an unofficial capacity. We find that several unofficial persons have been trying to work up their removal since the appropriation of the $25,000, partly on a "financial basis, but without success. This goes very much against us, from the fact that the Indians are getting tired of it, and do not know who to trust or believe. They refused to receive one party, and told him if he did come into camp they would kill him. Another tried to get a hearing with them, who was asked if he wished to fight; if he did, they were ready for him. Our party from Duncan all left us yesterday, and we propose to stay here as long as we think there is any hope for doing good. The alcalde has promised us protection, although he regards us as intruders, and he himself personally opposed to the removal of the Kickapoos. Our cash expenses have been quite heavy, and must continue to be while here, and we must have more money to get home, or even if the Kickapoos do not go north. Everything is specie since we reached Texas, and our currency has only brought from 85 to 83 cents on the dollar. We are three hundred miles from telegraphic communication, (San Antonio,) and yet we shall have to make a trip there before starting home. We have "fearful odds" to work against; therefore do not expect too much from us.

No. 429.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Mexico, August 10, 1871. (Received August 26.)

SIR: The Mexican department of foreign affairs, under date of the 28th of July ultimo, issued a circular to the governors of States upon the subject of foreign citizenship, a copy and translation of which are herewith inclosed, (A and B.)

The object of this circular is stated to be to procure the readier and more punctual observance of the accompanying decree of March 13, 1863, upon the same subject, and to prescribe certain new rules and regulations for the registration of foreign residents. Of these, the most important are those which concern those foreigners who have acquired their citizenship by naturalization, in respect to whom it is provided that for the purpose of registration and the consequent recognition of their actual citizenship by the Mexican government, they must present, not merely the diplomatic or consular certificates required in all cases, but also their original naturalization papers, and only when the loss or destruction of such papers is sufficiently proven will other proofs of equal force be admitted to show that the interested person legally obtained his naturalization, after observing the conditions of residence and the other conditions required by the laws of the country in question.

Moreover, the fact of such registration at the department of foreign affairs is to be considered as affording only a legal presumption of the citizenship therein ascribed to any foreigner; the government reserving to itself the right to ignore such registered citizenship whenever it may, by any means, become satisfied that the entry was unduly made.

Your obedient servant,

THOMAS H. NELSON.

[Translation.]

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS, CHANCERY SECTION.

This ministry has noticed that the governors of States, when they call for certificates of matriculation, in conformity with the third article of the law of March 16, 1861, they frequently do not keep in view the explanation of the eleventh article thereof, contained in the decree of March 13, 1863, which is inclosed with this circular for its readier and more punctual observance.

It is ordered therein that for the registration of any foreigner, it shall be sufficient that there be presented at this ministry a proof of his nationality certified by the proper diplomatic or consular agent, when the said individual possesses by birth the nationality attributed to him in the certificate, but not when he has acquired it by naturalization, and that in the latter case there must be presented to the government an incontrovertible proof that the interested party has complied with the conditions regarding residence and the other conditions prescribed by the naturalization laws of the country in question. It is, therefore, indispensable for the ready fulfillment of the said decree, that the governors and other functionaries through whose agency foreigners may solicit the certificates of registration contemplated by law, shall take care that the proofs of nationality sent in such cases to this ministry possess the necessary conditions, for which purpose the following rules are to be observed:

1. The certificate of nationality issued by a diplomatic or consular agent will be sufficient, whenever it is expressed therein that the person interested is a native of the country represented by said agent.

2. Whenever the passport mentioned in article 11 of the law of March 16, 1861, shall be presented as a proof of nationality, the said document shall be legalized by the proper diplomatic or consular agent, and accompanied by a certificate that the interested person is a native of the country represented by said agent.

3d. The proof to be presented by persons naturalized in a foreign country shall be the naturalization paper, duly legalized; and only when its loss or destruction shall be sufficiently proved, or that such document was not necessary under the laws of the country in question, other proofs of equal force may be admitted to show that the interested person legally obtained the alleged naturalization.

4th. Every proof of foreign nationality which shall not combine the requisites specified in some one of the preceding rules shall be of no value when presented for the purpose of obtaining a certificate of matriculation.

It is proper to note in this circular that a registration constitutes merely a legal presumption that a foreigner possesses the nationality therein assigned to him, and by virtue of such presumption he shall receive the legal treatment to which he is entitled by international prescription or by special treaties; but whenever it shall be discovered that, by a mistake of whatever kind, he has been registered in this ministry under a nationality which he does not possess by the laws of the country in question, the government of the republic cannot continue to treat him as possessing such nationality.

All which I communicate to you by order of the citizen president of the republic, for your information and observance in the part corresponding to your official functions.

Independence and liberty! Mexico, July 28, 1871.

MARISCAL.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS AND OF THE INTERIOR.

The president of the republic has been pleased to address me the following decree:

"The citizen Benito Juarez, constitutional president of the United States of Mexico, to all the inhabitants thereof:

"Know ye that, by virtue of the extraordinary faculties with which I am invested, I have been pleased to promulgate the following decree:

"ARTICLE 1. It is hereby declared that in the eleventh article of the law published on the 16th of March, 1861, which provides that for the inscription of an individual in the register of foreigners, and the issue to him of a certificate thereof, it shall suffice that he present to the ministry of foreign affairs a declaration of his nationality, certified by the proper diplomatic or consular agent; it is to be understood to imply 'when the person interested shall have originally possessed the nationality attributed to him by the certificate,' but not when he shall have obtained it by naturalization, in which latter case, in order to be recognized as possessing such nationality, he shall present to the government an indisputable proof of having fulfilled the conditions of residence and the other conditions prescribed by the naturalization laws of the country in question.

"ARTICLE 2. As the government of Mexico has neither the power nor the will to alter the legislation of other countries in regard to the requisites therein prescribed in order to obtain naturalization, all the declarations and recognitions of nationality as obtained by naturalization, without the proof of previous compliance with such requisites, shall remain without effect until such proof shall be presented.

"ARTICLE 3. The declarations of Spanish nationality made in consequence of steps which have been taken in the time and manner prescribed by the decree of August 10, 1842, are hereby confirmed.

"ARTICLE 4. Mexicans are prohibited from executing or alleging an irregular naturalization, under penalty of deportation for five years.

"ARTICLE 5. The Mexicans who, during the present foreign war or any other of the same character, shall renounce their nationality, shall be punished as traitors, and their property confiscated to the extent determined by the civil authority, to be applied to the expenses and damages of the war.

"Therefore I order the above decree to be printed, published, circulated, and duly obeyed.

"Given in Mexico, the 13th of March, 1863.

"BENITO JUAREZ.

"The citizen JUAN ANTONIO DE LA FUENTE,

"Minister of Foreign Affairs and of the Interior."

And I communicate it to you for its observance and other legal effects.

God and liberty! Mexico, March 13, 1863.

No. 432.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Mexico, August 24, 1871. (Received September 14.)

SIR: On the 8th instant there appeared in the Diario Oficial a long series of documents showing the relations which have existed for several months between the Mexican government and the Lower California Colonization Company, and the measures taken by the former to ascertain whether the company had or had not fulfilled the terms of its contract within the time therein stipulated.

According to the seventh article of the so-called "Leese contract," the company was bound to introduce into the peninsula of Lower California, within a term of years ending on the 4th of May last, two hundred families of colonists. As the result of a commission given to an officer of the custom-house of La Paz, to report upon the number of families of colonists existing in Lower California on the above date, that officer states that there were but twenty-nine families, but that there were in addition between four and five hundred single men, by counting whom the company claims to have fulfilled its engagement.

The government agents deny, 1st. That any number of single men can be legally considered to compose the families spoken of in the contract; 2d, that more than a small percentage of the single men referred to have been brought to the peninsula by the colonization company, alleging that they came thither for other purposes, especially for the gathering of the orchilla plant; and 3d, that such persons cannot be considered as colonists, they having come for the purposes of a temporary speculation. Acting upon this report the Mexican minister of public works addressed a note, on the 29th of June last, to Mr. Drake De Kay, secretary and general agent of the Lower California Company, (A and B,) declaring the concessions of land made to that company null and void for non-fulfillment of the terms of the contract, and that the government would proceed to open an account against that company for trespasses upon the national domain, and especially for the quantities of salt and of the orchilla plant which it has extracted from such public lands. The minister concludes by stating that he has sent copies of his note to the departments of the interior and of finance, "in order that they may proceed to take the proper steps concerning the introduction of goods at Magdalena Bay, and the continuance at that place of persons who improperly occupy public lands."

Your obedient servant,

THOMAS H. NELSON.

Mr. Balcarcel to Mr. De Kay.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS,
Mexico, June 29, 1871.

SIR: On the 19th of April, 1869, Mr. Jacob P. Leese, the representative of your company, was informed of the obligation under which the said company was placed, in respect to its taking possession of the lands it was to colonize in Lower California, according to its contract, of subjecting itself to the operation of the laws of the republic, applying for that purpose to the proper judicial authority, and previously executing a measurement and survey of those lands.

When you communicated to this department, on the 22d of September last, that the company was disposed to proceed by legal measures to obtain all the rights, exemptions, and immunities to which it was entitled according to its contract, and that with this object it had landed the first exploring and colonizing expedition, this government deemed it proper to repeat the above instructions, and informed the governor of Lower California that the colonization was to take place according to contract, not only in the zone comprehended between the parallels of $24^{\circ} 20'$ and 27° , but also in that between 27° and 31° ; leaving untouched in the former the property of Mexicans, whatever might be the titles alleged, even when they might not be yet confirmed; and taking possession, in the latter zone, for the proposed colony, of all the lands, without other limitation than that of reserving the fourth part for the native Mexicans who may solicit them. You were also informed at that time that the company was under obligation to execute immediately, in the first of these zones, a general measurement of the lands, in order to separate those belonging to Mexicans from those which were to be colonized: and that it was also under obligation to survey and determine, with the greatest accuracy, the parallels of 27° and of 31° , in order to enter thereafter into the possession of all the wild lands between these parallels, except the fourth part reserved for citizens of this republic.

Before this time, the government had to send to Lower California a scientific commission charged with the survey of the said parallels, in order that the company might meet with no difficulties in that respect, and the said commission being further charged to be present at the measurement made by the company.

The said company, instead of proceeding to the said measurement as the first step toward entering upon possession of the lands ceded for colonization, limited itself to the occupation of certain lands, and to the location of a small number of persons upon them. Although these irregularities attracted the attention of the government, it allowed the agents of the company to remain at Magdalena Bay, because they manifested a desire to explore the ground first, in order to proceed to the survey and measurement afterward. Moreover, as the government comprehended that for the establishment and success of the colonies it was indispensable that the company should introduce along with the colonists provisions and other objects necessary for their subsistence, as well as the utensils necessary for the works to be executed in the foundation of a colony, and all the more so in lands of that character, it facilitated, as far as possible, that class of importations, opening at the proper time, by virtue of its constitutional faculties, to the commerce of the high seas, the port of Magdalena Bay, which had been chosen by the company for the beginning of their work of colonization, and therefore the most adequate for the landing of the goods destined for the supply of the colonists.

All these measures of the government had for their object the colonization of the peninsula, and desiring to know if it was being done in accordance with the terms of the contract, the government named a special agent to proceed to Magdalena Bay, along with a judge of Lower California, in order that his acts might all have credit and responsibility, and to form a register of the number of families who should have established themselves in the territory up to the 4th of May last, the date which, according to the seventh article of the contract, the company should have introduced at least two hundred families of colonists. By the report of the special agent to this government and the accompanying register authorized by the judge, it is proven that on the 4th of May last there were in the districts examined that agent twenty-one foreign families, amounting to fifty-nine persons, and forty-five Mexicans inscribed as colonists, among whom were eight families; the sum total being therefore twenty-nine families, composed of one hundred and four persons. The company also presented as colonists introduced by it four hundred and twenty-six individuals, among whom only two were females, which individuals not only do not constitute families, but do not even possess the character of colonists, since they have not definitively left their own country to settle in this, but are now in the peninsula merely with the object of exercising a certain industry for a limited time.

From these facts it may be deduced that the company has failed to fulfill the seventh and other articles of the contract, since it has not introduced into the peninsula the two hundred families of colonists mentioned therein as a minimum. But the government knows, moreover, that the company, without having legally taken possession of its lands, has devoted itself to their exploitation in an undue manner, unauthorized by the terms of the contract. This department is also informed that since the month of February, 1870, Mr. J. Jansen, who calls himself an agent of your company, and claims to act under its authority, has exploited upon a great scale, and still exploits the silver mines of Ojo de Liebre against the express stipulations of the eighth article of the contract. The company itself has not only collected and exported the lichen called orchilla, in grounds of which it was not yet legally in possession, but has assumed to grant an exclusive privilege for the exercise of this industry, for which it would have no faculties, even in case of having fulfilled its contract, and having become the proprietor of the said lands.

Since the seventh and other articles of the contract have not been fulfilled, the stipulations of the seventeenth article are now to be applied, they being as follows: "If the contractors shall fail to fulfill any of these conditions within the time and manner stipulated the concession shall become null and void, even though they may have delivered in advance the sum of money mentioned, and in such case they shall be indemnified with 500 sitios de ganado mayor, between the twenty-seventh and thirty-first degree of latitude," and by virtue of this clause the citizen President of the republic has been pleased to declare that the concession of lands made for purposes of colonization, in favor of your company, has ceased to be binding, and is null and void.

As stipulated by the last clause, the government is disposed to indemnify the company with 500 sitios de ganado mayor, between the parallels of 27° and 31° , for which purpose it awaits that the company take the proper steps in this department, by means of a properly authorized representative; it being understood that there will previously be drawn up articles of settlement, in which the government will demand from the company the amount properly due for the articles of public property which it has taken without permission, and for the exploitation it has made of salt and of the orchilla plant in lands which are to be considered as belonging to the nation.

This decision is now communicated to the departments of the interior and of finance, in order that they may proceed to take the proper steps concerning the introduction of goods at Magdalena Bay, and the continuance at that place of persons who improperly occupy public lands.

Independence and liberty!

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Mexico, August 30, 1871. (Received September 14.)

SIR: This morning I received your dispatch No. 178, concerning the recent abortive attempt of officers connected with the Bureau of Indian Affairs toward removing fragmentary bands of Kickapoo Indians, now in Mexico, to their appropriate reservation within our own territory. I immediately sought an interview with the minister of foreign affairs, and communicated to him substantially the contents of the said dispatch and the inclosures thereof. He had not been informed of the improper interference of the local authorities at Santa Rosa, in thwarting the views of our Indian agent, Mr. Miles, and expressed much surprise at their conduct. He promised to prevent, if possible, in the future, any such intervention on the part of government or State officials. Mr. Mariscal having but recently entered upon the discharge of the duties of minister of foreign affairs, did not appear to be familiar with the correspondence between this legation and the Mexican government on this important subject, but said that he would make it a special study, with a view to another conference with me at an early day. He assured me that the Mexican government would present no obstacle in the way of the fulfillment of the humane and peaceful policy of our Government toward these Indians, who are temporarily residing in Mexico. Mr. Mariscal said that he would confer with the President in regard to the most feasible method of aiding our Government in the matter of removing the said Indians, and expressed the opinion that, the presidential election being over, there would now be no great difficulty in procuring the sanction of Congress to an act authorizing the passage of our troops across the frontier for the purposes indicated in your dispatches.

During the interview, I again called Mr. Mariscal's attention to the constantly increasing depredations of Indians from Mexico across the frontier of Texas, and the atrocities and outrages committed by them with perfect impunity; and said to him, in the language of your dispatch No. 172, that it might become the duty of our Government at least to weigh the expediency of pursuing these hostile Indians into Mexico without the consent of that government, if it should not adopt measures toward checking the depredations referred to. Mr. Mariscal replied that the Mexican government had not the power, without the authority of Congress, to permit the entrance of foreign troops upon Mexican soil; but that if it should become an imperious necessity for our troops to pursue savage and hostile Indians from our territory into Mexico, he assured me, as he said, unofficially, that the Mexican government, in his opinion, would not seriously complain.

I beg leave again to call attention to the proposition of the Mexican government, inclosed in my dispatch No. 216, (bis), and also to my dispatch No. 336, of January 10, 1871.

I have the honor to inclose a copy of a communication from our consul at Monterey, dated August 8, 1871, in regard to the council at Santa Rosa, (A,) and also a copy of a communication from our commercial agent at Piedras Negras, on the same subject, (B.) The latter inclosed a very interesting report from Mr. Miles, our agent, the substance of which has doubtless been communicated to the Indian Department.

Your obedient servant,

THOMAS H. NELSON.

Mr. Ulrich to Mr. Nelson.

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
Monterey, August 8, 1871.

SIR: A short time ago I had the honor to send you some Texas newspapers containing telegrams regarding the visit of Colonel Bliss and others, as commissioners from the United States to the Kickapoo Indians, who are living on this side of the Rio Grande at or near Villa Musquiz, (sometimes called Santa Rosa,) in the adjoining State of Coahuila, for the purpose of prevailing on the Indians to remove to their reservation in the United States. The newspapers referred to state that the Kickapoos had agreed to return to their reservation, but that on the day succeeding to that on which the arrangement was made, an agent from the governor of Coahuila arrived among them, and by the distribution of $5,000 among the tribe and by other means prevailed on them to remain in Mexico.

I was, at the time, rather inclined to doubt the truth of this statement, but on yesterday I had a conversation with a Seminole negro, "Gopher John," who has been on visit to the Kickapoos, and who was with them when the money was distributed among them by the agent of Governor Cepeda. I have no doubt, now, but that such is the case.

This "Gopher John," although a negro, is a chief among the Seminoles who remain in this country, and came here with the tribe soon after the close of the Florida war. He is a shrewd, sharp customer, and his statements are reliable.

The ostensible reason for this proceeding of the governor of Coahuila is, that he wishes the Kickapoos to remain on the frontier of his State as a protection to the inhabitants against the Comanches and other wild Indians from Texas; but I do not believe that for this reason alone would he be guilty of so gross a breach of good neighborhood. No doubt he has been prevailed on by the inhabitants of Musquiz, and the region around, to retain these Indians there, from the fact that large gains are reaped from the trade growing out of their raids into Texas, by which means the ranches and haciendas are supplied with fine horses and mules at very low rates. So, under such circumstances, the business is a bad one, and but one result can follow: if the United States do not soon insist on the breaking up of this nest of horse-thieves and murderers the Texans will themselves attend to the matter; and when this takes place, great is the feeling against the Mexicans of the frontier that they will suffer equally with the Kickapoos.

There is no doubt as to the stealing done by these Indians. Their raids are constant, and their starting on them and their returns are always well known in their neighborhood.

I am told by reliable persons that on all the ranches on the frontier are to be found valuable horses, with brands on them of all the stock-raisers from San Antonio to the Rio Grande; and I know that here are daily seen on the streets valuable animals and in greater numbers than heretofore, that no doubt have found their way here through the agency of the Kickapoos.

I give you the above facts, as I think it very essential you should know exactly how this matter stands, and being assured that, before a great time, serious complications will grow out of the matter.

I also refer you to my correspondence on the same subject with Mr. Plumb.

I sent you, by last mail, newspapers from Brownsville with articles marked relating to cattle-stealers' raids from this side of the river, on the Lower Rio Grande. Although, no doubt, some allowance must be made for the customary over-statements of Texas editors, still, there is no doubt but that the wrongs complained of exist to a great extent, and that the articles referred to indicate anything but a friendly feeling between the people on the two sides of the river.

I hope you will be able to do something in this Kickapoo business, as it must be very evident to you that their remaining in Mexico will not add much to a complete harmony between the two nations, to say nothing of the terrible results that will follow a raid of Texans on this frontier.

I will continue sending you such Texas newspapers as I receive, and I have no doubt you can judge from them more clearly on these matters than from anything I can write.

I have the honor, &c.,

J. ULRICH,
United States Consul.

UNITED STATES COMMERCIAL AGENCY,
Piedras Negras, July 22, 1871.

SIR: In my communication of June 11 I had the honor to mention to you that a delegation from the Kickapoo reservation, in Kansas, had gone to Santa Rosa to treat with the Kickapoo Indians living in that vicinity, about their removal to the United States, and I offered to communicate to you the result. I have now the honor to inclose, for your information, an original letter on this subject, addressed to me by Mr. Miles, the United States Indian agent, giving a detailed statement of the whole matter. I have also sent several Texas papers, in which you may note the growing excitement in Texas in regard to the depredations committed by Mexicans and Indians living in Mexico. The latest depredations so near San Antonio were perpetrated, in my opinion, by that band of Lipanes and Mescaleros which, a few months ago, was provided by Mexicans on this side of the Rio Grande with ammunition and arms, and as soon as their means of warfare shall be exhausted they will probably again make their appearance in this vicinity, as usual, in order to trade off the plunder brought from Texas for new supplies.

SIR: A communication has been addressed to this Department by the Secretary of War, dated the 1st instant, transmitting correspondence between General McCook, commanding officer of the sub-district of the Rio Grande, and Mr. T. F. Wilson, the consul at Matamoras, relative to depredations committed upon cattle in Texas by armed parties coming from the Mexican side of the border. It appears from this correspondence, copies of which are herewith inclosed, that our military authorities are unable to protect the property of our citizens without the co-operation of the Mexican officers. General Cortinas, the commander of the Mexican troops on the frontier, not only makes no endeavors to prevent the robberies, but is even believed to be in league with the marauders.

In view of these facts you are hereby instructed to lay the corres-pendence transmitted to you before the Mexican government; to urgently demand the recall of General Cortinas from his present post, and to ask for the adoption of such efficient measures as will prevent the recurrence of these marauding incursions.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, September 1, 1871.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith, for your information, copy of a correspondence between the consul of the United States, at Matamoras, Mexico, and officers of the Army, stationed on the Texas frontier, relative to the complicity of Mexican officials with the depredations on that frontier.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

The Hon. the SECRETARY OF STATE.

HEADQUARTERS FORT BROWN, TEXAS,
August 2, 1871.

SIR: I feel it my duty to communicate to you some information as to the condition of affairs on the line of the Rio Grande, where I have been stationed for the last four years, two years of that time commanding officer of the sub-district of the Rio Grande.

There is in existence on the frontier a system of cattle-stealing, which, if persisted in, will be disastrous to the stock-raising interests of Texas, and may lead to a predatory war on either side of the river, eventually producing a conflict between the two nations.

Armed parties cross from Mexico to Texas to steal cattle; from the scarcity of troops on this line, and the nature of the country bordering on the river, it is almost impossible to capture these bands unless caught in the act of crossing.

During the last month there have been several conflicts, and last week there was firing from both banks of the river at Rancho Nuevo, (Texas side,) six leagues above this place, resulting in the death of one man and wounding another, on the Mexican shore. This conflict took place between a band of marauders from Mexico and some citizens from Texas.

It will not require many such affairs to open the conflict, and, it is my opinion, that unless co-operation by the Mexican authorities be extended us, in breaking up these bands of marauders, there will be serious trouble in less than three months hence.

Since the arrival of General Juan M. Cortina and his troops upon the frontier, the marauding has increased tenfold.

General Cortina is charged in the public prints with being connected with the marauders, receiving and enjoying proceeds of said thefts. The object of this letter is to ask you to present to the authorities of Mexico these facts, in order that these evils and their causes may be done away with. General Miguel Palacios, Mexican army, commanding the regular troops at Matamoras, called upon me yesterday, asking me to co-operate with him, offering to do all in his power to put a stop to these outrages; but as long as General Cortina and his command are present, he is powerless to do good. Cortina's history and outlawry on the American bank of the river, in 1859, is, no doubt, familiar to you.

I respectfully inclose a transcript of the records of the district court of Cameron County, setting forth the indictment against Cortina in said county. There are other indictments of a like serious nature in the counties above.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

HEADQUARTERS FORT BROWN, TEXAS,

August 2, 1871.

MY DEAR GENERAL: * * * * * There are other events occurring upon the frontier which you should be made acquainted with. The system of cattle-stealing here is most outrageous and scandalous, and since the arrival of the bandit Juan N. Cortina, general Mexican army, and his troops on the river, the marauding has increased tenfold. Several conflicts have taken place between the marauders and the citizens of Texas, last month, and last week at the Rancho Nuevo, (Texas side,) six leagues above here, there was firing from both banks of the river, resulting in the killing of one man and wounding another, on the Mexican shore. A few more such affairs and the conflict opens, and if the frontier continues in this condition three months a predatory war will ensue, possibly involving the two nations.

I am determined to do all I can to stop it, and General Palacios, commanding the regular troops in Matamoras, has appeared to co-operate with me, and it is necessary to have that murderer and thief, Cortina, removed or we cannot prevent trouble. He is charged in the public prints with being a party to the outrages, receiving and enjoying the proceeds of said thefts. As long as Cortina is here Palacios can do nothing. I think the absence of a cavalry force on this side has something to do with increasing the number of outrages. I know there is none to come, therefore ask for none, but will keep you advised from day to day about the matter, if anything of importance occurs. I send you a copy of a communication sent by me, yesterday, to Thomas P. Wilson, consul for the United States at Matamoras, a copy of which was furnished to General Palacios, who telegraphed the entire communication to the authorities in Mexico.

Very truly, yours,

General J. J. REYNOLDS.

Matamoras, August 3, 1871.

SIR: I have to acknowledge your communication dated yesterday, with its inclosures, in regard to cattle-stealing on the Texas frontier, by bands of Mexican marauders, and to inform you that I at once transmitted a copy of it to General Miguel Palacios, commander of the line of the Rio Grande, and will also forward a copy of it to the United States minister at the city of Mexico.

In a conversation which I had with General Palacios on the subject, he admitted the apparent complicity of General Cortina with the robbers, and informed me that he would represent the matter to the Mexican government, with a view to having General Cortina and his command recalled from the frontier. General Palacios at the same time manifested a lively disposition to check these robberies and restore order and quiet to the Rio Grande Valley.

I fully concur with you in the necessity of a prompt suppression of these robberies, and am satisfied it cannot be done while General Cortina holds the position he does in the Mexican army on this border. I assure you that it will always be my duty, as well as a pleasure, to second you in every way in my power to secure and maintain the observance of the laws on both sides of the Rio Grande.

SIR: Your dispatches, numbered 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, and 440, have been received.

With reference to the first of these dispatches, accompanied by correspondence between the Mexican government and the authorities of the custom-house at Tampico, in which the latter are ordered to exact a second payment of duties from the merchants of that city, I have to inform you that your intention to protest against this arbitrary exaction, so far as it may affect the rights of citizens of the United States, meets with the approval of this Department.

MEXICO, September 21, 1871.

The President of the republic has been pleased to address me the following decree:

"Benito Juarez, constitutional President of the United States of Mexico, to the inhabitants thereof:

"Know ye, that the land-grant made on the 31st of March, 1864, to the Lower California Colonization Company, having been declared null, from which it follows that the opening of Magdalena Bay as a port of entry has no longer any object; and in use of the powers given the executive by the XIV clause of article 85 of the constitution, I have thought proper to issue the following decree:

"The decree of the 24th of February last, by which the port called Magdalena Bay, in the territory of Lower California, was declared a port of entry, is hereby revoked, and the said port shall be closed from and after the 31st of December next.

"Therefore I order the above decree to be printed, published, circulated, and duly obeyed.

"Given in the national palace of Mexico, September 20, 1871.

"BENITO JUAREZ.

"The Citizen MATIAS ROMERO, Minister of Finance, present."

And I communicate it to you for your information and the objects consequent thereupon.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Mexico, September 29, 1871. (Received October 13.)

SIR: On the 21st instant I addressed a note to Mr. Mariscal, (A,) inclosing copies of a letter from General McCook, commanding the United States forces at Fort Brown, Texas, addressed to the American consul at Matamoras, and of a letter from the said consul to General Palacios, Mexican commander of the line of the Rio Grande, both relating to the alarming increase of a system of cattle-stealing by Mexican citizens on the Texan frontier, which, in the opinion of the writers, will result, if not speedily checked, in a predatory warfare eventually producing a conflict between the two nations.

General McCook further states that General Juan N. Cortina, the local military commander at Matamoras, is publicly charged with protecting the marauders and receiving a portion of the spoils; for which reason, after summarizing the opinions above expressed, and alluding to a record of numerous criminal indictments against the said Cortina, obtained by General McCook from various courts in Texas, and sent me by Consul Wilson, I intimated that the presence of Cortina on the frontier at this time is peculiarly unfortunate for the peace of the two countries. In this connection, I called Mr. Mariscal's attention to my note of the 6th of May last, upon the similar case of the robbery of horses from Mr. Albert Champion, repeating the language I then employed, under instructions from the State Department, as to the probable consequences of such depredations, and concluded by reminding the Mexican government that I still awaited the results of the investigation promised in the said case of Mr. Champion.

At the same time, I addressed Mr. Mariscal an unofficial note, (B,) inclosing and calling his attention to several Texas papers, containing articles upon this subject; to which Mr. Mariscal replied in a confidential note, (C,) assuring me that measures would be adopted tending to remedy that situation.

On the 22d instant, Mr. Mariscal addressed me a note, (D,) postponing to another occasion his reply upon the subject of cattle stealing, but inclosing four documents of the investigation into the case of Mr. Champion, namely: a request made by Mr. Mariscal to the war department, (E,) for the return of the said horses to Mr. Champion; the reply of General Mejia, (F,) transcribing a statement of General Cortina to the effect that he had returned a portion of the horses by virtue of a power of attorney from said Champion; a note of Mr. Mariscal to the war department, (G,) requesting a copy of such power of attorney; and another note from General Mejia, (H,) inclosing the copy requested.

To these documents I add a translation of an article that recently appeared in a paper of this city, (I,) defending General Cortina from the charges of the Texan press.

In an interview which I have had with Mr. Mariscal for the purpose of urging speedy and decisive action upon this subject, he remarked that the President, upon reading my note and its inclosures, was profoundly impressed with the gravity of the situation.

There is no doubt in my mind of an anxiety on the part of the government to put a check to these lawless proceedings, but, unfortunately, the chief difficulty arises from its want of power to enforce its mandates in States remote from the capital.

I would earnestly suggest to the Government of the United States the pressing necessity of arriving at some understanding with the government of Mexico, such as will remove, or at least mitigate, the present alarming condition of affairs upon the frontier.

Your obedient servant,

THOMAS H. NELSON.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Mexico, September 21, 1871.

SIR: I inclose a copy of a communication from General A. McD. McCook, commanding the United States forces at Fort Brown, dated August 2, 1871, addressed to the United States consul at Matamoras, and also a copy of a communication addressed by the said consul to General Miguel Palacios, the Mexican commander on the line of the Rio Grande, dated August 3, both of which relate to the system of cattle stealing that prevails on the northern frontier, which, if not speedily checked, may, in the opinion of General McCook and of the said consul, lead to predatory warfare on either side of the line, eventually producing a conflict between the two nations.

The excitement upon this subject is intense and increasing, and the offenders appear to be left in perfect impunity by the Mexican authorities. Indeed, it is alleged that they receive the protection of the Mexican General Cortina, whose antecedents, as proven by documents in my possession, render his presence on the frontier at this time peculiarly unfortunate for the peace of the two countries.

In this connection I beg leave to call your excellency's attention to my note of the 6th of May last, addressed to Mr. Aspiroz, and take this occasion to repeat most earnestly the language I was then instructed by my Government to employ, namely, "that the frequency of acts of this kind, and the virtual impunity of the offenders, would seem to demand some more efficient check than any which the treaties between the two countries afford. It is obviously for the interest of both countries that the government of each should do whatever may be in its power toward restraining and discouraging such lawless proceedings, and it is hoped that the Mexican government may take efficient steps for that purpose. If, however, no such steps should be taken, it may become difficult to prevent retaliation by raids of armed parties from Texas into Mexico, which could not fail to peril the peaceful relations on the border."

I would further remind your excellency that I am still awaiting, with great interest, the communication of the results of the investigation in the said case of Albert Champion, which was promised by Mr. Aspiroz in his note of the 9th of May last.

I improve this occasion again to renew to your excellency the assurance of my very high consideration.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your excellency's note of yesterday, with its inclosures, relating to accusations of cattle stealing, said to have taken place on the frontier of Tamaulipas, in which connection your excellency repeats the statement which, by order of your Government, you made on the subject to this ministry in your note of the 6th of May last, and also informs me that you await with great interest the result of the investigation in the case of Albert Champion. Reserving for another occasion my reply upon the subject of cattle stealing, to which the inclosures and papers accompanying your note refer, and complying with your wishes in regard to the case of Mr. Champion, I have the pleasure of inclosing the most recent communications that have been exchanged in reference to the complaints of the party interested.

I take pleasure in renewing to your excellency, upon this occasion, the assurances of the very distinguished consideration with which I am your excellency's obedient servant,

"In reply to your note of the 27th ultimo, I have to inform you that as I have no horses belonging to Mr. Champion in my possession, I cannot return any to him; since, although it is true that I returned him some of those which he is alleged to have lost, it was because they were in possession of certain persons who had bought them, and, through the influence of some of my friends, I succeeded in obtaining them, and ordered them to be delivered to the said Champion, by virtue of a power of attorney which that foreigner gave me to act for him in the recovery of the horses."

And I have the honor to transcribe the above to you, in reply to and as the result of your dispatch on this subject, of the 23d of June last.

GENERAL JUAN N. CORTINA.

For some time past the press of Brownsville has labored to discredit this Mexican patriot by the grossest calumnies. We are not surprised at this vile conduct, for we know the motives which the Brownsville editors have for blackening his fame. General Cortina is well known on the frontier as the bitterest enemy of the confederates of that part of Texas, where it is known that our countrymen enjoy no protection, and are often barbarously assassinated after the burning of their property.

The perpetrators of such murders have sometimes crossed the frontier in order to commit new depredations in our country, and General Cortina, being informed in time, has caught them in the act, and without pity has ordered them to be hung or shot as malefactors. The Brownsville press, on such occasions, has been filled with insults and menaces against all Mexicans, and particularly against General Cortina. At such times the most exaggerated rumors have been set afloat, announcing grave questions at issue between Mexico and the United States; the absorption of our country by the great republic; fabulous claims of Americans; and the magical appearance of two hundred or three hundred thousand negroes on our frontier whenever and however these turbulent prophets may choose.

But what most surprises us is that there are Mexican newspaper writers who have formed an alliance with those of Brownsville to attack the Fronterizo, an independent paper published at Matamoras, which honorably and bravely defends the rights of our countrymen residing in Texas, who are, as this colleague asserts, made victims in their persons and property of notorious abuses by our neighbors. Is it because the Fronterizo is in favor of the re-election? or is it because it defends General Cortina from unjust attacks and infamous calumnies? Is it necessary now to insult this meritorious citizen through the agency of our neighbors? because he has employed his numerous friendships upon the frontier for the triumph of Mr. Juarez? Really, it is deplorable that any one should allow himself to be carried by party spirit to such an extreme. We regret it; for in such conduct we see nothing noble or even decent.

As to these attacks upon General Cortina, we will content ourselves at present with copying the following from the Brownsville Sentinel:

"The Fronterizo alleges that when, during the civil war, General Cortina was military commandant of the State of Tamaulipas, he treated the Americans courteously, kindly, and with moderation; not even molesting his personal enemies. General Cortina undoubtedly deserves all that is said in his favor in this respect. There were then many millions of dollars of American property on the Mexican side, and there was full protection for persons and interests."—Monitor Republicano, September 27, 1871.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,
Leon, March 8, 1871. (Received April 1.)

SIR: I have the honor of transmitting to you inclosed—

1. Copy of the resignation of President Quadra, with translation thereof, (inclosure 1.)

2. Copy of my note of February 27 last to Mr. T. Ayon, transmitting to him copy of the address I proposed to direct to President Quadra upon his inauguration, with that address in the Spanish original and translation, (inclosures 2 and 3.)

3. Copy of Mr. Ayon's reply of the 1st instant, communicating the answer President Quadra would give to my address, together with that answer and translation of both documents, (inclosures 4 and 5.)

4. Copy and translation of Minister Rivas's note of the 4th instant, sending an autograph letter of President Quadra to President Grant, informing him of his having taken possession of the presidency, along with a translation of that letter and a copy of my note of 6th instant, acknowledging the receipt of Mr. Rivas's communication, (inclosures 6, 7, and 8.)

You will please perceive from these documents, that after the twice-repeated resignation of Mr. Vicente Quadra, the President elect, had been rejected, and he, as it were, been compelled to accept the presidency, I went to the capital to assist in his inauguration, being well persuaded that both by him and by the people at large the presence of the representative of the United States would be considered a high compliment.

During my sojourn at Managua, I was received and treated with the most distinguished consideration on all sides, and by no one more so than by Mr. Quadra himself. It had been agreed by the consuls present and myself, and I had so informed the government, that I would address the new President. As soon, however, as I learned that meantime an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from Salvador had arrived, I informed Mr. Minister Rivas, who had tendered me the hospitality of his house, that inasmuch as the gentleman from Salvador had a higher rank than mine, I would withdraw my address. He thereupon had an interview with Mr. Quadra, in consequence of which he stated to me that the President desired me to deliver my address first, and that he would settle the point of etiquette with the Salvadorian envoy.

I am happy to say that Mr. Quadra did make a very favorable impression upon me. He is—quite a rare exception among these people—very plain-spoken, but I do not doubt thoroughly honest and well-meaning; he never uses a phrase without just meaning what it implies. Quite another question is, whether he will be able to overcome the terrible difficulties in his path. I should not be astonished to find him possessed of the will and energy to do it; but I fear he and his administration will encounter their most determined opponents in any progressive move among their so-called friends. He did me the favor of asking my permission to consult me privately on any question that might occur to him, and of assuring me that any advice I might volunteer would receive from him the fullest consideration.

Ex-President Guzman behaved exceedingly well in the transfer of power, a moment ever critical in these countries. At the head of the consuls I paid him a valedictory visit, addressing him with a few appropriate words.

During my last interview with Mr. Quadra, in the presence of Minister General Rivas, I urgently requested him to use his influence with congress in having the extradition treaty ratified at an early day, and particularly in paving a way toward a satisfactory claims convention, of the history whereof I gave a cursory recital. I also requested him to look into a very plain claim of an American citizen, wherein I have been corresponding with Mr. Ayon for months. He promised to act upon my suggestion.

Allow me, in conclusion, to submit whether, under the peculiar circumstances, in President Grant's reply, a few words of cheer, which, coming from that source would be very highly appreciated, would not be appropriate. Mr. Quadra several times, and very emphatically, gave words to his sincere admiration for and sympathy with our President, Government, and nation.

I have, &c.,

C. N. RIOTTE.

P. S.—I also inclose copy and translation of a note of Mr. T. Ayon, of the 21st February last, informing me of Mr. Vicente Quadra's election to the presidency, and inviting me to attend his inauguration, along with copy of my reply of the 23d of February. (Inclosures 9 and 10.)

[Inclosure 1.—Translation.]

RESIGNATION OF THE PRESIDENT ELECT, MR. VICENTE QUADRA.

Hon. Senators and Representatives :

The prefect of the department, commissioned by the supreme government, laid, on the 25th instant, into my hands the decree of the 24th instant, wherein you declare me popularly and constitutionally elected to serve in the presidency of the republic during the new period commencing the 1st of March next. The vote of confidence I have received from my fellow-citizens calling me, without any merit on my side, to the first magistracy of the nation, has highly engaged my gratitude, and I shall never forget such distinguished proof of the good opinion they entertain of me. I will frankly confess to you that I much wish to be possessed of the abilities necessary to worthily perform that high and elevated trust, for then I would not trepitate to accept it, notwithstanding the sacrifice of my personal interests involved thereby; but I would poorly correspond to the confidence placed in me if, with the innermost conviction entertained by me of my absolute incompetency, I should resolve upon serving in a station which I do not consider proper for me, and so much more, as there are plenty of conspicuous citizens able to perform it in a satisfactory manner. No, gentlemen; my conscience, my honor, the love for my country, impose upon me the duty to resign the presidency; and upon you, your honor, your conscience, and the mission you have received to guard the welfare of the nation, to accept my resignation in order that the people may select another person, who, with better information and a more extended practical knowledge of public affairs, shall understand how to lead her on the road of prosperity and greatness.

It must not be thought that my opinion on my incapacity is the result of false modesty nor should my declining the presidency be attributed to a sentiment of paltry egotism. Nothing of that, gentlemen! You have been witnesses to my life, and the classes of business I have practiced. I am an absolute stranger to politics, and know nothing of the science of government. How should I be able to bring to a felicitous conclusion the arduous and difficult enterprise to administer the interests of a nation barely constituted, if I am permitted to say so, and wherein there are so many obstacles to be removed merely to put her on the road of prosperity? True, I have the best intentions to gain the welfare of my country, but intentions alone will not do; something more is necessary, which I am wanting of.

Aside from what I have said, you have to take in consideration my weak and sickly constitution. From the accompanying documents you will perceive that I am suffering from an infirmity which, at certain periods, prevents me from every active exercise and, above all, from mental occupations. Should, after having taken charge of the presidency, that infirmity attack me, then I would find myself in the painful position of being unable to devote to the dispatching of the public affairs the time required or of being compelled frequently to lay down the office for a time, either of which contingency I deem pernicious to the interests of the nation. In my letter to the district electors of October 8 last, I explained to them all the inconvenience resulting from my election; but since they were not pleased to desist, it is now for you to do me justice by admitting my resignation of the presidency, hereby offered in the most formal manner. The interests of the nation demand it, and you cannot disregard them.

ADDRESS.

MR. PRESIDENT: I have the honor, united with four members of the consular body, to offer to you our congratulations for your happy inauguration to the first magistracy of the nation, and equally to the people of Nicaragua for having confided the supreme executive power to so distinguished a citizen, to so pure and energetic hands, and to a character so frank and firm.

The foreign nations we represent have no other desire, as they have no other interest, but that this nation, making a proper and ample use of the treasure bestowed upon it by nature on the road of order and of peaceable progress, may reach that degree of well-being, prosperity, and growth to which it is destined, and they are ready to make more and more intimate the friendly relations subsisting between them and this republic.

I, in particular, feel authorized to assure you, with all frankness, that my nation, my government, and I myself anxiously wish to establish those relations upon a footing of mutual advantage, of true republican fraternity and reciprocal respect, based upon that justice which forms the indispensable foundation of all human relations, domestic as well as municipal, political as well as international.

Would that, from the solemn act to-day celebrated by the nation, a new era in the annals of the republic might be dated!

[Inclosure 4.—Translation.]

I have the honor of transmitting to Mr. Minister Riotte copy of the reply his excellency President Quadra will make to the address whereby Mr. Riotte, in behalf of the diplomatic and consular corps, will congratulate him upon his inauguration to the nation's first magistracy.

I am happy to inform Mr. Riotte that one of the president's adjutants will be at his house at 12 o'clock to-day to accompany him to the national palace.

I remain Mr. Riotte's, &c., &c.,

TOMAS AYON.

President Quadra's reply.

I thank your excellency for the highly gracious terms wherein, in behalf of the honorable diplomatic and consular corps, you have deigned to congratulate me upon my inauguration to the first magistracy of the nation.

One of my principal designs in the fulfillment of the functions devolved upon me will be to cultivate with the illustrious governments represented by the honorable gentlemen of the diplomatic body, the most frank and friendly relations, and to adopt measures for increasing the commerce of their citizens with the republic of Nicaragua.

I am of opinion that what they need to develop the important material interests they are importing to the Hispano-American republics of the New World, is security for their persons and their property. I shall endeavor to give it, complying with the sacred duty imposed upon me by society and by the laws, and I shall, to that end, make use of all the means at my command.

I offer to the honorable gentlemen of the diplomatic and consular corps my most cordial greetings, and beg them to transmit to their governments (the expression of) my great sympathy and high consideration.

[Inclosure 6.—Translation.]

I have the honor of transmitting to Mr. Minister Riotte an autograph letter directed to the most excellent President of the United States by his excellency President Vicente Quadra, informing him of his having taken possession of the presidency of the republic.

From the copy inclosed Mr. Minister Riotte will be advised of the contents of that letter.

I also submit to Mr. Riotte a printed exemplar of the decree issued by the President organizing his cabinet.

I offer to Mr. Riotte, &c., &c.

A. H. RIVAS.

Vicente Quadra, President of the Republic of Nicaragua, to his excellency the President of the United States of America.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: I have the honor of informing your excellency that, after my fellow-citizens did confide to me the difficult task of governing this republic during the present constitutional period, I have taken possession of the presidency on the 1st instant. Among the momentous duties devolved upon me by the position wherein I find myself placed, I consider as the most essential for the well-being of the people who laid this destiny into my hands, to cultivate the good relations existing between this nation and the one you so worthily govern.

Anxiously interested in the progress of the nation, your excellency will find me always disposed to promote and second everything tending to augment international sympathies. In this sense it is highly satisfactory to me to offer to your excellency my friendship and consideration.

May God protect your excellency, keeping you in His holy care.

SIR: I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch No. 51, 24th ultimo.

Inclosed I have the honor of submitting to you copies and translations of correspondence had with the Nicaragua government on the subjects, viz, the autograph letter from President Grant to President Quadra on the latter's elevation to the presidency, and the maritime canal across Nicaragua. Being persuaded that the practicability of this line and its merits, as compared to other lines, will be investigated by the very best authorities, and the only ones competent to decide, I cannot deem myself warranted to offer an opinion on it. The reasons urged in Mr. Balladare's note in behalf of the Nicaragua line are well founded, and I do not hesitate to express the conviction that President Quadra sincerely prefers to have the enterprise fall into the hands of Americans in preference to any other nation. The Franco Lefevre contract, reported on in my dispatch No. 72, came up in the senate session of March 14, as I learn from the proceedings published but four days ago, and that body advised the government not to submit it to the approbation of the sovereign, (Toberano, the modest title used for congress,) since it was onerous for the country. Thus it will sleep along with the Chevalier and so many contracts upon the same subject.

MANAGUA, May 11, 1871.

SIR: I have received order from his excellency the President of the republic to direct to you this dispatch, to lay before you a subject of the highest importance, wherein the Nicaraguan government is very much interested. His excellency the President has learned from publications of foreign papers, and from some dispatches you have directed to my department, that the Government of the American Union, for some time already, is occupied with decided energy to find out which may be the most advantageous spot for excavating a maritime canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific, across the American isthmus. To that important end it has sent out exploring commissions to Darien and Tehuantepec, without till this day attaining the desired result.

It has occurred to my government that these scientific expeditions were not from beginning sent to the territory of this republic, when everything seems to indicate that it is here where the grand problem, traced out since the days of the discovery of America, must receive its practical solution.

A slight glance upon the map of this continent suffices to become assured that Nicaragua, with her navigable rivers, her interior lakes, and the short distance intervening between them and the Pacific, is the point presenting the best conditions for the practicability of that work of universal interest. These and other favorable circumstances whereof you are well aware, as for the benignity of the climate, the proximity to the road to the centers of the population, the abundance of provisions, the sympathies of the Nicaraguan people for the American, &c., ought to have induced the American Government to dispatch said expedition to this republic, and that it did not induce the government of Nicaragua to assume that the Washington Cabinet was not fully cognizant of said circumstances, or that it was preoccupied by incorrect or interested accounts, which may have originated in the desire to call the attention of the American Government and people to localities they were referring to. For these reasons the undersigned was ordered to forward to your excellency, as I herewith do in a separate package, a series of documents relative to the principal studies hitherto made upon the Nicaraguan canal, among which are found plans and other data throwing abundant light upon that most important subject. The undersigned hopes that your excellency will be pleased to transmit those documents to the government you represent, for whatever they may be worth to it, in case it should not have had prior knowledge thereof. And, furthermore, he hopes that you will be pleased to lay before that Government all the information favorable to the project, derived from your acquaintance of the country, and also to assure it that the Nicaraguan government is fully inclined to lend to the American commission that may come for exploring the territory of the republic all the co-operation it is capable of.

For the government of the undersigned it would be very satisfactory if, in consequence of that exploration, that gigantic work would be put on the way of realization, which truly would form one of the wonders of the age; and it is unquestionable that the initiative taken by President Grant in the matter will secure to him a lasting fame.

Having thus complied with the order of his excellency the President, the undersigned has happy to renew, &c., &c.

REPORT CONCERNING THE ROUTE FOR THE NICARAGUA CANAL, 1871.

Mr. President of the Republic of Nicaragua :

In your inaugural address you expressed a desire to receive some information with regard to the route of the Nicaragua Canal. This I now have the honor to offer.

The route of the Nicaragua Canal by water, is the river San Juan and Lake Nicaragua; thence across the isthmus from Lake Nicaragua to the Pacific Ocean. We find two feasible routes: the one through the plain of Jocote, via the river of Las Lajas, which flows into Lake Nicaragua, and the river Brito, which flows into the Pacific; the other through the plain of Ochomogo, via the Ochomogo River, which flows into Lake Nicaragua, and the Escalante River, which flows into the Pacific Ocean.

We will now show the situation of the proposed routes for the Nicaragua Canal from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

The world has already been informed by the reports of explorations made at various times of the American isthmus, that a canal through it is nowhere positively feasible, save in Nicaragua. Many celebrated authors have written upon this subject, whose works are so well known that I think it unnecessary to quote from them.

But what has corroborated this opinion, already so well founded, has been the recent exploration made under the auspices of the Government of the United States of America in the territory of Colombia.

Captain Selfridge, accompanied by very skillful engineers and a complete personnel of the various branches of science, after a careful examination, lasting more than five months, declared that it was not possible to open a canal by any of the routes proposed in that territory.

In like manner Commander Shufeldt, on the Tehuantepec route, did not find a practical line for the canal.

Thus it is that, as I said at the beginning, it is only through Nicaragua that this enterprise, the accomplishment of which is so anxiously desired by the friends of human progress, can be carried out.

The most important surveys which have been made by this route are three, which have indicated three points at which the excavation of a canal has seemed possible. I shall treat of these as briefly as possible, in order to pass on to the consideration of a route which, in my opinion, is the easiest of all that have been proposed; and this is the only object of my correspondence.

Commencing in chronological order, we find that the first survey was the one made by Mr. Bailey, an English engineer, for the Central American federation, in the year 1827.

In the first place, I think it will be understood, as a matter of course, that all the surveys which have been made in this country have had for their bases the San Juan River and Lake Nicaragua, which, on account of the abundance of their waters, offer great facilities for a work of this kind; so that, in speaking of the three surveys which I have just mentioned, I shall omit the river and the lake, and shall confine myself to the land portion, where the excavation, properly so called, is to be made.

Returning, then, to the survey of Mr. Bailey; this engineer proposes the line from La Virgin (a port lying to the southeast of Lake Nicaragua in the department of Rivas to San Juan del Sur, (a port of Nicaragua on the Pacific,) a distance of twelve English miles.

This line does, indeed, pass through the narrowest portion of the Isthmus of Nicaragua; but there is an elevation on it, which, at its highest point, is not less than 34 feet above the level of Lake Nicaragua, the latter being 128 feet above the level of the Pacific. It is readily seen that such an elevation would render any excavation, with the lock system, well-nigh impossible, unless by means of a tunnel; and what a vast amount of labor and money would be necessary to dig a tunnel at such a height, for a distance of three miles! This line, therefore, is not to be considered.

In the second place, we find the line proposed by Colonel Childs, in consequence of the survey made by this experienced engineer in the year 1851.

The press of the country has recently directed attention to the labors of this gentleman, reproducing an able letter from Mr. Body to the New York Herald. The remarks therein made concerning this route are, indeed, very judicious.

He proposes that the digging of the canal commence at the river Las Lajas, which empties into Lake Nicaragua, passing through the plain of Jocote to the river Brito, which flows into the Pacific. The length of the cut is nineteen English miles, and its greatest height 46 feet, that is to say, 318 less than the cut proposed by Mr. Bailey, so that this line would really be very easy, so far as the digging of the canal is concerned. But here we find two very serious difficulties, to overcome which a vast amount of money would be required, which would enormously augment the total cost of the work. These difficulties are the two ports in Lake Nicaragua and the Pacific Ocean.

The first, at the mouth of the river Las Lajas, has only from one to five feet of water for a distance of three-quarters of a mile, on a formation of very hard rocks, where it would be necessary to blast by means of mines, with great labor and outlay of money, and on an entirely open coast. The second, the bocana of the river Brito, which flows into the Pacific, presents the same difficulties. Its depth, at high tide, is from nine to eleven feet; at low tide, from three to four, likewise on the formation of living rock. It is, therefore, evident that this line, although it offers many advantages, presents at the same time, difficulties which, if not insurmountable, are at least of such a character as to merit very serious attention. The estimated cost of this line, according to the report of Colonel Childs, is $32,000,000.

In the third place we have to consider the surveys made by Mr. Bailey. It was not believed, for some time, that this gentleman would succeed in accomplishing the object for which he labored so long and so earnestly, so great was the enthusiasm with which his project was embraced by the governments of Nicaragua and Costa Rica. The result of which enthusiasm was the contract of 1858; but we were doomed again to suffer a sad disappointment. The line proposed by Mr. Bailey has fallen, like some others, into almost total oblivion. His opinion is, that the best line is that of the river Sapoá, (which empties into Lake Nicaragua to the south of the port of La Virgen already referred to,) to the bay of Salinas, in the Pacific. The distance from one point to the other is about seventeen miles; its greatest elevation, 360 feet.

In this line we meet, as is seen, with the same difficulties as in that of Mr. Bailey in regard to elevation; there being, moreover, an objection in the port of the lake—the bocana of the Sapoá—which is entirely closed for ten months in the year, which would require a complete artificial port, that it might be rendered serviceable even for vessels of light draught.

Beside the three surveys of which I have just spoken there is a fourth plan, which has never, to my knowledge, become the object of a regular survey. I mean the one of Prince Napoleon.

This project has attracted the attention of the world, more, perhaps, on account of the author than of its real importance and possible realization. It also awakened considerable enthusiasm in Nicaragua, since the prisoner of Ham offered a line crossing the country nearly at its widest extent, would disseminate the benefits of human progress and of incalculable wealth throughout the length and breadth of the land.

But the commerce of the world needs a line presenting, as far as possible, the conditions of facility and economy, and these are by no means offered by the Napoleon project. This commences at the port of San Juan del Norte and the San Juan del Sur, as do all the rest, and, passing through Lake Nicaragua, continues via the Tuxtepec River as far as Lake Managua; and the digging of the canal would commence at that point to the west of this lake, and continue as far as the Frith of Realajo, which forms the port of Corinth, or the Estero Real, which empties into the Bay of Fonseca.

The extent of the digging—properly so called—of both lines, would be from fifty to fifty-two English miles, with a height of 290 feet on the Realajo route, on the Asunción estate, and on the Estero Real route on the Loma Tiesa estate.

As is seen, so extensive an excavation would, in itself, cost much time and not a few millions. Besides this, however, there is an insurmountable difficulty, which renders this line impracticable. I refer to Lake Managua.

This body of water would have to supply both of the cuts to which we have referred, and likewise the Tipitapa River as far as Lake Nicaragua, since it is 28 feet higher than this latter. But the soundings which have been taken at various times in Lake Managua have clearly shown that it does not contain sufficient water to supply even one of the two excavations. This plan is therefore even more impracticable than the others.

The impracticability of the existing projects having been demonstrated, I pass on to speak of the line which, as I stated at the outset, seems to me the only one which is in every respect easy of construction, and which I believe to have been hitherto unknown to the scientific world. It begins at the mouth of the Ochomogo River, to the east of Lake Nicaragua, in $11^{\circ} 20'$ north latitude, and 86° longitude from Greenwich; it crosses this river four miles higher up, passes through the estates San Rafael and Los Camarones, which are the property of Mr. Vicente Quadra, passes through Camarones Creek and enters the Escalante River, the latter flowing into the Pacific at the port of Escalante. The entire extent of this distance is 24 geographical miles. Its greatest height, on the estate Camarones, is 36 feet; that is 10 feet less than the greatest height on the line via the river Las Lajas, proposed by Colonel Childs, which we consider the most practicable of the three which have been proposed through Nicaragua.

In order to show that my examination of this route has been carefully made, I will state, with the greatest exactness, the measurements of the whole line, beginning with the port of San Juan del Norte and extending as far as the port of Escalante.

Before beginning the description of the route of the canal from ocean to ocean, it seems to me necessary to say something with regard to the great body of water called Lake Nicaragua. The chief advantage of the Nicaragua route for a canal is its inexhaustible supply of water precisely at its greatest height. The lake is, on an average, eighteen miles long and twenty-five miles wide; its area is therefore more than two thousand square miles, and it receives all the waters of the rains for more than two hundred miles in length, and for eighty and even a hundred miles in width. In a word, it is the great receptacle of the waters of Central America, and this unquestionable fact clearly points to this as the line for an interoceanic canal. The amount of water discharged by Lake Nicaragua is, on an average, 2,846,340 cubic feet per minute. Supposing the locks to be 200 feet long, 100 wide, and 20 deep, a volume of water is required of 400,000 cubic feet, which for the two sides makes 800,000 cubic feet for each passage of a vessel. These figures prove that the discharge of water from Lake Nicaragua is many times greater than the navigation of the canal would require, supposing four vessels to pass per hour.

EXCAVATION THROUGH THE ISTHMUS.

From the mouth of the Ochomogo River (which empties into Lake Nicaragua) to the port of Escalante, a distance of twenty-four miles, greatest elevation 36 feet.

The entire length of the canal by this route is two hundred and twenty miles, one hundred and ninety-six of which are by water, and twenty-four through the excavation of the isthmus.

The line which I propose is more practicable than any other, for, even in the cut across the isthmus, there is a river, the Ochomogo, which has a good deal of water throughout the year, and the greatest elevation on the line is not above 36 feet, which is less than that of any other that has been proposed.

The port of Zapatera, in Lake Nicaragua, in the driest season, has from 15 to 16 feet of water, forming a magnificent harbor, protected from the north wind by Zapatera

Island, and that of Escalante, in the Pacific, for a distance of 50 varas from the coast, has not less than 45 or 46 feet of water at all times, being protected by very high ground.

I have here set forth as succinctly as possible the result of my long examination of this country.

I hope that experts in these matters and capitalists will give their attention to the plan; my desire that this channel for the commerce of the world may be opened through Nicaragua will then, in all probability, be realized.

PORT OF SAN JUAN DEL NORTE.

This port is at present but one square-mile in extent, and its greatest depth 2 feet. Its mouth, in the Atlantic Ocean, is closed in the summer and open in the winter, its depth being from 9 to 10 feet.

In order to make a regular port for the canal, it would be necessary to make an excavation which would cost not less than four millions of dollars.

The second section of the port of San Juan del Norte, which extends to the Colorado River, is simply a work of excavation.

At the end of this article I will place a statement of the estimated cost of the work as well as of the other works.

BANKS AND BOTTOM OF THE SAN JUAN RIVER.

From the confluence of the Sarapiquí River with the San Juan to the right bank of the river San Carlos the river has high banks and a sandy bottom, except in some places where there are eddies both large and small.

From the confluence of the river San Carlos with the San Juan, to the extremity of the Machuca Rapids, this distance presents very little difficulty, as the channel from 17 to 18 feet deep, with high banks. From the foot of the Machuca Rapids to the head of the rapids of Castillo Viejo, there are many difficulties, but the river is full of hard rocks. This will, therefore, be the most costly portion of the route via the San Juan River. From the head of the rapids of Castillo Viejo to the foot of the Toro Rapids there are no obstacles, the depth being sufficient and the banks high.

The Toro Rapids will require a great deal of labor, because they are half a mile in length, and here the dam is to be made for the purpose of raising Lake Nicaragua.

The head of the rapids require a dam constructed on a large scale, so as to raise not only the river above, but also Lake Nicaragua during prevalence of a drought.

That portion of the San Juan River which extends from the Toro Rapids to the port of San Carlos has low banks and a muddy bed.

Here I might conclude my description of the course of the San Juan River from the port of San Juan del Norte to the port of San Carlos, but it is proper to add a few explanations.

As I have stated, not only is the port of San Juan entirely artificial, but also the whole distance from this port up the San Juan River, even beyond the Colorado River or Punta Gigante. The first distance is twenty miles, and the second twenty-eight miles.

From these places to the entrance of the Sarapiquí River (right bank) the river is pretty wide, shallow, and has many sand-banks.

From the confluence of the Sarapiquí River with the San Juan to the San Carlos River the banks are low and the bottom sandy. There are, moreover, some very large eddies.

From the San Carlos (right bank) to the foot of the Machuca Rapids the river is a natural canal, from 16 to 18 feet deep throughout the year, with high banks.

From the foot of the Machuca Rapids to the head of the Castillo Rapids we have the most costly portion in the whole San Juan River, because the entire bed of the river is formed of hard rocks, it being necessary to cut the great Machuca Rapids, together with those of Las Vallas and del Mico, as far as the Great Castillo Rapids.

The cost of construction between the head of Castillo Rapids and the foot of the Toro Rapids will not be great, the bed of the river being deep and its banks high.

The length of the Toro Rapids is about one-half mile, the bed being formed of hard rocks. At the head of these rapids it will be necessary to construct a very large dam to raise the waters of Lake Nicaragua.

From Toro Rapids to the port of San Carlos the condition of the river is favorable, but it has low banks and a muddy bottom, and is only 18 feet deep.

From the port of San Carlos to Lake Nicaragua the depth of the river is only 5 feet, with a muddy bottom. It is five or six miles before we find sufficient water for any kind of steam or sail vessels.

Across Lake Nicaragua to the island of Zapatera, or rather to the port of Changuin Muerto, we have a line of from 40 to 120 feet in depth.

This is the end of the water line.

DIGGING OF THE CANAL THROUGH THE ISTHMUS.

I now proceed to treat of the most interesting point, which is the digging of the canal through the isthmus. This begins at the port of Zapatera or Charco Muerto, and terminates at the mouth of the Escalante River, in the Pacific.

The length of the land line is twenty-four miles; its greatest height is between Los Camarones and the Ochomogo River, 36 feet above the level of Lake Nicaragua during the rainy season. From Los Camarones a wide creek flows into the Escalante River, which latter empties into the Pacific.

The artificial canal from Lake Nicaragua to the Pacific will require an excavation of ten miles and a half, the greatest elevation being 36 feet.

THE PORT OF ESCALANTE, on the coast, is an open sea, with a depth of from 45 to 46 feet for a distance of thirty varas from land, protected by high grounds to the north and northeast.

The southwest coast enters the sea to an extent of from 150 to 160 varas. On account of these natural circumstances, the construction of a good port for vessels entering the canal would be very easy.

Considering the situation of the Nicaragua Canal, it seems to me necessary to offer a few more explanations.

In my opinion large ports in the Atlantic and Pacific are unnecessary, because Lake Nicaragua is the largest port in the world.

From Punta Ometepe to the Maderas volcano the distance is six miles, the depth of the water being 72 feet. There are, moreover, the islands of Solentiname and Joho, which have ports suitable for any kind of vessels to the south.

Estimate of the cost of construction of the Nicaragua Canal, commencing at San Juan del Norte, via the river San Juan, through Lake Nicaragua, thence across the plain of Ochomogo to the point where the Escalante River flows into the Pacific, including excavation, locks, machinery, buildings, telegraphs, steamers, &c., &c., &c.

In conclusion, I think it highly important to quote some of the observations of Colonel Childs, chief engineer of the American canal in the years 1850 and 1851. This engineer measured the line from San Juan del Norte, on the Atlantic, via the San Juan River, through Lake Nicaragua, and across the isthmus to the port of Brito. The greatest elevation of this portion of the isthmus is only 46 feet above the highest grade of the level of Lake Nicaragua. The surroundings are, generally speaking, level and uniform. Colonel Childs estimates the supply of water necessary for the navigation of the canal, including evaporation, infiltration, and escape at the locks, at 800,000 cubic feet; and this eminent professor demonstrates, by his observations, that the discharge of water from Lake Nicaragua is 2,000,899 cubic feet per minute. These observations were made from the 23d of December, 1850, to the 27th of April, 1851. They were commenced when the lake was three and a half feet above its lowest level, or at about its average height, and they showed that, during that period of about one hundred and twenty-five days, the amount of water was 143,022,600,000 cubic feet in excess of what was required for the navigation of the canal, allowing the passage of three vessels per hour. The great increase of water caused by the autumn rains had diminished by about half when Colonel Childs made his observations. An increase of the lake is small when it does not exceed five or six, or perhaps seven feet. In the case of this inland sea the volume of water increases; from the lowest grade it may be at 400,000,000,000 of cubic feet, without counting the immense quantity which must be discharged from the lake when the increase takes place. The rain, which is the most abundant known in the world, having been repeatedly measured, was 94 inches per annum, or a volume of water 8 feet in depth on a surface four times as great as that of Lake Nicaragua.

Colonel Childs, with his officers, says: "We think ourselves justified in saying that there are no conditions on the continent of America so favorable as those which are offered by Nicaragua;" and this opinion is that of very many men distinguished in science, whose views are found stated in public documents; these drew our attention to this plan, and resulted in the formation of the American company for the construction of the canal, based on the report of the surveys for the canal in 1850 and 1851. This opinion has been before the public for nearly twenty years; it has not been contradicted, but has received the approbation of the engineers appointed by the British government to examine it, likewise that of a committee of topographical engineers of the United States of America, whose opinion was submitted, in 1852, to the President of said States. The committee, in making its report through Colonel Albert and Lieutenant Colonel Turnbull, its members, said, among other things: "We think that the plan proposed by Mr. Childs is practicable, since there is a large supply of water in the lake itself, without counting the other supplies which exist below its level, and that there is no other route so well provided with water; and that the outlay of money and labor estimated by Mr. Childs would be sufficient for the accomplishment of the work." The great interest which we have in the Nicaragua route has rendered plans for the discovery of new lines of communication between the two oceans so important to us, and they should receive our serious consideration; but we must be clear, as the result of twenty years' attention to this matter, that, so far as we judge, no passage has been discovered that was not known to the ancient Spaniards, and other exploring expeditions, whence it may be reasonably inferred that no other route will be discovered.

The country bordering on the entire route of the Nicaragua canal is healthy, and rendered comparatively temperate by the constant breezes; its beauty is proved, and nature has provided it with abundant means of subsistence in cattle and other products, mines, timber, &c.

It cannot be doubted that these must interest the commerce of the world, and particularly the Government of the United States, which has recently sent exploring expeditions to different parts of this continent, at great expense, but without having yet obtained any result. We earnestly hope that the Government and people of the United States of America will direct their attention to the sure and important route of an interoceanic canal through Nicaragua; if this has not yet been finally decided to be the only practicable one, it is undoubtedly because very powerful private interests have been arrayed against it. The Nicaragua route, however, has nature in its favor, which seems to have prepared for human intelligence the only way possible in order to unite the two largest bodies of water in the universe, and nature will triumph.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,

Leon, July 3, 1871. (Received July 31.

SIR: I have the honor of submitting to you inclosed copies of two notes exchanged between the Nicaraguan government and myself upon certain orders issued by President Quadra to the military governor of this city, to join in the celebration of the 4th July. I was the more agreeably surprised by the president's attention, as I had left him but the day previous without the least intimation on his part upon the subject, and as I could not help contrasting his frank and cordial course with the ungracious and sullen one of his predecessor on the same occasion last year.

During my recent stay at Managua, the friendly relations between Mr. Quadra and myself, so happily inaugurated at the time of his taking possession of the presidential chair, as reported to you in my dispatch No. 71, of March 8 last, and which, since then, had been cultivated by a frequent exchange of private letters upon topics of vital importance to the republic, matured into a genuine friendship, so that I cheerfully complied with his request, after finishing the business that called me there, to remain a day longer, and to give him my views on several highly interesting measures and bills the administration is preparing.

* * * * *

I found during my recent intercourse with President Quadra, to my great satisfaction, that the characterization I ventured of him prior is perfectly correct, except, perhaps, that he is possessed of a higher degree of "pluck" and of more liberal and enlarged ideas than I gave him credit for then. As the measure of his administration he seems to consider the securing of the interoceanic canal across the republic, and by American enterprise. Being the only true republican I have as yet been able to unearth in this "republic," he is a sincere and enlightened admirer and friend of our country—wide awake as to the future of the North American continent down to the Isthmus of Panama, and therefore, from the very best reasons, anxious that the canal, upon which he looks as the sole panacea for all the evils of his country, should be carried out and held by the people of the United States.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
C. N. RIOTTE.

[Translation.]

His excellency the President has yesterday, through the proper minister, dispatched his orders to the military governor of that department that the ensuing 4th of July, the anniversary of the Independence of the United States of North America, be celebrated with all possible demonstrations of the enthusiasm wherewith the government and people of Nicaragua look upon that happy event.

His excellency, moreover, trusting that your excellency will condescend to accept the sincere though feeble demonstration of the esteem and high consideration he entertains for your excellency, has ordered me to inform your excellency of those orders by communicating to you a certified copy thereof, which I have the honor to inclose.

[Translation.]

This day I am telling the military governor of Leon this: The ensuing 4th of July is the anniversary of the Independence of the United States of North America; of that glorious event which forms an epoch in the history of the onward march of democracy on the road of both social and political improvements, and which, as its peculiar consequence, effected the emancipation of the Spanish-American republics on this continent. Thus, Nicaragua, one of them, ought not to remain indifferent at such welcome memento, and ought, on her part, join in solemnizing that august incident. These considerations, together with the ties now binding the government of the country with that of the model republic, prompted his excellency the President to direct that in your city, the residence of the very worthy minister plenipotentiary of that republic, on said anniversary shall be celebrated by saluting the North American flag, at the time of its raising over the house of said minister, with a triple salute; by hoisting that of Nicaragua to full mast in the principal quarters; and that you, accompanied by the military body, pay a visit to the honorable representative of the United States of North America; all that, to demonstrate the esteem, consideration, and respect wherewith the nation honors the great people which, on the soil of the New World, planted popular and representative political institutions.

I tell you this, by supreme order, for your intelligence and observance.

UNITED STATES LEGATION IN NICARAGUA,

Leon, June 30, 1871.

Hon. DON FRANCISCO BALLADARES, &c., &c.

I have been honored with the receipt of the very gracious note of the 28th instant with inclosure, informing me of the orders issued by his excellency the President of the republic, to the military governor of this department, to participate in the ensuing celebration of the anniversary of the glorious national birthday of the great American commonwealth. I beg to assure you, Mr. Minister, and through your friendly mediation his excellency the distinguished chief magistrate of the republic, that I shall most cordially accept those spontaneous demonstrations of good will and sympathy for my country by the government and authorities of this our sister nation, and more so, as I am firmly persuaded that they are imbued with a spirit of genuine and unreserved sincerity. I shall be most happy to inform my Government of the sympathetic acts of yours, and of the elevated and truly American ideas expressed by you on this occasion, equally honorable to the giver and to the recipient.

I don't know whether it is proper, in connection with so grand a subject, to speak of me personally, yet, since his excellency the President, and you, Mr. Minister, have so kindly mentioned me in a manner more flattering than deserved, it may not appear presumptuous in me if I beg you to accept for yourself, and also to convey to his excellency, the expression of my sincere gratitude.

I have the honor, &c., &c.,

UNITED STATES LEGATION,

Leon, August 16, 1871. (Received September 18.)

SIR: * * * * *

I had the satisfaction of making President Granados' personal acquaintance, and conversing with him at a private entertainment given to him at Antigua, and, two days after, at his residence. On the first occasion, during the two hours of my attendance, he spoke with me almost exclusively. Nothing could surpass the fine tact, and, at the same time, exquisite cordiality wherewith he received and treated me. He quite unreservedly detailed his political plans, attentively listened to my observations, and candidly asked my opinion on several subjects. His intention is, by virtue of the dictatorial powers vested in him, and previous to convening a constitutional assembly, "to lay by several laws the foundations for a truly constituent government, so broad and deep that they could not be eradicated any more." Among these laws, quite a number of which he enumerated, he accentuated as of special importance the electoral one. He explained that the Indians composing almost nine-tenths of the entire population, and in every sense far below even our southern "field-hands," and more in the grasp of the clergy than our slaves ever were in that of their masters, furnished the large majority of representatives; of course, priests or their bondsmen, while the intelligent classes and property-holders were in a small minority. The late government ruled by that majority. This state of affairs President Granados proposes to change principally by lessening the number of representatives from the Indian districts, and increasing that of the educated classes and property-owners. He will not—he said with emphasis—soon call a constituent assembly, that being by the plebiscite, (i. e. a declaration of the army, issued at Tatzasea, and afterwards confirmed by manifests of the various municipalities,) altogether left to him to do “cuando las circunstancias lo permitan,” (when circumstances will permit;) he had not the least apprehension of a reactionary movement from the partisans of the old government, but some of the extremists, whose views and words were now violent in proportion to the long oppression they had been subject to.

President Granados, I am happy to say, is by far the best and most universally instructed person I have met with in Central America. He passed his youth in a Philadelphia college, (a very interesting sketch of John Quincy Adams's election was one of the features of his communications;) afterwards resided for years in Europe and Mexico, and for twenty years was the only member in the Guatemala congress that dared to oppose Carrera's arbitrary rule, which secured him lodgings in Fort San Felipe. He is well versed both in the literature and history of the United States and of the principal European countries. His views, though moderate, are liberal and decided. He sees very plainly that the great incubus of his country is the clergy, and the Jesuits in particular, and he will not spare them if occasion offers, yet he will be very cautious in his course toward them.

The unexpected and complete triumph of the liberal cause in Central America has filled the hearts of all thinking people with a full sense of their deplorable situation and an ardent desire of establishing now some sort of a union among the five republics. President Medina, on the part of Honduras, moved first in the matter, and it is now proposed to send envoys to the city of Salvador to confer upon it. Several republics have already dispatched theirs, and there is no doubt that the others will follow in due time. Some days ago the above-mentioned minister Uriarte, who is in intimate relations with Presidents Medina, Quadra, and Granados, in passing through this city on his way to Honduras, called on me, and in the course of conversation, wherein he communicated to me much valuable information on Central American affairs and leaders, mentioned that, in order to prevent jealousies among the envoys on the presidency of the conference, and also to take advantage of his experience, he would propose that the conference be presided over by one of the United States ministers in Central America, and asked whether I would be disposed to act in that capacity if the offer was made to me. I replied that my resolution would depend on the conditions under which the offer would be made, and upon the consent of my Government.

The ideas on the ways and means to establish, as well as on the form of the union, are, of course, as yet very divergent.

The Honduras press advocates a perfect and full union between that State and Salvador, as a point of crystallization for the other three republics. Mr. Uriarte, in a pamphlet, considers a federation, as proven fifty years ago, altogether out of question, and proposes instead:

1. A rather vague “true and unalterable fraternity between the five republics,” together with the more tangible form of a defensive and offensive alliance against foreign aggression.

2. A formal pact in no case and under no pretext whatever to wage war against each other, with regulations how to settle all differences between one or more of the republics.

3. As a consequence hereof the establishing of a Central American congress or Diet, with power to act as arbitrator.

4. A pledge by all governments to make the decisions of the Diet respected and executed with all means, (con todos sus recursos asi morales como materiales.)

5. Free trade between the republics for all natural and industrial productions.

6. Unification of university degrees and military grades, of coins, weights, and measures.

7. Extradition of criminals, &c., &c.

It cannot be denied that here the germs are presented for a practical and working union and a peaceable and prosperous future of these countries, but I fear there is too much of good things asked for at once.

The question will be whether there will be found wisdom enough in the councils at the outset to make the sacrifices in the independence and sovereignty of the several republics as slight and imperceptible, as reconcilable with the end to be attained, and, on the other hand, whether there will be sufficient forbearance and good sense among the state governments and peoples to honestly submit to those sacrifices and their inevitable consequences.

I am not over-sanguine on either point, but I am persuaded that proposition No. 5, as an initiatory measure, could be carried out, and would, in the course of a few years, form a solid basis for carefully considered further steps in the direction of unification. As authority for my belief I point to the German Zollverein and its result.

*Leon, August 20, 1871. While copying this dispatch I received the Salvador "Boletin Oficial" of the 3d instant, which contains some important facts relative to the union movement, and which I take the liberty of communicating to you, since at present there is no diplomatic or consular representative of the United States in Salvador.

On July 29, Mr. Francisco Alvarado, envoy extraordinary of Honduras to Salvador, for the purpose of submitting to that government the proposition to consolidate the two states into one, was received by President Gonzales. The speeches of the occasion are too lengthy for translation. Mr. Alvarado's language is very plain and to the point; that of Mr. Gonzales a little more guarded, yet favorable to the plan.

Two days after, Mr. Alvarado delivered a very exhaustive note to the Salvador government on the project, wherein he stated the propositions of his government in detail, as you will perceive from the inclosure.

I have, &c.,

C. N. RIOTTE.

[Translation.]

In that conviction the Honduras government proposes to that of Salvador :

First. To form of the two states one sole republic, with the capital at La Union or Amapala.

Second. As an indispensable consequence, the formation of one national hacienda (treasury,) composed of the revenues of both republics; commonness of active and passive debts; ownership of the Honduras interoceanic railroad; of all others that might be built in either country; of their high and tram-roads; of their ports, warehouses, machines, &c., on either ocean. Centralization of armaments and war materials of both states under authority of the general government to be established.

Third. Convocation of a constituent assembly, to be composed of an equal number of representatives from each state, to frame the constitution of the republic upon the basis of true Americanism.

Fourth. Solemn compromise by the two governments to publish and make that constitution effective immediately upon its emanation, and, in accordance with an electoral law, also to be framed by the same assembly in the name of the nation, to create the general authorities.

Fifth. As soon as the general power be organized, all public powers in both states are to disappear absolutely.

I beg the citizen President of the republic to deign to bestow his high consideration to the bases presented in behalf of the government of Honduras; and in case it was not within his attributes to concede them, to submit them to the national congress, which, fortunately, is assembled, to establish the future of the country.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, October 7, 1871.

SIR: Your dispatch No. 85, of the 16th of August last, has been received. The account which it gives of Central American politics is full and interesting. The reunion of the five states in a confederation likely to be more lasting than the former one has always been regarded by us as desirable, not only for the internal prosperity of that region, but for convenience and efficiency in the management of its foreign affairs. The dissolution of the first confederacy was always regarded by us as adverse to the well-being of the respective members and of their inhabitants. Possibly it might have been prevented, if the United States had had at the time a qualified diplomatic agent in that country. Soon after the dissolution took place, the Mosquito question obtained a prominence in the relations of Nicaragua, especially with other powers, which might have been avoided, if the confederation had continued. That question gave us much trouble for several years; and though ultimately settled definitively, as was supposed, other questions resulting from it occasionally threaten inconvenience.

It may be regarded as premature to express an opinion as to the expediency of your accepting the presidency of a congress for the restoration of the Union. If the desire for a new confederacy should become general and unmistakable, and the meeting of a full representation of agents for the purpose, certain instructions upon the subject will then be given to you, if the original invitation should be still in force, or should be repeated.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, October 7, 1871.

SIR: Your dispatch No. 88, of the 3d ultimo, has been received. The Department learns from it, with regret, of the determination of the President of Nicaragua to insist upon a stipulation providing for injuries claimed by citizens of that republic to have been sustained by the burning of Granada and the bombardment of Greytown, in any convention upon the subject of claims. As it must be known that no such stipulation is admissible on our part, the decision of that government may be regarded as a denial of justice to such of our citizens as have suffered from acts of authorities of Nicaragua. No officer of the United States has, it is believed, been charged with participation in the burning of Granada, and we are not aware that it is pretended that that act was incited or has ever been sanctioned by this Government. If persons claiming to be citizens of the United States were implicated, they were liable to punishment according to the laws of Nicaragua, but it seems frivolous to assert that this government is in any way accountable for their deeds.

This government has made no reparation for the loss of property by the bombardment of Greytown. Citizens of the United States were probably proprietors there of far greater values than citizens of Nicaragua. Subjects of several principal European governments were also losers by the bombardment to large amounts. Application in their behalf for indemnification have uniformly been refused. The bombardment was justifiable and necessary. The persons claiming to be in authority there are alone to blame for it, and the sufferers should only deprecate their misfortune in having confided the safety of their property to such characters.

You intimate that the government of Nicaragua purposes on these points to appeal directly to this government. Such an appeal, however, while the United States have a minister accredited to them, would be irregular and even disrespectful. It could not be expected to change the result, and its only apparent object would be further to protract a negotiation which has already been kept too long in suspense for the good of the relations between the two republics.

I am, &c.,

HAMILTON FISH.

P. S.—You may read this instruction to the minister for foreign affairs of Nicaragua, and, if requested, leave a copy with him.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,
San Salvador, February 20, 1871. (Received March 16.)

SIR: In view of the existing state of affairs between this republic and that of Honduras, I have this day addressed to the minister of foreign affairs for this government a dispatch in relation to the United States guaranteeing the strict neutrality of the Honduras interoceanic railroad.

A copy of said dispatch (marked A) is herewith inclosed; the inclosures (marked B and C) mentioned in said dispatch are the same as sent to the Department with legation dispatch No. 32, of February 19.

I am, &c.,

ALFRED T. A. TORBERT.

A.

San Salvador, February 20, 1871.

SIR: In view of the present state of affairs between this republic and that of Honduras, it is my duty to call the attention of this government to the following extract of a treaty celebrated between the United States of America and the republic of Honduras, July 4, 1864, in relation to the Honduras Inter-oceanic Railroad Company, viz:

"2. In consideration of these concessions, in order to secure the construction and permanence of the route or road herein contemplated, and also to secure, for the benefit of mankind, the uninterrupted advantages of such communication from sea to sea, the United States recognizes the rights of sovereignty and property of Honduras in and over the line of said road, and for the same reason guarantees positively and efficaciously the entire neutrality of the same," &c., &c.

In consideration of the very positive language and obligations of the above, I must ask that in case of an invasion of Honduras by Salvador, that such orders be given and such a policy pursued as will not involve this government in any difficulty with the United States.

I inclose a copy of my dispatch (marked C) to the minister of foreign relations in Honduras on the same subject, also a copy of a dispatch (marked B) sent by said minister to the United States minister resident in Honduras.

With much pleasure I reiterate to the honorable Sr. Doctor Arbizu the assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

United States Minister.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith a translation copy (marked 1) of a dispatch just received from the minister of foreign relations for Salvador, in answer to mine, (marked A,) forwarded with legation dispatch No. 34, in regard to the United States having guaranteed the neutrality of the Honduras inter-oceanic railway.

In this connection it is not out of place to say that I am pretty well assured that both Salvador and Guatemala do not favor the construction of said railroad, as they fear an increase of emigration to Central America, and for this reason, under the present state of affairs, I fear that the work may be interfered with, notwithstanding the guaranteed neutrality of said road by the United States and England, if neither power has a man-of-war here to enforce said guarantee.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN RELATIONS OF SALVADOR,
San Salvador, February 22, 1871.

SIR: I have communicated to his excellency the President of the republic the contents of your Excellency's dispatch of the 20th instant, accompanying copies of the note addressed by your legation to the department of foreign relations of the supreme government of Honduras, and of the one from the latter to the honorable minister resident of the United States in that republic, with reference to the neutrality of the Honduras railroad route, stipulated by the United States in the fourteenth article of the treaty entered into between that Government and that of Honduras on the 4th of July, 1854.

Your excellency, in view of the positive terms in which the said article is worded, calls upon this government to adopt, in the event of an invasion of the territory of Honduras by Salvador military forces, such measures as shall avoid any difficulty that, in consequence of the neutrality referred to, might occur between your Excellency's government and that of this republic.

His Excellency the President, being duly advised, has directed me to reply thereto, assuring your Excellency, on his part, that should the extreme case arrive of having to invade the territory of Honduras, the requisite orders will be issued to the forces of this republic to respect the neutrality of the railroad route, provided there is a due reciprocity on the part of the government of Honduras, the latter not to make use of any portion of said territory for military operations against this government.

This is the answer I have to return to your Excellency's note above mentioned, it being at the same time very satisfactory to me to avail myself of this occasion to subscribe myself as your very attentive and obedient servant.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith translation copies (Nos. 1, 2, and 3) of communications just received from the minister of foreign affairs of Honduras.

It seems by No. 1 that the fears expressed in my State Department dispatch No. 35 have been already realized.

Also inclosed please find my dispatch (marked 4) to this government in regard to the attack on the railroad guards.

As yet there has been no formal declaration of war, although this government is ready and, I believe, disposed to invade Honduras, and only awaits the result of a conference of commissioners from the different Central American States, which meets at Amapala in a few days to try and arrange matters.

I inclose two newspapers of Honduras and one of Salvador, treating of the questions in dispute between the two states.

REPUBLIC OF HONDURAS,
DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Comayagua, February 25, 1871.

SIR: On the 21st instant, between the hours of 10 and 11 p. m., a Salvadorean force, commanded by Don Domingo Vasquez, has crossed the boundary line of the two republics, surprised and attacked, at a town of Honduras named Goascoran, a detachment of thirty men that were employed in guarding the works of the railway, and did not therefore belong to the regular forces of this government.

This manifest violation of the Honduras soil and the sudden and unexpected surprise of a small police force, without a declaration of war being previously made, but on the contrary, all hostilities being prohibited inasmuch as both Salvador and Honduras had accepted the mediations of Nicaragua and Guatemala to bring about a friendly settlement, clearly prove that Honduras is not the aggressor.

And when this government was relying on the assurance given me by you in the note of the 2d instant, "that the officers in command of the forces that are being organized in this republic have very strict orders not to commit nor permit to be committed any hostile act against that republic, and that my government has perfect confidence in the exact fulfillment of those orders," the territory of Honduras is invaded and the invading force marches into the heart of the department of Choluteca.

The whole world will see, Mr. Minister, how well founded were the fears of aggression felt and expressed by the government of Honduras, as arising from the want of good faith on the part of the government of Salvador in the fulfillment of its obligations. My government thereupon reiterates its protest, and throws upon the government of Salvador all the responsibility for the consequences that may occur from the unjust war brought upon us by the latter.

After which, I have to declare to you, for the information of that supreme government, that the neutrality of the railroad route being guaranteed by the great powers, the United States of the North and Great Britain, not only against any interruption of the works, but also to secure the engineers and laborers, and to preserve all the interests applied to that undertaking, it is not allowed to the military forces of Salvador to trespass upon nor occupy any point on the line of the said railroad, from the town of Amapala to that of Puerto Cortes, without your government incurring the responsibility of the dispersion of the workmen and the consequent stoppage of the works, of the damages and injuries accruing to the engineers and their agents, and the detriments and losses that the undertaking may sustain.

And to avoid all pretexts for attack, occupation, or trespass of any nature upon any point of the railroad line, I have likewise to declare to you that requisite orders are given to the effect that the regular garrisons and the military detachments employed in guarding the works of the railroad from Amapala to Puerto Cortes be reduced to the ordinary number, and be solely charged with the duty of preserving order in the interior; and moreover, that the government of Honduras will not make use, as a base for military operations to repel the unjust aggression of the Salvador government, of any of the points on the line, and much less of those where the works are organized.

All of which I say to you by order of his Excellency the President of Honduras, for the information of his Excellency the President of Salvador, and have the honor of tendering to you my respects and considerations.

FRANCISCO ALVARADO.

REPUBLIC OF HONDURAS, DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Comayagua, February 25, 1871.

SIR: It is highly honorable, as well as satisfactory, to the undersigned minister of foreign relations of Honduras to address the very honorable minister resident of the United States at Salvador, for the purpose of tendering the thanks of his government for the noble and generous offer that he had the kindness to make in his esteemed note, dated the 18th instant, of his good offices whenever the authorities of Honduras may be in need of them, and of the laudable wishes he entertains for the prosperity and happiness of this country.

The undersigned begs leave to state to the very Honorable General Torbert that the government of Honduras accepts with pleasure his noble offer, and will make use of it upon all occasions.

The undersigned hopes that the very Honorable General Torbert will, in his turn, accept the tender of services which, in the name of the Honduras government, is herein made to him, as the worthy representative of the great American nation with whose Government that of Honduras is bound by the strongest sympathies of a most sincere friendship.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion for tendering to the honorable minister resident of the United States at Salvador his respects and high considerations.

REPUBLIC OF HONDURAS, DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Comayagua, February 25, 1871.

SIR: The undersigned, minister of foreign relations of the government of Honduras, has the honor to acknowledge the reception of the dispatch which the honorable minister resident of the United States at Salvador was pleased to address him on the 18th instant, and at the same time takes the liberty to accompany herewith an authenticated copy of the communication written by him on this day to the department of foreign relations of that republic, making known to it that the military forces of Salvador are not to trespass upon, occupy, or attack any portion of the railroad line from Amapala to Puerto Cortes, the neutrality of said route being guaranteed by the great powers, the United States of North America, and Great Britain, and declaring that Honduras will not make use of any point thereof as a base for military operations.

The undersigned deems it expedient to call the Hon. Mr. Torbert's attention to the sudden aggression by the Salvadorean forces who have invaded the Honduras territory, when this government expected that no act of hostility would be committed, as there had been no declaration of war, and the mediation of Nicaragua and Guatemala had been accepted.

It is possible that this government may have to call upon all the citizens of Honduras to take up arms for the defense of their country just unjustly attacked, and in that event be obliged to use the laborers employed upon the railway. All detriments that such an extreme measure may cause to the undertaking aforesaid must fall upon the Salvadorean government, who is the party responsible therefor, having undertaken, without the formalities prescribed by the international law positive of these states, an unjustifiable war against Honduras.

The undersigned communicates the above facts to the honorable minister resident of the United States at Salvador for his information, by order of his excellency the President of this republic, and in doing so has the honor of again tendering to him his respects and high considerations.

FRANCISCO ALVARADO.

Hon. General ALFRED T. A. TORBERT,
Minister Resident of the United States at Salvador.

No. 4.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,
San Salvador, March 5, 1871.

SIR: I am in receipt of a communication dated February 25, from the minister of foreign relations for Honduras, complaining that the government of Salvador has not respected the neutrality of the railroad now under construction in that state, inasmuch as Don Domingo Varquez, in command of a Salvadorean force, on the 21st of February invaded Honduras, attacked and drove from the town of Goascoran, on the line of said railroad, a picket of thirty men who were stationed there solely to protect the engineers and workmen of said road from molestation in Honduras, and not to guard them against raids from Salvador, and that said picket was not a part of the regular forces of Honduras.

In view of these statements of the minister of Honduras and your letter of February 22 to me on the subject of the neutrality of the railroad, I hope you will favor me with an explanation of the attack of Sr. Varquez, and I am led to believe, from a conversation to-day with a member of the Salvadorean cabinet, that the responsibility of the first violation of the neutrality of the line of the said railroad will be thrown upon Honduras by the invasion of Salvador before the 20th of February by General Ochoa from Goascoran, on the line of said railroad.

But for the better information of my government it is necessary to have the explanation in writing.

Sincerely hoping that all difficulties may be avoided in regard to this neutrality, and ever praying for the peace and prosperity of Salvador, I remain, &c.,

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN RELATIONS OF SALVADOR,
San Salvador, March 6, 1871.

SIR: Your excellency will become informed by the copy of a communication from the general-in-chief of the expeditionary army of Salvador, which I have the honor to accompany herewith, of the acts of manifest hostility that have been commenced at the port of Amapala, notwithstanding the neutrality of said port, and of all the line of the Honduras Railway stipulated in the fourteenth article of the treaty entered into between the United States and Honduras on the 4th of July, 1864.

As I stated to your excellency in my note of the 22d ultimo, my government at once and cheerfully accepts and will respect the neutrality of that territory on condition that the government of Honduras extends a due reciprocity, not making use of any portion of the railroad route for military operations against this republic. Otherwise, the government of Salvador, which cannot forego any means of defense to preserve its rights intact, would be compelled to repulse and fight the enemy wherever he may be, even though he may be found on the territory guaranteed as neutral, which, being under the control of the hostile government, ought not to be looked upon as such.

To avoid, then, any ulterior reclamations that might come from your excellency's government, the President has directed me to urge upon you, in the name of this government, to employ, if you deem it proper, your offices with the government of Honduras, and obtain from its part an equal effect for the stipulated neutrality, without which this would degenerate into an odious privilege that Salvador neither could nor should recognize.

My government entertains the assurance that your excellency, in view of the foregoing observations, will render due justice to it, inasmuch as it has paid all deference to your excellency's mediation; and with the request that you will be pleased to make known to me the result of your efforts to this effect, I take pleasure in renewing to the honorable minister resident the assurances of my most respectful consideration.

SIR: The government of Honduras has declared neutral the port of Amapala, and the same has been perhaps done by the powers that guarantee the railroad of that republic; but, sir, it is well known that the government of Honduras and its employes respect neither treaties nor obligations, nor the law of nations; of this they have given many proofs, and are now giving still one more, which is that of sending out of the port of Amapala armed vessels to capture all vessels coming from the minor ports of Nicaragua to La Union, a port of this republic. Out of one of these captured vessels they have taken the lieutenant, Dr. Jose Maria Ballecillos, who was bound to this republic and in my service. Ballecillos is there treated as a prisoner of war, and those who had charge of the vessel were also very ill-treated.

I beg of you, Mr. Minister, to lay this before his excellency the President, that he may decide what course the officers in command of the expeditionary forces going to Honduras are to pursue, because it is a very serious inconvenience to the Salvadoran forces that those of Honduras be permitted to do all the harm they can, at the same time that the Salvadoreans observe a strict neutrality.

Be pleased, Mr. Minister, to advise me of the President's resolution, and to accept the considerations, &c., &c.

TOMAS MARTINEZ

The Hon. MINISTER OF FOREIGN RELATIONS.

No. 3.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,
San Salvador, March 6, 1871.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt on the 5th instant of your excellency's communication dated the 6th, in regard to the neutrality of the Honduras Railroad, and inclosing a copy of a letter dated the 4th instant, addressed by Thomas Martinez, general-in-chief of the expeditionary army of Salvador, to his government on the same subject.

In your dispatch you remark, viz: "To avoid, then, any ulterior reclamations that might come from your government, the President has directed me to urge upon you the name of this government to employ, if you deem it proper, your good offices with the government of Honduras, and obtain from its part an equal effect for the stipulated neutrality," &c. To this end, if you will refer to my dispatch of February 20, and to the accompanying letter (marked C) to the minister of foreign relations for Honduras you will see that I have anticipated the desires of his excellency the President. Moreover, I am pleased to inform you that I am in receipt of a copy of a letter dated February 25 from the minister of Honduras, answering my requests, and he informs me that to have been furnished with the same dispatch. In said dispatch occurs the following, viz: "And to avoid all pretext for attack, occupation, or trespass of any nature on any point of the railroad line, I have to declare to you that requisite orders are given to the effect that the regular garrisons and the military detachments employed in guarding the works of the railroad from Amapala to Puerto Cortes be reduced to an ordinary number, and be solely charged with the duty of preserving order in the interior and moreover that the government of Honduras will not make use of, as a base for military operations to repel the unjust aggressions of the Salvador government, any of the points on the line, and much less of those where the works are organized."

As the matter stands, if both Salvador and Honduras adhere faithfully to their promises there will be no trouble in regard to the neutrality of said railroad line.

In regard to the communication of General Martinez he says, viz: "The government of Honduras has declared neutral the port of Amapala, and the same being performed by the powers that guarantee the railroad of that republic;" and I would say that the United States recognizes the rights of sovereignty and property of Honduras in and over the line of the railroad from Amapala to Puerto Cortes, and guarantees the entire neutrality of the same for certain purposes and on certain conditions. As for this guarantee Honduras has agreed, at my suggestion, that the port of Amapala and the line of the railroad shall sustain a neutral attitude in case of war between that state and Salvador.

It is not my place to comment on the very sweeping denunciation of General Martinez on the faithlessness of Honduras in fulfilling her treaty and international obligations; but the case as he represents it, viz: "Honduras sending out of the port of Amapala armed vessels to capture all vessels coming from the minor ports of Nicaragua to La Union in Salvador," seems to me to be a question to be settled between Honduras and Nicaragua. And as to the particular case of Lieutenant Ballecillos referred to, I cannot give a positive opinion without hearing from the government of Honduras. Moreover the general states that the lieutenant was on his way to this republic and in my service and not that of Salvador. At present, however, it appears to me to have been an unlawful act, and I will ask an explanation and request that he be released. In this connection it is not out of place to remark that it appears that Honduras has cut all treaty relations and communications with Salvador, whether wisely or not, as she is the only judge, and if she will not allow any communication through her waters to Salvador, international right and usage will give her complete control of her maritime territory and a marine league along all the coasts of the state.

Within these limits her rights of property and territorial jurisdiction are absolute and exclude those of any other nation. Nor are these rights abridged by the United States guaranteeing the neutrality of a line of railroad from ocean to ocean, but she still retains the right to guard her coast to prevent intrusions, to warn off, &c. ; but, without a declaration of war, I do not believe she is justified in making arrests like the case referred to. And in case of war with Salvador, Honduras should not, (in view of the said neutrality,) and she says she will not, use this port, nor any part of the line of the railroad to make aggressions on the territory of Salvador.

SIR: Your dispatches, Nos. 32 and 34, of the 19th and 20th ultimo respectively, have been received. In reply to your inquiry as to the extent of the obligation assumed by this Government in the fourteenth article of its treaty with Honduras of 1864, relative to the guarantee of a railway across that republic, I have to state that it has always been understood here that that obligation does not attach until the completion of that work. The guarantee was given as a consideration for certain advantages which, as they cannot be enjoyed until the road shall have been finished, this Government cannot until then properly be called upon to repel an invasion of the route from abroad.

REPUBLIC OF HONDURAS, DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Comayagua, March 24, 1871.

SIR: The government has learned to-day that a Salvadorean division, commanded by General Miranda, invaded the territory of this state on the 22d instant by the place called Goascoran, and that a part of the force had occupied the said place and the other had proceeded toward the town of Langue.

As it is quite possible that the expedition may come upon this capital, which is one of the most important on the railroad route, the superintending engineers of the works having their offices therein, and as the government, by reason of its being a neutral point, could not and should not make use of it as a "point d'appui" for military operations, I hereby declare to you, in the name of my government, that in the event of the Salvador forces making the attempt to occupy this capital, all the inhabitants, both permanent and transient, together with their interests, will remain under the protection of the great powers who have guaranteed the neutrality of the Honduras Railroad line, one of which powers is the great American republic that you honorably represent in that country.

The government therefore trusts that you will be pleased to adopt the necessary measures to prevent any attack against this city and the other towns on the railroad route, inasmuch as there is no reason whatever for their being occupied or molested by the enemies of Honduras. By order of the government I write you this communication, hoping that you will furnish me with a timely answer thereto, and accept my respects and consideration.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN RELATIONS OF SALVADOR,
National Palace, San Salvador, April 4, 1871.

SIR: This department has received your excellency's note of the 3d instant, together with the accompanying copy of the communication which was addressed to your excellency by the department of foreign affairs of Honduras, claiming the neutrality of Comayagua as one of the most important points of the railroad line, that government having been advised that a Salvadorean division had invaded the soil of Honduras by Goascoran. As I had the honor of stating to your excellency in my official letter of the 22d of February last, the government of Salvador, in recognition of the neutrality of the railway, promised to your excellency to issue all the necessary orders to have the said neutrality duly respected in the event of an invasion by forces of this republic. To this effect I have the pleasure of giving your excellency the assurance that at the proper time the requisite orders for this purpose were given to General Don Florencio Xatruch, chief of the expeditionary army, who has, besides, advised my government of his having come to an understanding, at the town of Nacaome, with the engineers of the railroad, in order to proceed with greater certainty in his military operations, without any violation of the neutrality.

For these reasons his excellency the President, on being informed of the contents of the note from the Honduras foreign office, a copy of which your excellency has been pleased to furnish me with, has directed me to again signify to your excellency the recognition that this government has made of the neutrality of all the railroad route, in which sense the proper orders have been given and will be repeated.

In fulfilling the grateful duty of apprising your excellency of this in answer to your note above referred to, it affords me much pleasure to renew to you the assurances of my particular esteem and consideration.

SIR: Your dispatch No. 37, of the 7th ultimo, has been received. It is noticed that in your note to the minister for foreign affairs of Salvador of the 6th ultimo, a copy of which accompanies that dispatch, you state unqualifiedly that this Government guarantees the neutrality of the railway which has been commenced across Honduras between the two oceans. The instruction to you of the 20th ultimo, which you will have received before this reaches you, does not confirm that opinion. Still it is not deemed necessary that, for the present at least, you should address any note to the Salvadorian minister for foreign affairs correcting or qualifying the opinion upon the subject which you had already expressed.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN RELATIONS OF SALVADOR,
San Salvador, April 20, 1871

MR. MINISTER: My government is informed that the ex-president of the republic, Dr. Don Francisco Dueñas, is now living in the house of the legation which is under your excellency's charge. The presence of Señor Dueñas in your excellency's residence necessarily brings to you inconvenience and annoyances, which the government wishes to save you, by leaving you the free use of all its dependencies and removing the guard that surrounds the house with the object, mainly, that the same may not be assaulted, nor Señor Dueñas insulted by some individuals of the people who are highly incensed against him.

The government, moreover, must keep Señor Dueñas in safe custody for his own personal security, and because, pursuant to our legislation, he must be subjected to a trial.

Upon these considerations my government has decided to transfer Señor Dueñas to a house that is to serve for him as a place of detention pending the trial aforesaid, and to effect the same, desires and expects that your excellency will be pleased to express your acquiescence to the measure indicated.

The honorable minister of the United States must rely upon the formal assurance which the government gives him by these presents, that the life of Señor Dueñas will be respected as far as it may be in its power to avoid any attempt against the same, and equally, upon any event, that he will be kept in custody without causing him unnecessary annoyance.

I request of your excellency to be pleased to give me a reply as early as possible upon the subject, and to accept anew the assurances of my high esteem and consideration.

SIR: The undersigned, minister resident of the United States of America near the government of Salvador, has had the honor to receive the polite communication of this date which the minister of foreign affairs for the republic was pleased to direct to him, claiming the delivery of the person, ex-president Señor Dr. Don Francisco Dueñas, who is now living under the protection of this legation.

In virtue of the reasons adduced in said note, and on account of the solemn guarantee of the supreme government, (and the personal assurance given him by the President himself,) that in no case will Señor Dueñas's life be forfeited, he has the honor to reply to Señor Dr. Arbizu, minister, &c., for the information of his government, that he accepts the guarantee and is ready to deliver the person of ex-president Señor Dr. Don Francisco Dueñas to the agents who may be appointed by the supreme government of Salvador to receive him.

Having due respect for the sovereignty of the state, this action is taken, and it is a matter of great personal satisfaction to the undersigned that the government give the assurance that Señor Dueñas will be treated during his detention with special consideration.

SAN MIGUEL, April 13, 1871.

SIR: By virtue of the guarantee of neutrality which the Government of the American Union proffered to Honduras in an existing treaty, with reference to the port that might serve the purposes of the interoceanic railroad, my government approves you that the port of Amapala should not be used as a base for military operations, leaving it therefore under your safeguard, and removing the force it had therein stationed.

Greatly was the government of Honduras pained on learning a few days later that a body of troops, in the service of Don Francisco Dueñas, compelled the port authorities to leave, and carried off the war material that was there to protect it; and this will out your taking, as was to be expected, a measure in behalf of that neutrality. The same thing was done with reference to Comayagua, the capital; and, nevertheless, I have also been informed of its occupation by forces of the same Señor Dueñas, in command of Generals Xatruch and Miranda, without respecting the declaration made by my government of leaving that city under the protection of the United States Government.

So much indifference in a matter of such gravity has made me determine the sending of a force to recover the island for the purpose of keeping it under the sovereignty of Honduras, and placing therein the necessary war elements to protect it. In the same manner I must make known to you that on this date I have declared the said port to be in state of siege, and ordered general headquarters to be established there for the operations of the war; and I take this step after having obtained a practical conviction that the convention that I have referred to has not been fulfilled on your part, as the representative of the cabinet of Washington, upon which case I address myself to the honorable minister of foreign relations for the information of that Government.

I expect that you will hold this communication as an official protest on the part of the government of Honduras, over which I have the honor to preside, and that in your answer you will please tell me in a clear and distinct manner if you are or are not disposed to comply with the aforesaid guarantee of neutrality.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

SIR: The Department has received your dispatch No. 48, of the 21st ultimo, relative to the surrender to authorities of Salvador of Señor Doctor Don Francisco Dueñas, late president of that republic, to whom you had granted an asylum. Nothing will at this time be said as to the propriety or expediency of your having granted that asylum; you are, however, referred for the general views of the Department upon the subject to instruction No. 24, of the 16th of December, 1869, addressed to Mr. Ebenezer D. Bassett, minister resident of the United States in Hayti. A copy of this instruction is herewith inclosed.

Having, however, whether for sufficient reasons or otherwise, granted a refuge to Mr. Dueñas, you thereby incurred an obligation, which, it might be said, more or less implicated the honor of this Government in its exact fulfillment.

It appears that Mr. Dueñas assented to his own surrender. This assent, however, may be regarded as so important an element in the case that it would have been preferable if it had been given in writing. This would have made it a matter of record, which might have been used, in possible contingencies, to refute a charge that the surrender was contrary to the wishes of the refugee, a charge which there may be no sufficient means of refuting.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington December 16, 1869.

SIR: Your dispatch No. 20, of the 20th ultimo, has been received. It represents that in consequence of the apprehended triumph of the armed opposition to the existing government in Hayti, the foreign consulates, and even the legation of the United States, had been sought as asylums for persons and property. Occasions for this have of late years frequently arisen in the independent states of this hemisphere, but the proceeding has never been sanctioned by the Department, which, however, appreciates those impulses of humanity which make it difficult to reject such appeals for refuge. The expediency of granting an asylum in such cases, especially by consuls, is more than questionable, and the obligation to take that course has no foundation in public law, however in Hayti or elsewhere it may be tolerated and customary.

While you are not required to expel those who may have sought refuge in the legation, you will give them to understand that your Government cannot, on that account, assume any responsibility for them, and especially cannot sanction any resistance by you to their arrest by the authorities for the time being.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

SIR: Your dispatch, No. 49, of the 4th ultimo has been received. The communication which accompanied it, addressed to you by the president, Medina, of Honduras, is certainly of an extraordinary character. Its purpose seems to have been to hold you personally responsible for an assumed delinquency of your Government in failing to comply with the stipulation on our part to maintain the neutrality of the railway across Honduras. Supposing the obligation to exist as claimed by President Medina, it is obvious that it could not be carried into effect without the exertion of a physical force, which it was ridiculous to have supposed that you could personally wield, and unreasonable to suppose that you had at command. It is deemed unnecessary to repeat the views which have heretofore been expressed in regard to the obligation of the United States under the treaty. That may, however, be summarily stated as a bargain to protect the railway, when completed, against occupation or obstruction, not only by a foreign power, but of Honduras itself, and to abstain ourselves from such occupation or obstruction. This, and this only, we conceive to be the true meaning of the phrase "neutrality," used in the treaty, an expression which certainly is not so free from ambiguity as to require no explanation. Any construction which may be offered, however, must comport with reason and probability. The construction claimed by Honduras would require the United States to protect the road against all intruders from its inception to its conclusion. No such construction is warranted by the words of the instrument.

It is deemed expedient that you should ascertain what other governments may have guaranteed the railway, and on what terms, so that, if necessary, we may have an understanding with that government as to the fulfillment of our several obligations.

SPAIN.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE AND THE LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES AT MADRID.

No. 319.

Mr. Fish to General Sickles.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

No. 66.]

Washington, June 24, 1870.

GENERAL: Inclosed you will find a copy of a note addressed to Mr. Lopez Roberts on the 9th instant, relative to the claims of citizens of the United States against Spain, growing out of summary arrests and imprisonments, military executions, arbitrary embargoes of property, and other acts done by the Spanish authorities in Cuba to the persons and properties of citizens of the United States, in violation of the provisions of the treaty of 1795 between the Government of the United States and the government of Spain. You will also find a further communication on the same subject in regard to a claim which was presented to the Department subsequent to the transmission of the note of the 9th instant. Each of the cases mentioned in the former of these notes had previously been the subject of instruction to the consul general of the United States in Havana, to be brought to the attention of the authorities in the island of Cuba, and of demand for redress. You will observe, that these notes were sent to Mr. Lopez Roberts, under the supposition that the extraordinary powers as to Cuba which were conferred upon him by his government last year were still vested in him, and that they were broad enough to authorize him to arrest these infractions of the rights secured by the treaty, and to obtain the restoration of their properties to the citizens of the United States. I am informed, however, by Mr. Roberts that those powers are no longer efficient, and that he can do nothing in the premises.

I have therefore to instruct you to bring this whole subject to the notice of the Spanish government, and to say that the President hopes that immediate steps will be taken for the release of all the citizens of the United States who may be held in custody in Cuba in violation of the provisions of the treaty of 1795, or for their immediate trial under the guarantees and with the rights secured by that treaty. You are also instructed to ask for the restoration to the citizens of the United States of their properties and estates, so far as the same have been arbitrarily embargoed in violation of the provisions of that treaty. You will also endeavor to secure some mode for the early and equitable indemnification and satisfaction to the several parties, whose rights have been violated, of the amounts which should rightfully come to each claimant for the illegal detention of his property or his person. You will say that this suggestion is made in the interest of peace, of justice, and of good will, in order to secure a measure of damages in each case which shall be just as between the two governments. You will also say that it is extremely desirable to have the investigation conducted in this country. It cannot be done in Spain without subjecting the claimants to unnecessary expense. It cannot be done in Cuba, at present, without subjecting many of them to personal danger. In this connection I must again, on behalf of this Government, express, in the interest of good will and of the continued good understanding which we desire to maintain with Spain, the strong desire of the President that the government at Madrid will confer fresh powers upon Mr. Lopez Roberts (or upon such other person on this side of the Atlantic as may be selected for that purpose) to arrange all such questions with this Government.

The Spanish authorities in Cuba seem to be clothed with absolute power for the commission of such acts as are now complained of, but when redress is sought, we are referred to the distant cabinet of Madrid, where it is often found necessary to refer again to Cuba for information, and the case is thus suspended and delayed, to the grievous injury of the parties and at the hazard of irritation from the delay of which the necessity is not apparent to the impatient sufferers or to the public.

The President has respected the Spanish claim of sovereignty over the island of Cuba during the present contest against a strong sympathetic pressure from without. Spain owes it to the United States as well as to her own traditional honor and sense of justice that her sovereignty shall not be used for the oppression and injury of the citizens of this republic.

You will urge this point in every way that your good judgment may suggest.

I am, &c.,

HAMILTON FISH.

Mr. Fish to Mr. Lopez Roberts.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, June 9, 1870.

The undersigned is directed by the President to invite the earnest attention of Mr. Mauricio Lopez Roberts, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of Spain, to the irregular and arbitrary manner in which the persons and properties of citizens of the United States are taken and held by the Spanish authorities in the island of Cuba.

When Count Valmaseda, in April of last year, issued a proclamation declaring that every man, from the age of fifteen years upward, found away from his habitation as not proving a sufficient motive therefor, would be shot; that every habitation unoccupied would be burned; and that every house not flying a white flag should be reduced to ashes, it became the duty of the undersigned to convey to Mr. Lopez Roberts the protest of the President against such a mode of warfare, and his request that the authorities in Cuba would take steps that no person having the right to claim the protection of the Government of the United States should be sacrificed or injured in the conduct of hostilities on that basis.

When again, about the same time, it came to the knowledge of this Government that the captain general of Cuba had, on the 1st day of April, 1869, issued a proclamation which virtually forbade the alienation of property in the island, except with the revision and assent of certain officials named in the decree, and which declared null and void all sales made without such revision and assent, the President again directed the undersigned to say that he viewed with regret such sweeping interference with the rights of individuals to alienate or dispose of their property, and that he hoped that steps would be speedily taken to modify that decree so that it should not be applicable to the property of citizens of the United States, and so that disputes and complaints that could not fail to arise if its execution should be attempted as to such property might be prevented.

When, seventeen days later, a decree was issued creating an administrative council for the custody and management of embargoed property; and when, three days afterward, the captain general issued a circular extending the previous embargo to the property of all persons, either within or without the island, who might take part in the insurrection, whether with arms in their hands or aiding it with arms, munitions, money, or articles of subsistence, this Government confidently expected that the cabinet of Madrid, and the authorities of Spain in the island of Cuba, would regard the then recent expressions of its wishes, and would not willingly permit the rights of citizens of the United States to be interfered with or their properties to be sequestered without the forms of law to which they were entitled.

When the President directed the undersigned to invite attention to the possibility that the laws and decrees which had been promulgated in Cuba might lead to an infraction of the treaties between Spain and the United States, he was not unmindful of the disorganized condition of society in parts of that island, nor of the difficulties which attended the enforcement of the authority of Spain. On the contrary, he was induced to make such representation by a desire to avoid increasing those difficulties, and to prevent further complications so far as the act of this Government could do so.

The seventh article of the treaty of 1795, between the United States and Spain, provides—

“That the subjects or citizens of each of the contracting parties, their vessels or effects, shall not be liable to any embargo or detention on the part of the other for any military expedition or other public or private purpose whatever; and in all cases of seizure, detention, or arrest for debts contracted, or offenses committed, by any citizen or subject of the one party within the jurisdiction of the other, the same shall be made and prosecuted by order and authority of law only, and according to the regular course of proceedings usual in such cases. The citizens and subjects of both parties shall be allowed to employ such advocates, solicitors, notaries, agents, and factors as they may judge proper, in all their affairs, and in all their trials at law in which they may be concerned, before the tribunals of the other party, and such agents shall have free access to be present at the proceedings in such causes, and at the takings of all examinations and evidence which may be exhibited in the said trials.”

It is with great regret that the Government of the United States feels itself forced to say that it is informed that the provisions of this article of the treaty of 1795 have not been kept in mind by the authorities in Cuba during the present struggle. It appears to the President that the sweeping decrees of April, 1869, have been put in operation against the properties of citizens of the United States in violation of the treaty agreement that such property should not be subject to embargo or detention for any public or private purpose whatever.

Inclosed is a list of the citizens of the United States who, up to this date, have presented to this Government complaints of such embargo or detention of their property.

The decree of embargo is of itself an extraordinary exercise of supreme power, outside of the ordinary and regular course of legal or judicial proceedings, and even if properly exercised with respect to the subjects of Spain and their properties, appears to be in contravention of the rights secured by treaty to the citizens of the United States, and the proceedings under the decree against the properties of citizens of the United States have not, as is understood, been prosecuted by order or authority of laws only, but in the exercise of the extraordinary functions vested in or exercised for the occasion by the supreme political authority of the island, and have been arbitrary and unusual, and without the safeguards to personal rights and rights of property which ordinarily accompany legal proceedings, which the seventh article of the treaty guarantees.

It is understood that the citizens of the United States whose properties have been thus taken forcibly from them have not been allowed to employ such advocates, solicitors, notaries, agents, and factors as they might judge proper; on the contrary, as this Government is informed, their properties have been taken from them without notice, and advocates, solicitors, notaries, agents, or factors have not been allowed to interpose in their behalf. It is further understood that the names of parties whose properties are thus embargoed are from time to time published and their properties thereafter immediately seized, without opportunity to them or their agents to be present at any proceedings in regard thereto, or at the taking of examination or evidence.

In many instances these proceedings have been taken against the properties of citizens of the United States who were not at the time, and who have not during the continuance of the disturbances, on the island of Cuba, been within the jurisdiction of Spain, and it is notorious that by going to the island of Cuba, after the official denunciation of their alleged conduct, they would subject themselves to arbitrary arrest and possible summary military trial, if not to the uncontrolled violence of popular prejudice.

The undersigned has also received representations from several citizens of the United States complaining of arbitrary arrest and of close incarceration without permission to communicate with their friends, or with advocates, solicitors, notaries, agents, and factors, as they might judge proper. In some of these cases the parties have been released; in others, they are understood to be still held in custody.

The undersigned has the honor to inclose a list of the citizens of the United States who, up to this date, have presented to this Government complaints of such arrest and detention.

In some cases, also, such arrests have been followed by military trial, without the opportunity of access to advocates or solicitors, or of communication with witnesses, and without those personal rights and legal protections which the accused should have enjoyed; and such summary trials, when ending in conviction, have been followed by summary execution. Such cases, so far as they have come to the knowledge of the undersigned, are included in the list herewith transmitted.

What has been already done in this respect is, unhappily, past recall, and leaves to the United States a claim against Spain for the amount of the injuries that their citizens have suffered by reason of these several violations of the treaty of 1795—a claim which the undersigned presents on behalf of his Government with the confident hope that the government of Spain, recognizing its justice, and making some proper and suitable provision for ascertaining the amount which should rightfully come to each claimant, will also order the immediate restoration to the citizens of the United States of their properties which have been thus embargoed, and the release of those citizens of the United States thus held, or their immediate trial under the guarantees and with the rights accorded by the treaty.

As to the future, it is confidently expected that steps will be taken to insure against further violations of the treaty. The high sense of honor for which Spain is proverbial will (the President feels assured) prompt her to take vigorous steps to secure to citizens of the United States within Spanish dominions the full measure of the rights accorded to them by the treaty of 1795.

The extraordinary powers as to affairs in Cuba which were conferred upon Mr. Lopez Roberts by his government, and which were communicated to the undersigned on the 12th day of August last, are understood by the Government of the United States to be broad enough to authorize him to arrest these infractions of the rights secured by the treaty and to obtain the restoration of the properties. If, however, such is not the case, the undersigned then takes the liberty to ask Mr. Lopez Roberts to advise him of such absence of power, in order that instructions may be given to the minister of the United States at Madrid.

In closing this note, the undersigned must expressly reserve to the Government of the United States the right to restate its grievances on these points, as new facts may come to its knowledge showing further and other injuries to the properties of citizens of the United States from like causes.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to Mr. Lopez Roberts the assurances of his highest consideration.

HAMILTON FISH.

General Sickles to Mr. Fish.

No. 136.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Madrid, July 26, 1870. (Received August 11.)

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of my note to Mr. Sagasta, dated to-day, in regard to the matters embraced in your instructions of the 1st instant and 24th ultimo.

You will observe that I have recapitulated the substance of your note to Mr. Roberts, in order to bring up the whole issue for settlement here. Now that these questions are formally presented to this cabinet, I shall endeavor to impress upon General Prim the importance of prompt and friendly action, to which I suspect he will be more inclined by existing European complications.

I am, &c.,

D. E. SICKLES.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Madrid, July 26, 1870.

SIR: On the 9th ultimo, the Secretary of State of the United States addressed a note to the representative of Spain in Washington, setting forth sundry grievances suffered by citizens of the United States at the hands of the Spanish authorities in Cuba.

On the 18th ultimo another communication was made to Mr. Roberts by the Acting Secretary of State, Mr. Davis, in relation to a complaint which was presented to the Department of State subsequent to the transmission of the former note. The attention of the Spanish minister was invited to these matters under the supposition that he still exercised certain extraordinary powers, understood to have been conferred upon him with reference to questions arising out of the contest in Cuba, and that those powers were broad enough to authorize him to act in the premises.

On the 24th ultimo, Mr. Roberts informed the Secretary of State that, in view of the improved condition of affairs in the island of Cuba, the government of His Highness the Regent no longer deemed it necessary to continue the powers granted in August, 1869, to the representative of Spain in Washington.

All of the cases mentioned in the note of the Secretary of State to the Spanish minister in Washington had been the subject of instructions to the consul general of the United States in the Havana, in order that they should be brought to the attention of the authorities in Cuba, and redress be demanded.

On the 11th instant, I had the honor to inform your excellency that I had been instructed to bring these several matters to the notice of the government of His Highness the Regent, and in compliance with the intimation then given I proceed to perform that duty.

The reclamations I am directed to present are for injuries done to the persons and property of American citizens by the Spanish authorities in Cuba, in violation of Article VII of the treaty of 1795, between the United States and Spain. In numerous instances the property of citizens of the United States has been seized upon the mere order of the captain general, forcibly taken from their possession, or from the control of their agents, without judicial proceedings, and confiscated to the use of the Spanish authorities. In other cases, citizens of the United States have been arrested, imprisoned, and condemned to suffer the severest punishments without legal cause shown, and without the sanction or authority of any judicial tribunal.

Appended to this note your excellency will find a particular statement of the names of the parties whose property has been embargoed, and of those who have been imprisoned or put to death by the authority of the captain general of Cuba, in violation of the treaty of 1795. Nevertheless, the Government of the United States reserves the right to restate its grievances as new facts may come to its knowledge, showing further and other injuries to the persons and property of American citizens.

The United States have addressed repeated remonstrances to the government of Spain against the successive measures of the authorities in Cuba which have appeared to authorize acts inconsistent with the rights secured to American citizens under the treaty of 1795. It may be useful to recur to some of these representations. In April, 1869, General Valmaseda issued a proclamation declaring that every male person, above the age of fifteen years, found away from his habitation and not proving a sufficient motive therefor, would be shot; that every unoccupied habitation, and every dwelling not flying a white flag, would be burned. The Secretary of State of the United States promptly protested, in the name of the President, against such a mode of warfare, and asked that the proper steps be taken so that the persons and property of those having the right to claim the protection of the Government of the United States should not be injured in the execution of Count Valmaseda's order.

About the same time, on or about the 1st of April, 1869, the captain general issued a proclamation, declaring void all sales and conveyances of property in the island made without the assent of certain officials named in the decree. As soon as the proceeding came to the knowledge of the President, he caused the government of His Highness the Regent to be informed of the regret with which he regarded such a prohibition of the rights of individuals to alienate their property, and, in order to prevent the complaints and controversies that could not fail to arise if the execution of the measure should be attempted, the Secretary of State requested that the decree might be so modified as not to be applicable to the property of citizens of the United States.

Seventeen days later a further decree was issued, creating an administrative council for the custody and management of embargoed property; three days afterward the captain general promulgated an order extending the embargo already authorized to the property of all persons, either within or without the island, who might take part in the insurrection, whether with arms in their hands or aiding it with arms, means, money, or subsistence.

The President having expressed his apprehension that, in the execution of these extreme measures taken by the authorities in Cuba, the rights of citizens of the United States might be compromised, he confidently expected that the cabinet of Madrid, the superior political authority in Cuba would not suffer American citizens to be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due regard to the reservations and safeguards provided in the treaty of 1795.

The Government of the United States was not unmindful of the disorganized condition of affairs in parts of the island, nor of the difficulties which, in some localities, attended the enforcement of the authority of Spain. There was no allegation that the courts of law were closed in the Havana, where most of these proceedings occurred, or that the functions of the civil authority could not be performed in any of the principal towns of the island. And the President was induced to address his friendly representations to the government of His Highness the Regent, by a desire to avoid increasing the embarrassments growing out of the contest in Cuba, and to prevent further complications, so far as the act of the Government of the United States could do. The seventh article of the treaty of 1795, between the United States and Spain, is as follows:

"And it is agreed that the subjects or citizens of each of the contracting parties, their vessels or effects, shall not be liable to any embargo or detention on the part of the other, for any military expedition or other public or private purpose whatever, and in all cases of seizure, detention, or arrest for debts contracted or offenses committed by any citizen or subject of the one party within the jurisdiction of the other, the same shall be made and prosecuted by order and authority of law only, and according to the regular course of proceedings usual in such cases. The citizens and subjects of both parties shall be allowed to employ such advocates, solicitors, notaries, agents, and factors as they may judge proper, in all their affairs, and in all their trials and suits in which they may be concerned, before the tribunals of the other party; and the agents shall have free access to be present at the proceedings in such causes, and the taking of all examinations and evidence which may be exhibited in the said trials."

It will be seen that, by the provisions of the article above cited, each of the contracting parties has expressly renounced all right to embargo or detain the property of the citizens or subjects of the other. The broad and emphatic terms of this renunciation include every possible case in which the power could be exercised. No exigency of war, no requirement of the public service, no civil disorder is permitted by the stipulations of the treaty to sanction or excuse these prohibited acts of spoliation. Moreover, it is equally plain that it was the distinct and beneficent purpose of both governments to secure for their citizens and subjects respectively, within the dominions of the other, the protection of the laws of the land and of the courts of law, and of the essential safeguards for the administration of justice, in all prosecutions for an offense alleged to have been committed against the good order, peace, and dignity of the commonwealth.

It is with profound regret that the Government of the United States has learned that the provisions of this treaty have not been observed by the authorities in Cuba during the present struggle in that island. The decrees of April, 1869, have been put in operation against citizens of the United States, in violation of a solemn engagement that their property should not be subject to seizure, embargo, or detention for a public or private purpose whatever.

And American citizens have been arrested, imprisoned, and executed, without authority of law and regardless of the regular and established course of legal procedure.

which should have been followed in conformity with the requirements of the convention between the United States and Spain. Whether authority may have been delegated to, or exercised by, the authorities in Cuba with reference to Spanish subjects, it is not to be supposed that the government of Spain would in any manner sanction the acts of its civil and military officers done in contravention of the rights of citizens of the United States guaranteed by the treaty of 1795, rights which could not be rescinded, suspended, or annulled without the consent of the United States. So far is any such supposition from the views of the President that he is persuaded that it is only necessary to bring to the notice of the government of His Highness the Regent the frequent instances in which the authorities in Cuba have deprived American citizens of liberty, property, and sometimes even of life, without regarding the reciprocal engagements entered into between the two countries, to insure such friendly and prompt action on the part of Spain as will repair the wrongs already done, so far as they can be repaired, and prevent the repetition of such injuries in the future.

The decree of embargo published by the captain general of Cuba is an extraordinary exercise of supreme power, outside of the ordinary and regular course of legal and judicial action. If properly exercised with respect to the subjects of Spain and their property, it appears to be in plain contravention of the rights secured by treaty to the citizens of the United States. And if we pass from the decree itself, and examine the methods by which it has been executed, it will be found that these also have been arbitrary, summary, and unusual, and contrary to the provisions of the treaty which should have controlled and regulated the acts of the authorities in Cuba affecting the property of American citizens.

The proceedings of the case of Mr. Joseph Hernandez, which are presumed to be the same as have taken place in the other cases enumerated in the appendix to this note, may be cited as an example of the manner in which the decree of embargo has been carried into effect. Mr. Hernandez, a civil engineer by profession, has resided in the United States some twelve years, where he married, and afterward, in conformity with the laws of the United States, became a naturalized citizen thereof. He is the owner of certain valuable lands in the island of Cuba, situated in the district of Vereda Nueva, and known as "El Retiro." On the 25th of February last a decree was published in the "Gaceta de la Habana," in which it is set forth that "his excellency the superior political governor has considered it convenient to declare comprehended in article 1 of the circular of the 20th of April of last year Mr. José de Jesus Hernandez y Macias, who resides abroad. This being an order from his excellency, it is published in the Gaceta for general information, and in order that the competent authorities proceed to seize all his property in accordance with the above-mentioned circular. Havana, 24th February, 1870. (Signed,) The secretary, Cesáreo Fernandez."

It appears, therefore, that the decree of embargo is executed by the same executive authority which issued it. It does not seem to be a law which the courts of justice are permitted to administer. It is rather an edict, enforced by a succession of orders not less extraordinary and imperial than the original fiat on which they are founded. Although it is understood that the courts of law are open in the city of Havana, where the proceedings took place, there is no evidence that the authorities filed any information or complaint against any of the citizens of the United States whose property has been confiscated; it does not appear that any citation was issued or published or served upon the parties, their agents, factors, or attorneys, notifying them to appear and show cause why judgment should not be pronounced against them; nor that they have been afforded any opportunity to be heard in their own defense, either in person or by their advocates, solicitors, and attorneys.

On the contrary, the Government of the United States is informed that the lands and property of many of its citizens have been taken from them without color of law, and in the exercise of the extraordinary functions vested in or exercised for the occasion by the supreme political authority of the island; that these unusual measures have been enforced against citizens of the United States who were not at the time in Cuba, and who had not been within the jurisdiction of Spain during the disturbances in that island; that they have been deprived of their estates without notice and without a hearing; that from time to time the names of these parties respectively have been published by the executive authority, with a declaration that their property is embargoed, and thereupon their goods, lands, and tenements have been immediately seized, without opportunity to the persons interested, or their agents, to be present at any inquiry or investigation in regard thereto, or at the taking of any testimony that may have been received and considered in the premises. And it therefore appears to the President that the sweeping decrees of April, 1869, so far as they have been enforced in Cuba against citizens of the United States, are inconsistent with the convention between the two countries; and that the proceedings taken to execute those decrees are arbitrary and unusual, without the safeguards to personal rights and the rights of property which ordinarily accompany the administration of justice in legal tribunals, and which are guaranteed by treaty to American citizens within the jurisdiction of Spain.

And I am accordingly instructed to ask for the restoration to the citizens of the United States of their property and estates, so far as the same has been arbitrarily embargoed by the authorities in Cuba, in violation of the provisions of the seventh article of the treaty of 1795, between the United States and Spain, and for such reasonable and just indemnity for the wrongful seizure and detention of their property as will compensate the aggrieved parties. The provisions of the treaty of 1795 seem to have been likewise disregarded by the authorities of Cuba in the arrest, imprisonment, and punishment of certain American citizens. A brief memorandum of these cases will be found appended to this communication. These arrests are represented to have been arbitrary and without legal process or cause shown; the parties have been placed in close confinement, denied all communication with their friends, and prohibited from consulting such advocates, solicitors, and attorneys as they desired to employ; in a few instances, after an imprisonment of more or less duration, the parties have been released, while others are still held in custody. In some cases the accused have been condemned by a military tribunal, without the opportunity of access to counsel or witnesses, or other means of preparing for their defense, such as accused persons should have enjoyed; and several of these summary trials, when ending in conviction, have been followed by the immediate execution of the sentence of death. The President is persuaded that the government of His Highness the Regent will see in these proceedings grave violations of the rights secured to American citizens by the treaty of 1795. It is provided by the seventh article of the treaty that the arrest of a citizen of the United States for an offense committed within the Spanish jurisdiction, shall be made and prosecuted by authority of law and according to the regular course of proceedings usual in such cases; that the accused shall have the aid and assistance of counsel in his trial; and that such counsel shall have free access to be present at all proceedings in the case and at the taking of all testimony which may be produced on the trial. In the case which I have now the honor to bring to the notice of your excellency, I regret to be compelled to state that none of these safeguards, so essential to the administration of justice and the vindication of innocence, have been observed. So far as relates to the parties concerned there might as well have been no laws, no courts, no established course of legal procedure in Cuba. The arrests, the trials—when trials have taken place—and the punishments inflicted, are all represented to have been exceptional and arbitrary acts of executive or military authority. In presenting these facts and considerations to your excellency, I am instructed to say that the President hopes that immediate steps will be taken for the release of all the citizens of the United States who may be held in custody in Cuba, in violation of the treaty of 1795 between the United States and Spain; or for their immediate trial under the guarantees and with the rights secured by that treaty.

I am further instructed to invite the co-operation of your excellency in arriving at some decision as to the manner in which the two governments may most conveniently ascertain and determine the amount which should come to each claimant for the illegal detention of his person or his property, so that the several parties whose rights have been violated may receive early and equitable indemnification and satisfaction for the injuries they have sustained. This suggestion is made by my Government in the interest of peace, of justice, and of good will, in order to secure a measure of damage in each case which shall be just as between the two governments.

It is extremely desirable that the investigation should be conducted in the United States. It cannot be done in Spain without subjecting the parties to unnecessary expense and delay. It cannot proceed in Cuba, at present, without subjecting many of them to personal danger. I hope, therefore, it may be agreeable to your excellency to appoint a time when we may have a conference on this subject, which I do not permit myself to doubt would have a satisfactory result. If, for example, the government of His Highness the Regent would designate or authorize his excellency the minister of Spain in Washington to choose one of the Spanish consuls in the United States, or some other suitable person, to act in conjunction with an agent of the United States, to be named for this purpose, I am confident that the inquiry could be so conducted with convenience to all parties, and that the conclusions reached would be satisfactory to both governments.

And I am also instructed to express on behalf of my Government, in the interest of the continued good understanding which the United States wish to maintain with Spain, the strong desire of the President that the cabinet of Madrid will confer fresh powers upon Mr. Lopez Roberts, or upon such other person on the other side of the Atlantic as may be selected for that purpose, to arrange with the Government of the United States the class of questions presented in this note. The authorities in Cuba seem to be clothed with ample power to do the acts which have been the subject of the present and of former communications; but when redress is sought the matter is transferred to the distant cabinet of Madrid, where it is often found necessary to remand the case to Cuba for information; and thus the most urgent questions, often involving the liberty and even the lives of American citizens, are suspended, to the grievous injury of the parties and at the hazard of irritation from the delay, of which the necessity is not apparent to the impatient sufferer or to the public.

It appears from the note addressed to the Department of State, on the 24th ultimo, by the representative of Spain in Washington, Mr. Lopez Roberts, that in view of the favorable situation in the island of Cuba, the government of His Highness the Regent deems it no longer necessary to continue the powers heretofore given to Mr. Roberts. And in asking for this suggestion the attention of your excellency, I am directed to state that if the situation in Cuba be so favorable as to render these powers unnecessary, it is hoped that the arrests and embargoes complained of will cease, and that immediate reparation will be made for those that have occurred. The President has respected the Spanish claim of sovereignty over the island of Cuba during the present contest, against a strong sympathetic pressure from without. He has scrupulously performed all the duties imposed upon him by treaties and by international law, to restrain and prevent the citizens of the United States from doing acts prejudicial to Spain. And when it is considered that the struggle in Cuba could not fail to engage the sympathies of a neighboring people who had themselves thrown off the domination of a European power and established a republican form of government, your excellency will appreciate the high sense of public duty which animated the President in the execution of his difficult task. The American Government, while evincing its profound respect for the obligations imposed upon it by treaties and its relations of amity with Spain, cannot do less than recognize at the same time the susceptibility with which the people of the United States regard offenses committed at home or abroad against the persons or property of their fellow-citizens. It is therefore incumbent upon the President to insist upon the rights Spain owes to American citizens by virtue of the treaty of 1795, with the same firmness he has manifested on his part in restraining all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States from acts injurious to Spain.

The treaty of 1795, negotiated on the part of Spain by the Prince of Peace and ratified during the administration of George Washington, recalls some of the earliest traditions of the cordial and uninterrupted friendship which has been so long preserved between the United States and Spain.

In the name of these traditions and for the sake of that friendship, I appeal to your excellency to cause such instructions to be given to the authorities in Cuba as will prevent further injuries to citizens of the United States who may be found within that jurisdiction or who may have property there. There was no moment of the long and exhausting civil war in the United States when Spanish subjects within our territory were injured in person or property without due process of law, or were refused any of the safeguards which belong to the administration of justice. And Spain owes it to the United States, as well as to her own high sense of honor and of justice, that her sovereignty shall not be used anywhere for the oppression and injury of the citizens of the republic.

I avail myself of this opportunity to repeat to your excellency the assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Madrid, August 3, 1870. (Received August 17.)

SIR: Last night, in the course of a conversation with the president of the council, I referred to my note of the 26th ultimo, addressed to the minister of state, in regard to the treatment of American citizens in Cuba, and expressed the hope that it would be agreeable to his excellency to facilitate a satisfactory settlement of the questions I had presented. General Prim replied that he had already read my communication, and that it should receive immediate attention; that he appreciated the friendly action of the President, and that he was extremely anxious to remove every source of misunderstanding between the two countries; that the cabinet had now under consideration some general rules for the guidance of the authorities in Cuba, which, when made the subject of precise instructions, would prevent the recurrence of similar causes of complaint; that he had no doubt instances had occurred in which, through an excess of zeal, the authorities in Cuba had proceeded without sufficient care and deliberation; and that in all cases of just complaint he was disposed to make proper reparation. He added that I would soon hear from Mr. Sagasta on the subject, and he hoped the action of the Spanish cabinet would be found satisfactory to the President. I remarked that your note to Mr. Roberts of the 9th June had been communicated to Congress; that the long list of grievances complained of had painfully impressed public opinion in the United States, and I was therefore all the more desirous that his excellency should appreciate the importance of prompt action.

SIR: This being the usual day of reception at the ministry of state, I called upon Mr. Sagasta, with the intention of expressing my hope that I might soon receive an answer to my note of the 26th ultimo. After some conversation in regard to the news of the day, his excellency himself introduced the subject by saying that the delay in his answer had been occasioned by the necessity of obtaining from the ministry of ultramar fuller information in regard to various points that existed in the department of state; that these notes were now completed, and he would prepare his reply as soon as possible.

I said that I was very desirous to be able to transmit to my Government a satisfactory answer at the earliest possible day; adding that your dispatches on the subject had, in accordance with the custom of our Government, been communicated to Congress, and that the list of grievances presented had of course painfully impressed the public opinion; that this consideration increased the importance of an early and satisfactory solution. I referred to the official accounts of the improved situation in Cuba, and urged this as another reason for the prompt redress of existing grievances, and the prevention of their recurrence in future.

His excellency expressed his hearty assent to these views. He said as soon as he had completed his examination of the questions involved, he would invite me to a conference, and did not doubt we would come to a satisfactory arrangement.

SIR: The following cable telegram has been dispatched from this legation, via Lisbon and Valencia Bay:

FISH, Secretary of State, Washington:

Minister of state replies to my note of twenty-sixth July that Spanish government will agree to appointment of arbitrators to estimate damages and fix indemnity to be paid, when certain preliminary conditions shall have been complied with, if it shall then appear that any American citizen has been aggrieved.

These conditions are:

First. The claimants must prove their citizenship before the Spanish authorities.

Second. Their respective claims must be separately presented, in due form, with particulars.

Third. It must appear that the claimants respectively have personally presented their reclamations to a Spanish court, or that the United States consul has intervened in their behalf, without result.

The answer is long, evasive, and dilatory. Will forward copy by mail with my reply.

SIR: I have the honor to forward herewith translations of three notes from the minister of state, dated respectively September 12, 15, and 20, in answer to the communication I addressed to him under date of July 26, in obedience to your instructions, Nos. 66 and 67, on the subject of injuries to the persons and property of American citizens done by the Spanish authorities in Cuba; also a copy of my reply of this date. I transmit likewise a translation of an unofficial note from Mr. Sagasta, dated September 27, in answer to mine of the 25th, inquiring whether the last paragraph of his note of the 12th was intended to intimate that arbitrators might be named immediately to ascertain the amount of damages the several claimants should respectively receive. You will also find inclosed an extract from the Gaceta of the 13th instant, containing the Regent's decree of the 12th, appropriating the proceeds of sales of embargoed property toward the payment of the expenses of maintaining the government in Cuba, and to which a reference is made in my reply. I have endeavored, while following your instructions by telegram of the 10th instant, in treating the proposed conditions of arbitration as inadmissible, to fortify our position on the questions involved in the discussion, by some additional facts and considerations, and you will observe that I have also renewed in a more amplified form the suggestion thrown out in my note of July 26, as to the manner in which the several reclamations should be submitted to arbitrators. Permit me to call your attention to some indications in Mr. Sagasta's argument of a purpose on the part of Spain to deny the right of expatriation, and revive the old dogma, "Once a subject, always a subject."

APPENDIX A.

Mr. Praxedes Mo. Sagasta to General D. E. Sickles.

[Translation.]

MINISTRY OF STATE, MADRID, September 12, 1870.

SIR: I have received the note which you were pleased to send me under date of the 26th of last July, and have now the honor to reply to its different statements on behalf of the government of His Highness the Regent of the kingdom.

The representations you are pleased to make in the name of the Government of the United States are of two classes; some referring to the manner in which Spain has directed, and still directs, operations to attain the complete pacification of the island of Cuba, and others, more explicit, upon the treatment of certain North American citizens residing in that island.

Respecting the first charges, your note begins by setting forth the arbitrary way in which, in your judgment, the persons of subjects of the United States are detained and their property embargoed; and, in this connection, you cite the proclamation of Count Valmaseda, of the 4th of April, 1869, at the same time stating that the Cabinet of Washington hastened to protest at once against that order, and against such a mode of warfare, and evinced its solicitude that the Cuban authorities should take such measures that the persons and property of those who had a right to claim the protection of the Government of the United States might not be comprehended in the execution of the said proclamation. To complete the record of this matter, in so far as t concerns the interests of the North American Government, I deem it proper to add that, on the 2d of June of the same year, this ministry informed your worthy predecessor, Mr. Hale, that telegraphic instructions had been sent to the authorities in Cuba to observe the utmost possible moderation in carrying out all those orders and measures whose execution might interest foreign governments, protesting, nevertheless, against any unjustifiable interference with the exercise of our authority within the limits of the jurisdiction which, by virtue of her sovereignty, belongs to Spain as an independent state.

Neither the Spanish government nor the authorities of Cuba have been informed that any reclamation whatever has been presented, on the part of any foreign subject, against the enforcement of the proclamation referred to; whence it is logically to be inferred, either that Count Valmaseda's decree was never carried into effect, or that, if it were, its operations did not reach those subjects. This decree was doubtless a stratagem of war, having for its only object the readier discrimination of the insurgents, as, in fact, proved to be the case without the necessity of enforcing it; and that, even in this sense, it was subsequently annulled by a circular of General Caballero de Rodas, on assuming the superior command of the island.

The Government of the United States should take into consideration the fact that Espedres and his accomplices inaugurated their criminal rebellion by burning and levastating plantations and towns; nor can it be ignorant that many American citizens, influential proprietors in that island, were reduced to want in consequence of the barbarous excesses of these enemies of Spain. Neither should it be forgotten that before the orders of Count Valmaseda were issued, there were innumerable decrees and proclamations of amnesty and pardon emanating from the captain-general of Cuba, as well as from the governor of the eastern department, with the humane purpose of ending the insurrection.

From the foregoing statements you will be enabled to see that the proclamation so severely and harshly judged was in obedience to a legitimate instinct of defense, and a peremptory necessity of war, loudly called for by the acts of the insurgent hordes.

History abounds in these examples, and it would be derogatory to your intelligence to detain you by citing the governments which, in similar circumstances, have employed like measures in the legitimate defense of their rights, and in favor of the most speedy restoration of the tranquillity of the country. In our own time, during the civil war of which the republic of the United States was the theater, the columns of the brave General Sherman, in their march from Atlanta to Savannah, devastated that portion of the country without warning, leveling whatever they found in their path, driven to such a painful extremity by the supreme necessity of subduing the rebellion, and at once freeing the Union from the horrors of war.

And in so doing, there was certainly no infringement of the principles of the rights of persons, nor of the rules of modern international law, as practiced by civilized nations, and as they were at that time affirmed with noteworthy foresight by the Government of Washington, in the memorable "Instructions for the armies in the field," issued by Mr. Stanton, Secretary of war, during the conflict with the South. This celebrated document, which has the honor of being the first codification of the laws of war, and whose bases are attributed by public opinion to one of the most distinguished jurists of America, says, in Article XV:

"War authorizes the destruction or mutilation of armed enemies and of all persons whose destruction is incidentally inevitable in encounters of arms; it authorizes the capture of all armed enemies and of all enemies useful to their Government or dangerous to the captors; it authorizes the destruction of all kinds of property, the cutting of roads, canals, and other means of communication, the interception of provisions and munitions, the seizure of all that the enemy's country may supply for the subsistence and security of the army," &c., &c.

Article 25 says:

"Those persons are counted as rebels who, in a territory occupied or conquered by an army, rise against it or against the authorities it has established. They incur the penalty of death, whether they may have risen in insurrection singly or in parties more or less considerable, or have been incited to rise by their own government or not. If they are captured, they are not prisoners, nor are they to be treated as such, even when they are discovered and arrested before the conspiracy has attained open rebellion, or before they may have committed any acts of violence."

Whatever authority may be accorded to these "instructions" as an expression of the present views of mankind respecting the mode of warfare between civilized peoples, it is at least certain that the Government of the United States will not disallow these principles; and as the Spanish government is convinced, not only that it has not exceeded them during its contest with the Cuban rebels, but that it has not even fully made use of the means which at other times and by other nations have been declared legitimate, there is cause for surprise that it should be so severely judged, and a pre-emptive found for denying it the same powers and rights as are conceded to other nations in a state of war.

You next treat of the decree of the 1st of April, 1869, issued by the captain-general, in which are declared null and void all sales and conveyances of property in the island of Cuba, made without the intervention of the officials designated by the same decree.

The Secretary of State, Mr. Fish, stated, in fact, to the government of His Highness that he considered this prohibition as contrary to the exercise of the rights of property, and requested that, in order to avoid disputes and controversies which could not but arise if it were carried into effect, the decree might be modified so as not to be applicable to the property of citizens of the United States.

The Spanish government at once took occasion to inform the cabinet of Washington that this regulation was demanded by the existing circumstances of the island, and by the necessity for energetic proceedings against the enemies of peace and public tranquillity; and that, in consequence, it was extremely important to prevent the possibility of comprehending among these not only those who had taken up arms, but also the émigrés who fomented the rebellion in foreign countries, from making simulated sales and contracts, which would permit them to continue in possession of their property and to dispose of the proceeds thereof for the support of the insurrection.

In this connection the attention of the Government of the North American republic was called to the well-known fact of all manner of dealings having been carried on in the island after the publication of the decree, without any hinderance; and that the Spanish citizens and those foreigners who obeyed the laws and respected legitimate authority had continued to dispose freely of their property and to carry on all their transactions with increased facility day by day, and without any other requirement than the filling up of a simple form in completing their contracts, by which the authorities might have cognizance of the transfers of real estate, and prevent abuses, criminal concealments, (ocultaciones;) and that the measure therefore contained nothing which could be stigmatized as vexatious. So that, as the captain-general observed in his communication of the 26th of March to the Spanish representative at Washington, the Government of the United States should have been completely convinced that up to that time no obstacles nor impediments had been placed in the way of lawful transactions; and that all that was necessary for the legalization of a transaction whatever took no more time than was required for revising the album, which accompanied the instrument, to ascertain that no person whose property was embargoed sought to alienate his estates, an operation which at the most might occupy ten minutes. But, besides these reasons, there is a fact more eloquent still, which is that until now not a single reclamation has been presented in this connection notwithstanding the time that has elapsed.

In entering upon the question of embargoes and of the pretended violation of the treaty of 1795, I desire, before all, for the sake of clearness, to call your attention to the foundation upon which appears to rest the series of claims of this nature presented against Spain by the Government of the United States.

It is indisputable, even for a moment, that neither in the note to which I have the honor to reply, nor in any other document concerning the affairs of Cuba since the outbreak of the insurrection, is there an indication of interference with the legitimate right that belongs to Spain of adopting the measures she may deem proper for effecting the pacification of any part of her territory. It may be deduced from this that in the name of the interests of North American citizens whose persons or property are injured or menaced, and solely by virtue of the protection which your republic owes them as citizens, can the Government of Washington be considered as entitled to complain of and comment upon those acts which, more or less directly, may affect the interests of its countrymen; from which it follows that, when not treating of those who have a right to the protection of the American flag, no reclamation should be made, nor should it be deemed necessary to touch upon matters which, as in this case, belong to our internal government. Granting this, it would seem natural that, before instituting any action founded upon a personal right, the circumstances from which is derived the right thus appealed to, should first be verified, and that the character by which the claimants invest themselves should be sufficiently demonstrated by the means, dissipating any possible doubt which may arise as to its legitimacy. But was in violation of the most logical course, a privilege or an exemption is claimed, reserving until later the proof of the personality of him who demands it; whereas, the legitimate privileges are claimed which are conceded by international law and treaties to foreigners, leaving until after a result is attained concerning the fact of the embargo any demonstration of the character of foreign citizenship upon which the claim is founded, which, without it, would be a usurpation of the immunity which only belongs to the subjects of friendly powers, there cannot fail to follow a confusion of obligations and rights which, looked at in a false light, would induce a palpably unjust interpretation of the acts of the Spanish authorities.

Unfortunately, no other course has been followed by the United States in their reclamations made in favor of those who, without any right whatever, have invoked the North American nationality. The Government of Washington, in its solicitude for its countrymen should not lack its protection, has never paused to examine the legal macy of the claim upon which it was invoked, and so has permitted the growth of its catalogue of wrongs and of persons aggrieved, which a considerate examination would doubtless have reduced to less dimensions.

In this aspect of the case, the good faith of the United States Government has been imposed upon and made use of by worthless men, whose only object is to create international complications and conflicts. The data and official documents of the Spanish government enable it to make a classification of the greater part of these claimants, reducing them to three classes, namely: 1st, claimants who have never possessed a right to foreign nationality; 2d, individuals who enjoy its benefits, but whose property has never been embargoed; and, 3d, persons to whom, in consideration of their being foreigners, their embargoed estates have been restored on the least evidence.

Moreover, the Government of the United States cannot be ignorant of the fact that the greater portion of the natives of Cuba who have given allegiance to the American flag have done so with the studied intention of making use of it at some future day as a shield for their criminal designs. Many cases might be cited of individuals who have lived in the island of Cuba as Spanish citizens, and did not remember their American citizenship until affairs went against them. These abuses caused the issue of the important instructions concerning the rights of citizenship, communicated by the Department of State of the United States on the 3d of May, 1869, to their consul-general at the Havana, it being noticeable that these instructions were given at the request of the said officer, who continually found himself embarrassed by the reclamations of Cubans naturalized as Americans, who had returned to the Havana and resided there permanently without disclosing their change of nationality; some of them having accepted employments and offices which Spanish subjects are alone permitted to hold.

Lastly, I end my reply to this portion of your note by calling your attention to the circumstance that the reclamations of the Government at Washington for offenses against American nationality are not set forth with precision in respect to the facts and circumstances of the several cases, (the only manner in which they can be discussed and the proper reparation ascertained,) and that they are limited to denunciations in general terms, attested by lists of persons who consider themselves aggrieved, but who are in no way shown to have affirmed their nationality before the courts, or to have been refused a hearing of their demands by the authorities, or in any other form to have sufficiently proved their character as foreigners.

If this be not duly proven, the Government at Washington cannot justly charge that of His Highness, the Regent, with having ignored, in the island of Cuba, the rights which belong to those who have the protection of the American flag, much less with having infringed the treaty of 1795; which point I shall now take up separately. The seventh article of the treaty of 1795, between Spain and the United States, upon which your note rests for declaring illegal the embargo of the property of American citizens, when carefully considered, proves inapplicable to the question both in spirit and in letter. The article is composed of three clauses; the first refers only to the embargo, or detention of vessels, or effects for the use of any military expedition, or for public or private purposes—in a word, the embargo commonly known by the name of angaria.* The second does not treat at all of estates or property, but only of the citizen himself, when apprehended or arrested, either for debts or for offenses, and the third treats of the means of defense which shall be guaranteed to him in the foregoing case. We can in no way occupy ourselves with the first clause, since the estates embargoed have not been taken for any of the objects therein expressed, but because the superior authority of the island was convinced, in view of information received from our consuls in the United States, that the proceeds of those estates were being applied to the sustenance and encouragement of the insurrection. And if this be true, can it be maintained that such American citizen, devoted to planning and committing acts hostile to Spain, should be included in either of the cases provided for by the aforesaid seventh article? Is it even rational to suppose that a State would celebrate and ratify a convention with another power, by virtue of which the subjects of one of the contracting parties would enjoy all the exemptions and advantages stipulated for, even in the case of being personally in open hostility and conspiracy against security and public peace? Can a treaty be conceived of whose stipulations would sanction impunity in favor of individuals, who, by their conduct, might compromise the existence of the State? It would not be easy to cite an example of such a convention, framed in opposition to all the principles, not merely of law, but of common sense. Consequently it is not consistent with reason, logic, or prudence that the treaty of 1795 can in any sense limit the power of the contracting governments to provide for the security of their respective territories against the secret plotting of the subjects of either. It may certainly favor the exercise of the rights of subjects against subjects, but not of these against their governments; since otherwise, whatever measures may have been taken, or may be taken in the future, to attack the situation in the island of Cuba at its root, would be baffled, and the enemies of Spain, residing in the United States, would rise shamelessly to aid the insurrection with the proceeds of their property, though now they are not secure of impunity unless sheltered by a recognized right.

As for embargoes, considered in general, the Spanish government does not believe that it deserves censure for making use of them, nor that there is any pretense for attributing to it the originality of the step; since on the 22d of July, 1862, the Secretary of War of the United States, by the authority of the President, issued an order directing the military commanders of Virginia, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Arkansas to seize and appropriate all personal and real property in the districts under their command which might be necessary for the supply of their troops, or for any other military purpose. The House of Representatives and the Senate had already approved, on the seventeenth of the same month, a law for the seizure and confiscation of the property of southern rebels, the fifth section of which says, textually:

"Be it also enacted, That in order to insure the speedy termination of the present rebellion, it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to cause the seizure of all the estate and property, money, stocks, credits, and effects of the persons hereinafter named in this section, and to apply and use the same and the proceeds thereof for the support of the Army of the United States."

Your note further treats of such American citizens as have been arrested and held in close confinement, with an accompanying list; adding that, in some cases, the arrests have been followed by military trials, without the privilege of the intervention of counsel or attorneys, or of communication with witnesses, the personal rights and legal protection to which all accused persons are entitled being denied, and that, lastly, what has been done under this head oversteps the bounds, and gives the United States the right to demand reparation from Spain for the injuries suffered by their citizens by reason of the various infractions of the treaty of 1795.

The explanatory list which I have the honor to inclose with this dispatch, stating the causes of arrest and the penalty imposed upon each of the citizens who were apprehended, will demonstrate how little foundation there is for the protest of the Government at Washington.

There is not a single case of sentence, except of those who were apprehended with arms in their hands, and shot as privates, in which the penalty has not been commuted and the accused turned over to their consul, to be sent out of the country.

The Government of the United States affirm, nevertheless, that even in this case the treaty of 1795 has been violated on the part of Spain, forgetting, doubtless, that the stranger who violates the laws of the country in which he lives is denied the protection of that to which he belongs, and consequently puts himself out of the reach of international law, and remains wholly subject to that of the place where he resides.

Your note concludes by expressing in the name of your Government the hope that Spain, recognizing the justice of the reclamations, and taking some proper and convenient steps to ascertain the amount which should come to each claimant, will at once order the restoration to citizens of the United States of such of their property as may be embargoed, as well as the release of those who are still imprisoned, or will cause them to be immediately brought to trial, under the guarantees and with the rights secured by the treaty of 1795.

In presenting such a demand, as well as in seeking to show that the seventh article of the treaty referred to has been violated by Spain, the Government of the United States forgets that, as the embargo is the penalty imposed for an offense, it cannot be rationally pretended that a vindictory proceeding should commence by the remission of the penalty. I have previously had the honor to occupy your attention upon this point, and it is useless to bring forward either the seventh article or the twentieth to prove the contrary.

The Spanish government has a representative accredited near the Government of the United States, and recognized consuls in the greater part of the ports of the republic. There have been many cases in which the captain general of Cuba has caused the American consul at the Havana to be notified when complaints have arisen concerning the embargo of the property of natives of Cuba naturalized as American citizens, that they might justify their political conduct before the authorities in his presence; but the fact is that, up to this time, this has not even been attempted; and, on the contrary, they have pretended that their justification should be made through the medium of the American authorities, as if such an intrusion of the jurisdiction of one state on the dominions of another were possible. Two of them, nevertheless, have exhibited their extreme ignorance by presenting a certificate signed by Don José Miguel Aldama, as president of the so-called Cuban Junta, of New York, and verified before a notary public of that city, to prove that they have never taken part in the operations of the junta. To crown all, this document was presented to one of the authorities of Cuba by the consul of the United States, under instructions, it is said, from his Government. This, however, is not the occasion to comment upon this fact, to which I have called the attention of His Highness the Regent, and instructions have been sent to our representative in Washington. You will find a copy of both documents annexed.

So much concerning the embargoes; as for the American citizens, the very list which you were pleased to append to your note makes it patent that natives of the United States are not concerned, but naturalized Cubans. The former, with very few exceptions, according to the information furnished by the authorities of Cuba, have conducted themselves as honest men who attended to their own affairs, respecting the laws of the country they have chosen for their residence. With regard to such persons, in the exceptional case of the arrest of one of them, the judgment of the courts has been followed by a pardon, (indulto), and he has been placed at the disposition of the consul of his nation.

The latter, that is, the naturalized Cubans, have, on the contrary, sought in a foreign nationality a defense against the rigor of the law; they have shown themselves to be arrogant; they have caused trouble, and they have succeeded in creating complications between government and government.

Returning, lastly, to the views which I have previously had the honor to make known to you in reply to your note, and in answer to the allegations therein contained, I have to state that the course of the authorities of Cuba, in the investigation of cases and in the execution of sentences, has been as prudent and as considerate as the extraordinary and anomalous circumstances through which the island of Cuba was passing would allow. This is demonstrated by the circulars of the 3d of May and the 5th of July, 1869, directed to the governors and commanders, strictly enjoining upon them the observance of the most equitable principles in all their acts, and more especially in those relating to subjects of friendly nations. And notwithstanding that the state of insurrection demanded recourse to extreme measures, the superior authorities directed that the necessity should be manifest before taking steps against foreigners, notifying them that in case they should be obliged to effect the arrest of such, proceedings should be immediately instituted according to the gravity of the offense, and information of the facts given to the superior authority; and the facility with which all classes of reclamations were heard became so great, that a simple note to the consuls, even without signature, was sufficient to cause the claims therein presented to be considered and acted upon. The various communications of the consuls to the superior civil governor, conveying their acknowledgments of the attention with which the complaints and reclamations of those they represented had been heard, are a striking proof of this, and are alone a refutation of the accusations which have been preferred. The government holds possession of these documents, and is ready to exhibit them.

To prove that the seventh article of the treaty of 1795 has been infringed, it is necessary that the Government of the United States should designate, with sufficient particularity, the instances in which the convention has been violated; and in order that the Spanish government may do justice to the reclamations of American subjects, it is above all indispensable, firstly, that these should prove their citizenship before the Spanish authorities, and should present their demands in due form in each particular case, since it is not alleged that these requisites have been complied with; and, secondly, that the aggrieved parties should show that they have themselves appeared before some tribunal, or that the consul has made the proper reclamation in their name, and that the Spanish government has failed to make reparation. In any other way, and merely in view of a list of individuals who, for the most part, bear Spanish names and have been regarded as Spaniards, it is impossible, in a legal sense, to know their nationality, and to indemnify them for injuries which are to be imputed only to themselves.

Thus far the embargo in Cuba has been only a preventive proceeding, and its execution a consequence of a purely political measure: it is not based upon any law which ordains the sequestration of property. It is, therefore, no more than an extraordinary means of defense, having for its object to deprive the insurrection of powerful resources for its support. Its execution as a political measure belongs only to the superior governor. The courts of justice thus far are strangers to it, although they decide all questions of right which arise respecting it. To these, therefore, should be addressed the reclamations of those citizens of the United States who claim to have unjustly suffered the embargo of their property.

The formalities above indicated once complied with, the particulars of the several cases mentioned in your note supplied, and the allegations made in support of them duly sustained, the Spanish government will make just reparation to such American citizens as may appear to have been aggrieved.

And, desiring to act under conditions of perfect equity, the government of His Highness will thereupon agree to the appointment of arbitrators named by each of the two nations, to appraise the damages sustained, and to fix the indemnity to be paid therefor.

I improve this opportunity to reiterate to you the assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

PRAXEDES Mo. SEGASTA.

MINISTRY OF STATE.

*Rights of naturalized citizens defined.—Important instructions from the Secretary of State.*DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 3, 1870.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch, No. 30, stating that many cases natives of the island of Cuba, after having been naturalized as citizens of the United States, have returned to Cuba, residing there permanently without making known their change of nationality, and that in some cases they have accepted offices which can only be filled by Spanish subjects, and asking for instructions for guidance in such cases, if your official intervention is solicited.

In answer, I have to say that it is clearly impossible to lay down rules to guide proceedings in all the cases which may be presented.

Both native and naturalized citizens are entitled to the same protection when in foreign countries, and both, in such cases, are ordinarily subject to the laws of those countries, and are obliged to obey those laws in the same way as their own citizens. Subjects have to observe them. If they fix their domicile in foreign countries, they are moreover compelled to observe toward the government of that country the duties and obligations belonging to permanent residents.

It is also quite possible that a naturalized citizen may return to his own country to remain there with the evident intention of residing permanently, or that he may accept offices incompatible with his adopted citizenship, or that he may, for a time, conceal the fact of his naturalization, and pass for a citizen of his native land, until some circumstance leads him to claim the intervention of the land of his adoption, or in some other way he may exhibit the intention of abandoning his acquired rights, and resuming his original citizenship, and absolving the government of his adopted country from the obligation to protect him as a citizen while he remains in his native country.

In the cases which come before you, you are to act with great discretion in determining whether those who solicit your interference have, in good faith, maintained their allegiance to the United States, being assured that this Department will sustain you in carrying out the principles of these instructions.

I am, &c., &c.,

HAMILTON FISH.

[Inclosure No. 2.—Translation.]

MINISTRY OF STATE.

Memorandum of citizens of the United States whose property has been embargoed.

No. 1.—Don José García Angarica.—Does not appear to have been embargoed; however, was a certain Don Manuel, expelled from the jurisdiction of Cardenas, of which he was a native, in consideration of his bad political antecedents, and of having gone to a foreign country without a passport.

No. 2.—Don Joaquín García Angarica.—His property was embargoed because he was in connivance with the individuals forming the Cuban Junta of New York. Adm. Poor having addressed a communication, on the 14th of January of the current year, concerning the removal of the embargo on his estate, answer was made that proof were shown of the inaccuracy of the data in possession of the government, the recommendation of the United States minister would be complied with, and no action taken of the conspiracy and double citizenship. In February, 1869, this individual passed for a Spanish subject, according to the documents presented in applying for a passport, and in January, 1870, he claimed to be an American citizen.

No. 3.—Don Inocencia Casanova.—It is not known to this government that his property was embargoed. Perhaps some reclamation was made of which this government is ignorant, by reason of his being comprehended in the embargo of the property of his brothers, under the belief that he was identified with them.

No. 4.—Don Ramon Criado y Gomez, (sic.)—Of the same nature as the preceding, since a certain Don José Fernandez Criado is the only one embargoed.

No. 5.—Don Joaquin Delgado.—Was a standing member of the Cuban Junta of New York on the 7th April, 1869.

No. 6.—Damford, Rurorton & Co., (sic.)—It does not appear that their property is embargoed; but they have a reclamation pending before the council concerning their implication in Nuevitas with Don Manuel Marquez, whose estates were embargoed, which reclamation will be disposed of as soon as the information asked for is obtained.

No. 7.—Don José de la Cruz Gorin y Pinto, (sic.)—His property was embargoed on account of his being active in New York in favor of the insurrection, and giving large sums to aid it, according to intelligence possessed by this government.

No. 8.—Don Cristobal Madan.—Denounced by the consul as belonging to the Cuban Club in New York; his property was embargoed, but the incorrectness of the information having been subsequently proved, the embargo was removed.

No. 9.—Don Fausta Mora.—His property was embargoed because the consul in New York ascertained that he had contributed sums of money to the insurrection. His good antecedents having been testified to by persons of recognized loyalty, the embargo was removed, and the fact made known in Washington.

No. 10.—Don Martin Muecas, (sic.)—His property was embargoed because of his bad antecedents, and for quitting the island without a passport. He came with the expedition of Narcisca Lopez, in the year 1850, and at present appears to be in New York contributing money to the insurrection. There is no evidence of his American citizenship.

No. 11.—Don Ramon Rivas y Lamar.—This individual took part in the original Cuban Junta established in New York, and continues to be identified with the present club. The consul general of the United States in this place (the Havana) was told, on the 19th of February of this year, that if he were proved to be unconnected with the junta in question, and to have taken no part in its operations, his recommendation would have great weight. His good antecedents having been established by persons of recognized loyalty, the embargo was removed, and the fact made known at Washington.

No. 12.—John C. Rozas.—It does not appear that this individual's property has been embargoed.

No. 13.—Moses Taylor & Co.—It does not appear that their property has been embargoed, and there is only a reclamation concerning a large portion of the embargoed property of Don Antonio Fernandez Bramosio, a member of the Cuban Junta of New York since its foundation, said to have been purchased by them. This proceeding is under examination, to ascertain the legality of the purchase.

A correct copy.

No. 2.

MINISTRY OF STATE.

Memorandum of the citizens of the United States who have been imprisoned, (incomunicados.)

No. 1.—Don José Vicente Brito.—Was arrested in this city under suspicion of disloyalty February 12, 1869, and set at liberty on the 14th.

No. 2.—Don Teodoro Cabias.—Arraigned for complicity in the assassinations which took place in this capital on the 12th of February, 1869. The case having been abandoned so far as he was concerned, the audiencia decided that he might be proceeded against as a vagrant. The case being opened, the American consul presented himself, and asked that he might be released, alleging that he was a citizen of the United States, and he was given up to him on condition of quitting the country. This individual was a telegraphic operator employed by the government, to which he had taken an oath of fidelity.

No. 3.—Don Emilio Carada, (sic.)—Was arrested with several others in Cienfuegos on suspicion of disloyalty, and set at liberty in a few days because no motive was found for proceeding against him.

No. 4.—Don Lucas A. de Castro.—Was arrested at Trinidad at the beginning of last year, and sent to the Peninsula as a political exile. He was deeply implicated in the insurrection. He was a captain of volunteers in Trinidad, and resigned a few days before the movement broke out in that district. Neither he nor the American consul at that place made any allegation concerning his citizenship.

No. 5.—Don Gabriel Suarez de Villar, (sic.)—Was arrested at Trinidad on the same day as the preceding, and under like circumstances. The American consul demanded his release, pretending to establish his rights as an American citizen. Proceedings were instituted, and it was shown that the said individual obtained a certificate of American citizenship in 1854. He then went to reside in Trinidad, where he exercised his profession as a lawyer without having competently established his right to practice; was justice of the peace and syndic of the town council. He was prosecuted for having held offices forbidden to foreigners, when he proved that he had renounced his American citizenship. The audiencia of this island made the same decision.

No. 6.—Don James M. Edwards.—Was arrested at Manzanillo the 23d of November 1868, and was proceeded against for being in communication with the insurgents. The charge was abandoned, being unsupported, and he was set at liberty the 31st of January, 1869.

No. 7.—Don Carlos Jemot (sic).—Was arrested at Trinidad for being in connivance with the insurgents, and condemned, by a council of war, to imprisonment for life. He was pardoned, turned over to his consul, and went back to his country.

No. 8.—Mr. Duglass McGregor, (sic).—Was arrested at Trinidad, accused of conveying supplies and information to the insurgents, and of having been several times in the encampment. He was sentenced to death. He was pardoned and turned over to his consul, who sent him back to his country.

No. 9.—Don Thomas Miranda.—Was arrested at Guanajay for disloyalty, (infidencia). He was sentenced to be transported from the island, and in consequence was sent to the Isle of Pines. He produced no documents to show his American citizenship, and only stated that he was a native of Saint Augustine, in Florida.

No. 10.—Mr. John Rosas, (sic).—Arrested in the district of Guanabacoa for an attempt at sedition in the district of Santiago de las Vegas. He was sent to Fernando Po where he escaped.

No. 11.—Don Alberta Simons, (sic).—Was arrested at Puerto Principe, accused of having spoken against the nation in public conversation. A manuscript document was found in his possession highly offensive to the throne of Spain and inciting to insurrection. The consul of his nation in this capital having alleged that he considered his offence (falta) sufficiently punished by the imprisonment he had suffered, the case was abandoned, and he was set at liberty, being placed at the consul's disposition.

No. 12.—Doña Maria Spotuna, (sic), Doña Aurelia, and Doña Elisa Cudlipp.—Were arrested at Trinidad, accused of giving aid to the insurgents. They were condemned by a council of war, the first and the third to confinement during the existing state of affairs, and the second to ten years' imprisonment. The consul of the United States having made representations in their favor, they were pardoned on condition of leaving the country.

No. 13.—Don Carlos Polhamus, (sic).—Arrested in Santa Cruz del Sur, in the act of communicating with the insurgents. He was tried by a council of war and convicted, and having confessed his crime, was shot. After his execution, a chest was found on board a coasting steamer, containing correspondence from the junta of New York to Céspedes, addressed to this Polhamus.

No. 14.—Don Sebastian Pintado.—Arrested at Matanzas for holding meetings of colored people in his house, to whom he read incendiary publications. He was set at liberty, and turned over to his consul to be sent out of the country.

No. 15.—Don Angel Morales y Armas, (sic).—Arrived at this port in the steamer Colombia from New York, where he had become an American citizen, and, upon information that he held a commission from the Cuban Junta, he was arrested and was expelled from the island within three days, and sent to his adopted country.

No. 16.—Don Juan Alberto Machado, (sic).—Was arrested, on arriving from New York for carrying correspondence from members of the junta, and subversive publications. He was set at liberty on condition of leaving the country. Documents were found on him by which he appeared to be an American citizen and a subject of Brazil.

No. 17.—Don Gregoria Gonzalez.—Was arrested in this capital for subversive language, and sentenced by a council of war to one year's imprisonment. It does not appear from the evidence that he alleged his citizenship of the United States, neither did the counsel make any representations.

No. 18.—Don Pedro Pachot, (sic).—Was arrested, July 23, 1869, on landing from a steamer that brought him from the United States, for carrying correspondence in violation of the postal regulations, which related to the insurrection, and was set at liberty on the 29th.

No. 19.—Don José Ponce de Leon, (sic).—Was arrested at Cardenas, accused of being an agitator, and was shown to be the ringleader of a rising which was to have taken place in that district. He was transported to Fernando Po. His American citizenship was not shown.

No. 20.—Don José Maria Ortega.—His arrest was ordered because of information that he was engaged in a conspiracy in Pinar del Rio. He resided in this capital awhile and was set at liberty. It does not appear that he alleged his American citizenship.

No. 21.—Don Juan Franco, Portuondo, (sic).—Was arrested, with others, in Santiago de Cuba because it was discovered that he was in connivance with the insurgents in the field. While being removed with the rest to the mill of San Juan, in El Cobre, he attempted to escape, and was fired at by those having him in charge, and was killed. This individual was expelled from Cuba in 1855, and in the following year his wife presented a petition, praying that he might be allowed to return on condition of renouncing his American citizenship, which was refused; but having returned from the United States to this city, he was permitted to remain in Cuba, on condition of making a formal renunciation of his citizenship, which was done upon his own petition.

No. 22.—Don Agustin Sta. Rosa, (sic.)—Was arrested in this capital toward the close of 1868, for being implicated in the insurrection, and was brought before a court-martial. Being set at liberty, in consequence of General Dulce's decree of amnesty, he was one of those concerned in the robbery of the steamer Comanditaria.

No. 23.—Don Carlos Speakman, (sic.)—Was one of the filibusters landed by the schooner Grapeshot, (sic.) being taken with arms in his hands, he was shot by virtue of the sentence of a council of war.

No. 24.—Albert Werth, (sic.)—The same grounds and the same results as in the preceding case.

No. 25.—Don Emilia de Silra.—Was arrested at Nuevitas, accused of being in communication with the enemy when found in the outskirts of that town, and was forced to remove his residence to this capital.

No. 26.—Don Rafael Estrada.—There is no evidence that any person of this name has been arrested, and there only appears to be one Don Esteban Estrada, a ringleader, who was pardoned.

No. 27.—Don Renu Fritot, (sic.)—There is no evidence that any person of this name has been arrested.

No. 28.—Don John E. Powers.—Was arrested at Sancti Spiritus upon indication or having intentionally thrown from the track the train under his charge as engineer, at the very time when a large body of the enemy made an attack on twelve soldiers, on the same line of railway and near the scene of the accident, of whom six were killed and four escaped.

No. 29.—Don James Tate.—Arrested at Trinidad for the crime of sedition, (insidencia.) Claimed by the consul general of the United States, in this city, as a subject of his nation. Information was asked for from the authorities, and they stated that no such American citizen appears in the registry made by the consul at that place on the 9th of April of last year; that he is a native of the United States, but that he has resided there more than fifty years.

No. 30.—Don J. A. Schultz, (sic.)—There is no evidence to show that any person of this name has been arrested.

SUPERIOR POLITICAL GOVERNMENT OF THE ISLAND OF CUBA—SECRETARY'S OFFICE—CIVIL BUSINESS.

EXCELLENT SIR: On the 29th of September of last year I ordered the embargo of the property of Don Ramon Rivas y Lamar, a native of Matanzas, who, according to information from the consul of Spain at New York, was connected with the Cuban Club, conspiring against the integrity of the nation. Mr. H. C. Hall, consul of the United States in this place, on the 10th of February, presented a memorandum, calling attention to the embargo in question, and stating that he was instructed by the Department of State to advocate this person's claims, not merely as an American subject, but also because the Department had reason to believe that Rivas was in no way connected with the insurrection. This declaration would have been sufficient to cause the adoption of a favorable decision, especially as the good relations which unite our government with that of the United States led me to give much weight to the recommendations presented in favor of the subjects of that country, as I have demonstrated on repeated occasions; but the same consideration toward a friendly nation made it necessary to establish the justification of the order of embargo pronounced against Rivas.

There is no evidence here that this individual is an American subject; he quitted the Havana with a Spanish passport; he left his property in charge of Don Augusto Claret, and the latter, in a preliminary judicial proceeding instituted by him in Matanzas, sustained the rights of Rivas as a native, making no mention of his having taken out naturalization papers in any other country; so that the said Rivas y Lamar is one of those who, to suit their private convenience, provide themselves with two distinct.

nationalities; and as experience has shown that many natives of the island of Cuba consider their legal or illegal naturalization in the United States as a shield for conspiring against this government or for open rebellion, this circumstance alone would render Rivas suspected, he being a member of the Cuban Club of New York, in which he has shown himself to be an enthusiastic patriot, and ready to adopt a third nationality.

The embargo in this case is perfectly regular. A Spanish subject, whose estates are registered as Spanish property, who has not renounced his rights of nationality nor given notice to any authority of his intention to change it, should be considered as a Spaniard, and suffer the consequences of the dualism in the same way as he gained its advantages by concealing it; therefore, from the moment it became known that he formed part of an association organized to disturb the peace of the island, sustaining and furthering the rebellion of a portion of its inhabitants, he became necessarily comprised in the decree of the 20th of April, 1869.

Nevertheless, in deference to the Government of the United States, answer was made to the memorandum of Mr. Hall, informing him of the facts stated above, and adding that if the person interested, whose political views are pretty well known here, should establish that he is not an enemy of Spain, and that he has taken no part in the revolution, whereby the inaccuracy of the information given by the Spanish consul should appear, the case would be taken into consideration.

The Government of the United States ought to be satisfied that it is my desire to receive this justification, since I can show, and your excellency will sustain me, that many persons residing abroad who have reclaimed directly against the provisions of the embargo, presenting justification for their conduct, have been immediately heard and put in possession of all their property, as the embargoes are preventive; in this being the case, there was the more reason for believing that my authority would favorably receive a petition supported and recommended by a friendly government.

Under these circumstances, your excellency will judge of my surprise on receiving intelligence that the consul of the United States, Mr. Biddle, had addressed himself not to my authority, but to the general superintendent of the treasury; and on examination of the documents submitted, which were drawn up by a notary public of New York, instead of being prepared in the Spanish consulate, there was found a certificate from Don Miguel Aldama, as president of the Central Republican Junta of Cuba and Porto Rico, that Rivas y Lamar had not taken part in the revolution.

I do not believe that there is any example of a similar occurrence in the interchange of dispatches between friendly governments, nor can I conceive how an act so opposite to all conventional rules could have taken place.

I would like to know, although the case is very different, since in the struggle in the United States a state of war was declared, how one of the authorities of the Federal Government would have acted on receiving from a foreign consul certificates for J. Davis exculpating some person who was being tried as a rebel. I suppose the result that would have been done would have been the return of the papers, treating them as though not received, although not considering their presentation offensive. I looked these documents, which, not having reached me through any authorized channel, can only serve as a curious and perhaps unique example of the forgetfulness of established customs, but shall make the occurrence known to the government.

Apart from this incident, as the investigations made here show that Don Ramon Rivas y Lamar left the Havana on the 11th of April, 1869, duly authorized as a Spanish subject; that, on the testimony of persons of honor and veracity, he stood high in public estimation, and has filled several offices to the general satisfaction, without being thought disaffected to the Spanish government; and that, on the other hand, Spanish residents in New York give him credit for good conduct, I have determined to raise the embargo on his property.

I state this to your excellency for your information and such action as you may deem proper. May God guard your excellency many years.

HAVANA, 28th of July, 1870.

His Excellency the MINISTER OF THE COLONIES.

[Inclosure 4.No.—Translation.]

SUPERIOR POLITICAL GOVERNMENT OF THE ISLAND OF CUBA—SECRETARY'S OFFICE

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: In a communication of this date I inform your excellency of the singular presentation, to the general superintendent of the treasury, of certain documents relative to the embargo of the property of Don Ramon Rivas y Lamar. At the same time, and in the proper manner, others were submitted on the part of Don Francisco Mora by the consul general of the United States, Mr. Biddle, to establish that he had taken no part in the Cuban insurrection.

The considerations which I advance to your excellency with respect to the former are also applicable to Mora.

Far from there being any official proof that this individual is an American subject, there is on record in his case a statement presented in his name by Don Juan J. Jerome, in which he asks to be supplied with a certified copy of the will of Don Maximo José, his father, without the certificate of marriage, as he would be obliged to make use of it abroad. The application was signed on the 18th of January, 1870; and if Mora at that time considered himself a foreigner in the United States, he contradicts his assertion that he was naturalized there, or rather proves that he is one of the many Cubans who, for their personal ends, provide themselves with two nationalities, and make indiscriminate use of the one most convenient. His asking for a document in which his marriage is not shown, also gauges the amount of respect it merits under the laws of either country. I would have wished that the preventive embargo upon his property, imposed by me on the 18th of February, should be approved and justified, as levied on a Spaniard residing abroad; but, in view of your excellency's information, which modifies that furnished by the consul at New York, I have decided to remit the said embargo, and inform you of it, that the proper action may be taken.

May God guard your excellency many years.

HAVANA, 28th of July, 1870.

[Translation.]

MINISTRY OF STATE,
Madrid, September 15, 1870.

SIR: I have the honor to make known to you that, according to a communication which I have received from the captain general of Cuba, dated the 12th of August last, the American citizen John Powers, who figured in the memorandum annexed to your note of the 26th of July ultimo as imprisoned in Sancti Spiritus, was set at liberty on the 18th of May of this year, and is at present residing in Trinidad.

I improve this opportunity to reiterate to you the assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

PRAXEDES Mo. SAGASTA.

The MINISTER Plenipotentiary of the UNITED STATES.

MINISTRY OF STATE,
Madrid, September 29, 1870.

SIR: In continuation of the statement I had the honor to make to you under date of the 15th instant, I have to-day to add, referring to a dispatch from the captain general of Cuba, of the 24th of August ultimo, that, according to a report from the deputy governor of Trinidad, Mr. J. A. Schultz, who figures in the memorandum which accompanied your note of the 26th of July as a prisoner, is not nor has ever been under arrest, the American vice-consul in that city stating officially that he has no information in the matter, and knows nothing about that person.

As for Mr. James Tate, who also figures in your memorandum, he was arrested on the 9th of April last, for being implicated in a case of disloyalty, (infidencia), and ordered to undergo precautionary detention in his own house on the 5th of the following month, where he remained till the termination of the trial. It is to be noticed that he did not allege his American citizenship, doubtless because he had been a resident of Trinidad for more than forty years, and that his name does not appear in the list previously furnished by the American vice-consul to the government authorities.

I improve this opportunity to reiterate to you the assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

PRAXEDES Mo. SAGASTA.

The MINISTER Plenipotentiary of the UNITED STATES.

APPENDIX D.

SAN ILDEFONSO, September 25, 1870.

MY DEAR SIR: A careful perusal of your note of the 12th instant, in reply to mine of the 26th of July last, leaves me in doubt as to the meaning of the last paragraph. Inasmuch as I attach great importance to the correct appreciation of the phraseology in question, I will thank you to inform me whether I am right in understanding you to say that arbitrators may be now appointed to fix the indemnity for damages alleged in my note to have been sustained by American citizens.

Trusting that I have correctly interpreted your meaning, and that thereby the questions presented may be speedily put in the way of adjustment, I shall await your reply with solicitude.

If you will kindly send your answer to the legation in Madrid it will be promptly forwarded to me here.

Sincerely yours,

D. E. SICKLES.

His Excellency Sr. Don PRAXEDES MO. SAGASTA,

Jefe, Jefe, Jefe, Madrid.

APPENDIX E.

MINISTRY OF STATE.

MY ESTEEMED GENERAL: With much pleasure I hasten to reply to your favor of the 25th, concerning the meaning which should be given to the last paragraph of my note of the 12th instant, in answer to that which I had the honor to receive from your legation dated the 26th of July.

In that paragraph the Spanish government stated that, desiring to proceed in the matter of the reclamations in a spirit of perfect equity, it will accept the designation of arbitrators when the claimants shall have complied with the previous formalities to which the preceding paragraphs refer, and any American subjects may appear to be actually injured. The formalities which Spain desires to see complied with before the American citizens who present the reclamation are explained in my note referred to; they are to establish their status as North American citizens before the Spanish authorities; they are to make their demands in due form in each particular case; those who now allege that they are aggrieved are to establish that the necessary reclamations have been presented by them personally before some tribunal, or that the consular authorities have done so in their name, without the same having been considered by the Spanish government. This procedure having been conformed to, if it appears that they have been unjustly injured in their interests or in their rights, then the arbitrators, named above, will proceed to estimate the damages sustained and fix the indemnity which is to be paid. With this explanation, I think, will be dispelled the doubt you express to me concerning the meaning of the paragraph cited; but if you should desire any explanation respecting that or any other of my note, I will take the greatest pleasure in making it.

I am, &c.,

PRAXEDES MO. SAGASTA.

Sr. Don D. E. SICKLES.

APPENDIX F.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Madrid, October 14, 1870.

SIR: The reply to my note of the 26th of July last, which your excellency has done me the honor to address to me, under date of the 12th ultimo, was received, with its inclosures, at this legation on the 13th. I have also had the honor to receive the several supplemental communications on the same subject addressed to me by your excellency on the 15th and 20th of the past month. After giving the most attentive consideration to the arguments and conclusions presented therein, I regret to find that they do not appear to answer the reasonable and just representations I had the honor to submit to your excellency in obedience to the instructions of my Government. It will, perhaps, be useful to recapitulate the principal subjects to which the attention of your excellency was invited in my note of the 26th of July last. These embraced—

First. A reference to certain proclamations and decrees emanating from the superior civil and military authorities in Cuba, which, in the judgment of my Government, put in jeopardy the persons and property of peaceful and law-abiding citizens of the United States within the limits of that territory.

Second. The remonstrance made by direction of the President against the execution of those orders and decrees in a manner prejudicial to the rights belonging to American citizens within Spanish jurisdiction.

Third. A statement of the grievances of certain citizens of the United States, who, in the execution of the decree of embargo, had been wrongfully deprived of real and personal property of great value, in violation of international law, and of the provisions of Article VII of the treaty of 1795 between the United States and Spain.

Fourth. A request for the restoration to the aggrieved parties of their embargoed estates.

Fifth. A further statement of injuries suffered by certain other American citizens arrested and imprisoned without sufficient or probable cause, some of whom had been unreasonably detained for a long time without trial, and others subjected to extreme penalties without due process of law, contrary to the stipulations of the aforesaid treaty.

Sixth. A further request that the citizens of the United States so held in custody be released, or immediately tried by a court of justice in the manner provided for by the said convention between the two nations.

Seventh. Reclamations for indemnity to citizens of the United States whose property has been arbitrarily seized and appropriated by the Spanish authorities, and likewise to those who have suffered personal injuries by reason of unjustifiable detention and punishment.

Eighth. A suggestion that the respective governments appoint agents to sit in Washington, to ascertain and fix the sum which the claimants should severally receive in compensation for the damages they have sustained; and—

Ninth. The earnest desire of the President, in the interest of the continued good understanding the United States Government wishes to maintain with Spain, that His Highness the Regent would delegate to the representative of Spain in Washington, or to some one of its public agents in the United States or Cuba, the needful power to arrange with the Government of the United States the class of questions so constantly arising in Cuba between the two countries, of which numerous examples are found in the recent correspondence between this legation and the ministry over which your excellency so worthily presides. The President has observed with regret that no response is made to this last-mentioned appeal to the friendly sentiments of the government of His Highness the Regent. Until quite a recent date certain extraordinary powers have been vested in the Spanish minister at Washington, authorizing him in conjunction with the superior political authority in Cuba to adjust questions incident to the intercourse between that island and the United States. And although these means have not always proved effectual for the prevention or settlement of controversies growing out of the peculiar condition of affairs in Cuba, the expedient has not unfrequently been found useful in facilitating the more prompt and satisfactory arrangement of questions that might otherwise have attained larger proportions. It is true that Mr. Roberts, in his note under date of the 24th of June last, informing the Secretary of State that the government of His Highness the Regent had withdrawn from the Spanish legation in Washington the special powers it had before exercised with reference to this particular class of subjects, gave as the reason for this modification of his instructions that, in the judgment of the Spanish government, the improved situation of affairs in Cuba rendered the continuance of these faculties no longer necessary. This announcement would have been more satisfactory to my government if it had been accompanied by some assurance that the extraordinary measures adopted by the authorities in Cuba, purporting to have for their object the pacification of the island, had likewise been countermanded or revoked. It is notorious that the struggle for independence is still maintained by the insurgents, and if their strength be measured by the force employed and understood to be in preparation to be employed against them, it is reasonable to assume that some time must elapse before the contest can be terminated. The President had, therefore, indulged the hope that while the Spanish authorities in Cuba were clothed with apparently unlimited power over persons and property in that colony, a corresponding discretion, with appropriate instructions, would be given to those authorities, enabling them to remove just causes of complaint on the part of the Government of the United States when their citizens are wrongfully or inadvertently injured in the execution of orders and decrees called forth by the civil commotion unhappily afflicting a Spanish possession so contiguous to the United States, and with which our intercourse is so constant and extensive.

Nor can the Government of the United States be otherwise than painfully impressed by the action of the Spanish government in the matter of the arrest and unreasonable detention in close custody of citizens of the United States without trial; and likewise, concerning the restoration of property seized and taken from American citizens without sufficient cause shown, and in violation as well of international law and of the ordinary practice of nations, as of Article VII of the treaty of 1795 between the United States and Spain. I do not now address myself to the question of indemnity in these cases, nor to the inquiry whether acts of spoliation upon the property of American citizens are contrary to the provisions of the treaty of 1795; these propositions will be considered presently in their proper order. I refer rather to the request made in the name of my Government that the property of certain citizens of the United States, heretofore designated with all needful particularity, arbitrarily taken from them without authority of law or judicial inquiry, should be restored to the possession of its rightful owners; and also to the further request that citizens of the United States, whose nationality is affirmed by my Government, arrested and held in close confinement in Cuba without trial, be either at once released or allowed a fair hearing before a judicial tribunal, in order that their innocence or guilt may appear.

My Government has not overlooked the consideration that involuntary injuries may sometimes happen to individuals in critical times, when the exigencies of a political convulsion, rather than the requirements of justice or the maxims of law, control the action of the public authorities. Ample allowance has been made likewise for the indiscretion of subordinate military and municipal officers, whose ill-directed zeal cannot always be regulated. Nevertheless, the President could not doubt that when the attention of the government of His Highness the Regent should be called to such of those occurrences as had involved serious injuries to American citizens, sufficient reparation would be promptly accorded.

Instances have no doubt occurred of Spanish subjects, exiled for political reasons from Cuba, who have forgotten, in the ardor of a desire to promote the independence of their native land, their obligation to obey the neutrality laws of the country whose hospitality they enjoyed. And although it must be confessed that history abounds in examples of similar indiscretion on the part of exiles who have afterward been welcomed home again as the benefactors of their country, yet the Government of the United States, so far from yielding to sympathies which might have excused a more lenient course, has rigorously exacted from these unfortunate offenders the strict penalty of their illegal enterprises.

The removal of the embargo in certain cases referred to by your excellency, where it appeared that the owners were foreigners, carried with it the admission of a right to indemnity. The release of property wrongfully taken and detained does not atone for the injury done. As to the reclamations in all such cases at least, it is manifest that the preliminaries named by your excellency are already complied with, the nationality of the parties having been satisfactorily shown to the Spanish authorities, and the application to them for redress having had no other result than the mere release of the estates without compensation for the damage sustained. These observations are likewise applicable to the instances in which prosecutions inconsiderately begun have been afterward abandoned and the parties discharged from custody upon representations made by American consuls. The reparation is incomplete without indemnity and the innocence and nationality of the accused seem to have been acknowledged.

I am not unmindful of the suggestion offered by your excellency that, the embargo being a penalty for an offense, the vindication of the accused cannot begin with the remission of the sentence. To this it may be replied, that a party should not be punished for an alleged crime before he is arraigned. Your excellency admits that these embargoes in Cuba are not based on any law which sanctions the sequestration of property; that the courts of justice have thus far been strangers to these proceedings, as that they have been enforced only by the executive authority. And if it is found difficult to reconcile the restoration of property to its owner with a justification of the act of seizure, the task will not be easier when it is undertaken to show that an offense has been committed when no law has been transgressed, or that the punishment which should only follow the judgment of a legal tribunal can be justly inflicted without a trial or even an information presented to any court having cognizance of misdemeanors. With reference to the request of the President, that American citizens imprisoned in Cuba upon mere suspicion of an intent to offend the laws should be either released or brought to trial under the guarantees and with the rights secured by the treaty of 1795 to persons charged with crime, your excellency observes that it is patent on the list of names of those heretofore arrested, appended to my note of July 26, that they are not natives of the United States, but naturalized Cubans. The Government of the United States cannot discriminate between native-born and adopted citizens of the republic in demanding equal and due respect for all alike, whether at home or abroad. When an adopted citizen of the United States returns temporarily to his birth-place, whether called there by ties of affection for parents and kindred, or to give needful attention to business affairs, or by reason of infirmities or bereavement, or for any legitimate purpose, he retains his acquired nationality unimpaired, and with it the right to the protection of his adopted country, unless he voluntarily resumes his former allegiance. This principle has been consistently asserted by the Government of the United States from the beginning of its history. In the early part of the present century the American rule on this subject was maintained by the United States, even at the cost of war with one of the most formidable of the European powers. England and Prussia have signified their adhesion to the same doctrine, and so general is the acquiescence of other powers in this just view of the right of expatriation, that it may now be regarded as definitely engrafted upon the code of international law. It is true that when either native or adopted citizens of one country enter the jurisdiction of another they are bound to obey the laws and respect the sovereignty of the nation whose hospitality they enjoy; and that for any offense they may commit they are amenable to the same penalties that might be lawfully imposed upon them if they were citizens or subjects thereof.

On the other hand, this duty of obedience to the laws, and respect for the authorities of a foreign commonwealth in which a stranger may find himself, is associated with another corresponding obligation, no less imperative on all governments, which is, that their authority shall be exerted, when necessary, for his protection, and that, in the event of his being accused of misdemeanor, he shall not be unreasonably detained, nor denied a fair and impartial trial before the established tribunals of justice. With regard to the citizens and subjects respectively of the United States and Spain, their rights and duties within the territory of each other are amply defined in this identical sense by Articles VI, VII, VIII, IX, X, XI, and XX of the treaty of 1795, to which I have the honor to invite the attention of your excellency.

Your excellency seems to have assumed not only that naturalized citizens of the United States of Spanish birth, who have again placed themselves within the territory of Spain, have no right to the protection of their adopted country; but also that all persons within Spanish jurisdiction, bearing Spanish names, are Spaniards. These assumptions have frequently betrayed the authorities of Cuba into mistakes prejudicial to the interests of individuals and embarrassing to both governments. There are many thousands of native-born Americans whose names are of Spanish origin. Most of them belong to families originally residing in the States of Louisiana, Florida, Texas, California, Nevada, and Colorado, and in the Territory of New Mexico, all of which, as their names suggest, were formerly Spanish settlements. Indeed it may be said that nearly all of the surnames known in the United States, although appertaining to families who have from generation to generation been citizens of the republic, are of European origin, and were borne by ancestors who had migrated from one or another of the European states. So that your excellency will at once see how fallacious is the inference that persons coming from the United States who have European names are not Americans. Nor can it be taken for granted, without great risk of error, that naturalized citizens of the United States who bear Spanish names have been Spanish subjects, and much less that they are natives of Cuba. A very considerable number of persons of Mexican, Peruvian, Chilean, Brazilian, and Colombian birth, not to mention the inhabitants of other North American states, have become citizens of the United States. Your excellency will therefore acknowledge, I am sure, that there is no presumption to be raised against the American nationality of the list of aggrieved persons I have transmitted because many of their names are Spanish; nor, I trust, will that circumstance be deemed any longer sufficient to justify the demand of other evidence of their nationality than the official affirmation of the Government of the United States that they are American citizens.

My Government receives with satisfaction the testimony kindly borne by your excellency to the good conduct of the American-born residents in Cuba; and I am sure the President would be glad to convince himself of the accuracy of your excellency's impression of the indulgence represented to have been uniformly extended to them by the authorities of the island.

I regret to have occasion to observe, however, that in numerous instances Americans have been arrested without cause, and when, after months of painful imprisonment, some of them have been released, no proof of their misconduct having appeared, they have been expelled from Cuba with serious pecuniary loss; and for such arrest, confinement, and expulsion, they have an indisputable claim to indemnity. Among these cases may be mentioned, for example, those of James M. Edwards, Dr. A. T. Simmons, John E. Powers, F. A. Schultz, and James Tate.

For the sake of illustration I may cite the particulars of one or two of this class of cases, taking for this purpose those especially referred to in your excellency's supplemental note of the 20th ultimo, and whose claims to indemnity do not appear to be recognized. Mr. F. A. Schultz, an American contractor, engaged in furnishing cross-ties to the Havana Railway Company, was arrested at Madruga, August 25, 1869, charged with having said, in a conversation about the insurrection, that he "would bet $200 it would not terminate, because it was gaining ground;" and that in speaking of a patriotic ball to be given he remarked that "for that purpose he would give nothing, but that he would do so for the poor." Certain marks tattooed on his arm were also regarded as suspicious. Mr. Schultz was at the time ill and under treatment for a bronchial affection; he was nevertheless hurried away, refused permission to take with him a change of clothing, or even necessary medicines, and was placed in close confinement in a damp cell. The United States consul at Matanzas, in reporting the case to his Government, remarks: "It seems incredible that any one should be subjected to such harsh treatment on charges so trivial, or that what he is alleged to have said could be tortured or construed into subversive language." The United States consul general at the Havana submits the following suggestions to the Secretary of State with reference to the arrest of Schultz: "I wish," says Mr. Plumb, "to call your special attention to this case as illustrating the insecurity that now exists for foreigners throughout the interior of this island, away from the immediate protection of the chief authority, and the danger they are in of arrest upon unfounded charges, instigated by the prejudice or malevolence of ignorant and vicious persons. The case is one that appears to demand that redress should be made." In the supplemental note, dated the 20th ultimo, which I had the honor to receive from your excellency, it is stated upon the authority of a dispatch from the captain general of Cuba, of the 24th of August ultimo, that, "According to a report from the deputy governor of Trinidad, Mr. F. A. Schultz, who figures as a prisoner in the memorandum which accompanied my note of the 26th of July, is not, nor has ever been, in arrest, the American vice-consul in that city stating officially that he has no information about the matter and knows nothing of that person." If these inquiries had been made at Madruga, where the arrest was made, or of Mr. Hall, the United States consul at Matanzas, who reported it, or of the consul general at the Havana, who brought the case officially to the notice of the captain general in September of last year, the investigation would, perhaps, have been more successful than could have been expected in Trinidad.

The case of Mr. James Tate is not less instructive. The United States consul at Trinidad de Cuba, in a dispatch dated May 1, 1870, states that Mr. Tate is an American-born citizen, about seventy years of age, who has been in ill health for many years past; that he bears an excellent reputation in Trinidad de Cuba, where he has resided more than fifty years; that he was arrested on April 30th last, at night, thrown into prison, where he was held incomunicado; no reasons were given for the arrest, which made a profound impression in the city, where his high character and very reserved disposition were well known. The consul interceded repeatedly with the governor and the fiscal in the hope of obtaining at least some limit to the close incarceration of the venerable and infirm person, as it was apprehended that the confinement and disgrace would prove fatal to him in his feeble condition. The consul reports that the fiscal does not hesitate to state "that he is convinced of the innocence of Mr. Tate of the charge against him, but that all the usual formalities of incomunicacion, trial, &c., may be gone through with before he can be released." In which your excellency may see another instance of that amplitude of powers for acts of severity and the lack of authority to alleviate them, which unfortunately distinguishes the administration of affairs in Cuba. It further appears, by a subsequent report from Mr. Fox, the consul, dated May 27th ultimo, that Mr. Tate having become quite ill he was removed, upon the advice of the physician, after nearly a month of cruel imprisonment, to his own house; and according to the latest official information in the possession of this legation, dated June 8, the trial had not then taken place. I do not fail to take note of the statement communicated in your excellency's note of the 20th ultimo, that Mr. Tate was "implicated in a case of disloyalty and ordered to undergo precautionary detention in his own house on the 5th of May, where he remained until the termination of the trial." I should have been under additional obligation if your excellency had been so good as to inform me when the trial took place, and the result of it, so far as Mr. Tate is concerned. It was not my purpose in the note I had the honor to address to your excellency on July 3d, when referring to the proclamation of General Valmaseda, to make any representation concerning it, as it was known to have been revoked by superior authority; the reference was merely introductory to the subjects which it was the object of that communication to bring to the notice of the Spanish government, and to show, in connection with other decrees and orders, the general character of the measures taken by the authorities in Cuba, which seemed liable to be enforced in a manner prejudicial to the persons and property of citizens of the United States. While I shall, therefore, excuse myself from replying to the observations of your excellency in regard to Count Valmaseda's order, I must at least express my dissent from the observation that precedents for it are found in the conduct of hostilities by the Government of the United States in suppressing the late rebellion. No life was sacrificed by the Union forces; that struggle save in open and fair combat. Prisoners of war were paroled or exchanged, or, if held, were treated according to the usages of war. There was no appropriation or destruction of property not immediately and necessarily incident to the movement of armies in the field. While care was taken to respect the persons and effects of foreigners domiciled within the theater of military operations, if these were inadvertently injured their right to reparation was promptly acknowledged. The citations given by your excellency from the "Instructions for the Armies in the Field" issued by Mr. Stanton, Secretary of War during the conflict, do not in any manner justify the style of war embodied in Count Valmaseda's order. The fifteenth article which is quoted, is a concise statement of the rights of armies in the field in time of war, which each party to the contest may lawfully exercise, subject to the reclamations of other nations when the persons of neutrals suffer injury or their property is appropriated or destroyed. The eighty-fifth article, likewise cited by your excellency, applies to the inhabitants of conquered territory, occupied by an invading army, who are in arms against it or against the authorities it has established. If the American compilation is entitled to the honor your excellency accords to it of being the first codification of the laws of war, Count Valmaseda's order must have found its inspiration in another epoch, when public opinion had not imposed upon belligerents the amenities of civilization.

The allusion made in my former note to the decree of April 1, 1869, declaring null and void all sales and conveyances of property in the island of Cuba made without the intervention of certain officials, was likewise confined to a mere enumeration of that and other decrees of the same character, which appeared to disregard considerations of interest and convenience to foreign traders having large transactions in the island that should not have been overlooked by the authorities of an important commercial dependency. The views of the Government of the United States in regard to the decree of April 1, 1869, have already been conveyed to the government of His Highness the Regent.

It is, perhaps, unnecessary to pursue the discussion of the true construction and meaning of the seventh article of the treaty of 1795, since it appears to be conceded by your excellency that the property of foreigners is not properly subject to embargo in Cuba; and that the Government of the United States, in asking that the estates and effects of American citizens which have been seized and detained by the authorities in that island may be restored, with just compensation for the losses sustained, only claims "the legitimate privileges which are accorded by international law and treaties to all foreigners."

Moreover, if the classification your excellency has made of these reclamations, based upon the data and official documents in the possession of the Spanish government, shall be found to agree with the testimony on the part of the claimants ready to be produced by my government, and much of which has already been submitted through the consul general at the Havana to the authorities in Cuba, there should be no difficulty in disposing of these claims at once by the prompt and friendly action of the two governments. It is only necessary that the evidence upon which your excellency relies be transmitted to the representative of Spain in Washington, and upon a comparison of the papers and proofs in the hands of the two governments the merits of the several claims for the restoration of the property of American citizens alleged to have been embargoed may be easily and satisfactorily determined.

It would be manifestly useless to engage in further argument upon cases properly belonging to the second and third classifications presented in the reply I have had the honor to receive from your excellency. These are said to comprise the cases of American citizens "whose property has never been embargoed," and of others "to whom, in consideration of their being foreigners, their embargoed estates have been restored to them on the least evidence." With respect to the latter, their American nationality having been already admitted by the Spanish authorities, it only remains that the indemnity to which they are entitled for the loss of the use and income of their property, and for the damage it may have suffered while out of their control, should be ascertained and paid. In regard to the first classification, that is to say, those "claimants who have never acquired a foreign nationality," the Government of the United States will not be found disposed to extend its protection to persons who have not the right to invoke it. It is to be presumed, until the presumption is overcome by proof, that aliens who have deliberately renounced, after an uninterrupted residence of five or more years within the territory of the Union, all allegiance to any other government, and have thereupon become citizens of the United States, are sincere in their solemnly avowed purpose. If it shall be made to appear that any one of the claimants in whose behalf the government of the United States intervenes is not a citizen thereof, or, having been naturalized in conformity with its laws, has by any act of his own forfeited his acquired nationality, or that he has voluntarily relinquished it, your excellency may rest assured that the case of such claimant will be dismissed from the further consideration of the American Government. The Government of the United States, having satisfied itself that the parties in whose behalf reclamations have been addressed to the government of His Highness the Regent are entitled to claim the protection due to American citizens, awaits the production of such proofs as may be exhibited on the part of the Spanish government to show that such protection is not rightfully solicited and granted.

Although, as I have already remarked, the admission of your excellency that it is unnecessary to rely upon the special stipulations of a treaty to exempt a foreigner from the operation of the decree of embargo renders it superfluous to proceed with the discussion of the seventh article of the treaty of 1795 in its relation to that proceeding, I must not refrain from expressing my dissent from the construction given by your excellency to that article. The first clause is the one which relates directly to the questions now under consideration; it is as follows: "And it is agreed that the citizens or subjects of each of the contracting parties, their vessels or effects, shall not be liable to any embargo or detention on the part of the other for any military expedition, or other public or private purpose whatever." Your excellency contends that the estates embargoed have not been taken for any of the objects expressed in the clause cited, and that therefore it has not been violated. If it is meant that the property embargoed has not been taken or detained for "any military expedition," and that consequently this provision of the treaty has not been contravened, I must remind your excellency that the prohibition extends to every possible "public or private purpose" to which an embargo may be applied. The embargo enforced in Cuba is described by your excellency as "an extraordinary means of defense," adopted by the authorities "to deprive the insurrection of powerful resources." It is, then, a military measure, intended to strengthen one party to a conflict and weaken the other. It would therefore seem to be fairly embraced in the particular prohibition relating to military operations, as it is certainly comprehended in the general interdiction of embargoes for any "other public or private purpose whatever." Your excellency is pleased sometimes to regard the embargo in Cuba as a punishment for a crime—that is to say, a judicial act; at other times your excellency describes the proceeding as only a preventive measure of a purely political character; and, again, it is called an extraordinary means of defense, having for its object to deprive the insurrection of resources. But a further and more practical demonstration of the character of the embargo in Cuba is found in the decree of His Highness the Regent, dated on the 12th instant and published in the Gaceta of yesterday. It is therein provided that the proceeds of the sales of embargoed property in Cuba are to be applied toward the support of the government of the colony for the current year. Examined in any aspect, whether military, political, or legal, no justification has been found for the manner in which the executive authorities in Cuba have sequestered the property of American citizens. If the object is to punish offenders against the laws, be it so; then the accused are entitled to a judicial hearing before judgment is pronounced against them. Yet it is confessed that the courts of justice have not been consulted, and that no law authorizes these acts of confiscation. And if by a measure of defense or prevention, whether political or military, it is meant that in order to diminish the means of the insurgents and to augment the resources of the Spanish treasury, the property of citizens of a friendly nation, not residing within Spanish jurisdiction, may be seized and sequestered, I must insist that the mere statement of the case discloses a palpable violation of the immunity belonging to the property of aliens, from which a right of release and indemnity follows as a matter of course.

The second clause of Article VII declares that "in all cases of seizure, detention, arrest for debts contracted, or offenses committed by any citizen or subject of the party within the jurisdiction of the other, the same shall be made and prosecuted in order and authority of law only, and according to the regular course of proceedings established in such cases." And your excellency proceeds to ask if it can be maintained that American citizens, planning and committing acts of hostility to Spain, should be allowed the privileges and exceptions contained in the seventh article. To that inquiry it may be replied that if American citizens, found within Spanish jurisdiction, violate the laws of Spain, they are amenable to the penalties prescribed therein and their guilt shall be established, after a fair and impartial trial in a court of justice. And if American citizens or others within the jurisdiction of the United States, plan and set on foot any military or naval expedition against Spain, they commit an offense not against the laws of Spain, to which they do not owe obedience, but against the laws of the United States, for which they may be prosecuted and punished, on complaint being made by the Spanish government or on its behalf; and of the balance and good faith of the United States in the enforcement of their laws prohibiting such acts of hostility against a friendly power the government of His Highness the Regent has had ample proofs.

An arbitrary seizure of the property of an American citizen by the public authorities of Spain, either civil or military, whether taken for political or warlike purposes, is precisely the act prohibited by the seventh article of the treaty of 1795. That act is best understood in its letter and spirit when the several clauses are appreciated in whole. Its obvious purpose is to guarantee to the citizens and subjects of the one party within the territory of the other complete immunity for their persons and property from arbitrary levies, seizures or detentions on any pretence whatever; and likewise to secure to the citizens or subjects of both nations within the territory of each all the protection and safeguards that belong to the administration of justice under a government regulated by law. Your excellency, in the course of some general observations on the subject of embargoes, appears to find an analogy between the decree promulgated by the captain general of Cuba and the act of Congress approved July 13, 1862, for the confiscation of the property of persons in rebellion against the United States. To analyze these two measures and point out the very numerous and essential particulars in which they differ as well in substance as in procedure, would extend to a note to an inconvenient length, and it is believed that a brief reference to two or three of the many features which distinguish them will be sufficient. The act of Congress is a law, and is based on the precedents found in the legislation of constitutional governments; the decree of the superior political governor is the arbitrary act of an executive officer whose authority seems to be undefined. The act of Congress is executed only by the courts of justice, in conformity with the maxim of a humane code which declares that no person can be deprived of life, liberty, or property without the judgment of a judicial tribunal; the decree is enforced at pleasure, ex parte, by the government and even by subordinate executive officers of districts, without the intervention of a court. The act of Congress applies only to the property of persons who commit within the territory of the United States the offenses denounced by the act; the decree is executed indiscriminately, as well for acts done beyond as within Spanish jurisdiction. And, finally, not to make the enumeration tedious, the act of Congress applies only to offenses committed after the enactment of the law, while the Spanish decree declares on its face that its penalties shall be visited retrospectively for acts done before its promulgation. Nor am I able to see the coincidence your excellency discovers between the decree of embargo and the order of the American Secretary of War dated June 22, 1862, directing the commanders of armies to appropriate within the theater of operations whatever they found necessary for military purposes. This necessity of war is recognized by the usage of nations, and when the property of aliens is taken under such circumstances, the right of indemnity is never denied. At the beginning of the American war the parties to the contest were formally recognized by Spain as belligerents, and in the order your excellency cites the United States Government only exercised a right belonging to a belligerent. When the conflict in Cuba, which began two years ago, shall acquire the same character, the parties to it may appeal to the laws and precedents of war to justify their acts. If I do not enter upon an examination in detail of the memorandum of particular cases inclosed with your excellency's note of the 12th ultimo, it is because that duty may be more satisfactorily performed after it shall be determined where the papers and proofs in the several cases may be most conveniently compared and revised. I should not, however, fail to remind your excellency that the case of Mr. Joseph Hernandez, a naturalized citizen of the United States, residing in the State of New Jersey, set forth in my note of the 26th of July, whose property was embargoed February 24, 1870, is not noticed in your excellency's reply, nor in the memorandum that accompanied it.

I have now to consider the conclusions reached by your excellency in relation to the mode of procedure that should be followed in presenting to the Spanish government the several reclamations made by the Government of the United States. Your excellency desires: First, that each claimant shall state his grievance in due form and detail; second, that his American nationality shall be proved before the Spanish tribunals; third, that it shall appear that the claimant has applied for redress to some Spanish tribunal, or that a consul of the United States has intervened in his behalf, without obtaining satisfaction from the Spanish authorities.

And your excellency is pleased to declare that when these preliminaries shall have been complied with, if it shall then appear that an American citizen has been aggrieved, the Spanish government will make due reparation; and that, for the purpose of assessing the amount of indemnity to be paid, it will thereupon unite with the Government of the United States in choosing arbitrators to be named for that purpose.

In the observations I have to make upon the question of procedure, it will be convenient to distinguish between the several classes of reclamations under examination. The demands presented may be embraced under the four following classifications:

I. That the real and personal property of American citizens embargoed shall be restored to them or to their authorized agents;

II. That American citizens held in custody without trial shall be released, or tried by the judicial tribunals with the rights and privileges accorded by Article VII of the treaty of 1795;

III. That reasonable and just indemnity be paid to such American citizens as have been wrongfully deprived of their property, or of the use of it, or of the income from it, by the acts of the Spanish authorities; and,

IV. That American citizens arrested, imprisoned, or expelled from the island without sufficient cause appearing shall likewise be indemnified.

It does not appear reasonable to insist that the same formalities should be observed without discrimination in all the cases belonging to these separate heads. Take for instance the demand for the restoration of embargoed property. If, as your excellency observes, property may be embargoed in Cuba at the pleasure of the superior political governor, if the proceeding is not regulated by any law, if it is a military expedient adopted to diminish the resources of a seditious combination, it is not easy to see upon what ground or with what hope a resident of New York could apply to a court in Cuba to compel the captain general to restore property he had seized by virtue of the dictatorial powers he wields over the island; and the proceeds of which may have already gone into the colonial treasury as a part of the income for the current year, in conformity with the royal decree of the 12th instant. Nevertheless, your excellency maintains that although the courts of justice have had nothing to do with the execution of the measure, yet that to them should be addressed the reclamations of those citizens of the United States who complain that their property has been wrongfully taken. The more reasonable proposition would seem to be that redress should be sought from the same authority that committed the injury. That authority being the representative of the Spanish crown in the island of Cuba, with whom the Government of the United States holds no direct communication, it becomes a proper subject for the action of the two governments, the one extending due protection to its injured citizens, and the other responding, as in duty bound, for the acts of its official agent.

For the sake of illustration, let it be supposed that one of the claimants whose pro-party has been embargoed proceeds to seek his remedy in the courts of Cuba: he files a petition setting forth the facts and circumstances of his case; besides the proof of his grievance he establishes his American citizenship to the satisfaction of the tribunals; having made good his complaint in the court of primary jurisdiction, and having been equally successful in the several appellate courts through which it may be supposed to have passed, and having at last obtained the favorable judgment of the supreme tribunal of justice in Spain, the claimant must still seek his compensation through his own government, for it is then that your excellency proposes that the government of His Highness shall unite with that of the United States in the appointment of arbitrators to appraise the amount of damages the claimant has sustained, and the award is to be thereupon paid by the Spanish government. That is to say—and this is the only deduction to be drawn from the course of procedure proposed by your excellency—the question of liability on the part of Spain must be decided by a Spanish court, while the incident of damages will be adjusted between the two governments.

Apart from the delay this mode of procedure would involve—and that consideration alone amounts almost to a denial of justice—the expense to which the parties would be put, the loss of their time and necessary absence from their ordinary avocations, the risk the claimants would run by reason of the insecurity of their persons in Cuba, not to speak further of the manifest hardship of compelling them to submit their demands to a tribunal powerless to afford them redress, render it sufficiently manifest that the course of procedure proposed by the Spanish government is dilatory, onerous, and impracticable. It is moreover inadmissible in principle. The President cannot acquiesce in the proposition that American citizens, recognized as such by their own Government, shall be remanded to foreign tribunals to establish their nationality as a preliminary to a hearing of their claims for indemnity formally presented by his authority for the consideration of the Government responsible for the injuries they have suffered.

I have already had the honor to inform your excellency that all the cases now brought to the notice of the government of His Highness the Regent, have been the subject of instructions to the consul general of the United States at the Havana, in order that they should be laid before the authorities in Cuba and redress demanded. These instructions have been fulfilled, and it is only in those cases in which this remedy has been found altogether unavailing, or where the redress afforded has been insufficient, that it has become necessary to ask for them the attention of your excellency.

The Government of the United States has always preferred to have these questions settled in Cuba by means of the intervention of the consul general with the local authorities, and has repeatedly expressed the wish that the captain general be authorized to dispose of them in that way. In some instances that officer has appeared to possess the necessary powers, while in other cases he has failed to act. In order that it may be quite apparent to your excellency that no effort has been spared to obtain justice for the claimants by the exhibition of the particulars and proofs of their grievances to the authorities in Cuba, I will cite, as an example, one of many such applications:

On the 15th of April, 1869, certain real estate and personal securities in Cuba, the property of the well-known firm of Moses Taylor & Co., of New York, was embargoed and taken from their agents. In September, 1869, a memorial in their behalf was presented by the late Attorney General, the Hon. William M. Evarts, praying that they may be restored to their rights through the intervention of the Government of the United States. The papers were forwarded, with appropriate instructions, to the consul general at the Havana. That officer reports that he presented the case to the superior political governor and gave him a copy of the papers, and that he received a reply on the 10th of November, from the secretary, that as soon as an examination could be made the decision would be given to him. On March 31, 1870, the consul general was further instructed to represent the case and ask for the removal of the embargo. On the 11th of April last, the consul reports the reply of the acting governor that the embargo cannot be raised until certain examinations, then in progress in New York, should be concluded, and that the Spanish government had grave suspicions in the case. From which it appears that a year having elapsed since the seizure, the Cuban authorities still retained the property arbitrarily taken by order of the captain general, without notice or opportunity given to the owners or their agents to be heard in their own behalf; and that the repeated representations of the United States consul general, based upon ample particulars and proofs, remained without result, excepting the disclosure that the Spanish government, after twelve months of investigation, claimed that the seizure and detention of the property of Messrs. Taylor & Co. rested upon "grave suspicions." Surely it will not be expected that in cases of this description, of which there are not a few, the Government of the United States can await the further pleasure of the Cuban authorities; or that the claimants should be turned over to the Spanish tribunals after the fruitless efforts of the consul general to obtain redress from the superior political authority of the island.

Passing from the embargo claimants to those unfortunate Americans imprisoned in Cuba without trial, it is difficult to discover how they are to establish their nationality before the Spanish tribunals if this be insisted upon also in their cases as a condition of any intervention in their behalf by their Government. An opportunity to appeal to a court of justice is precisely what is asked for them, and what they have not themselves been able to obtain. To say to a foreigner in a Cuban dungeon who has been denied not only a trial, but who has been refused any means of communication with counsel or kindred or friends, that he may be tried when he shall have proved, to the satisfaction of the Spanish authorities, that he is an American citizen, would not seem to be a very substantial measure of relief. Neither does it seem consistent in the case of those other claimants who have been expelled from Spanish territory without judicial process, to reproach them with the failure to affirm their nationality before the courts of the country to which they are forbidden to return.

Your excellency is pleased to refer to the instructions addressed by the Secretary of State, under date of May 3, 1869, to the United States vice-consul general at the Havana, enjoining circumspection in ascertaining the real citizenship of persons making application for the recognition and aid of American consulates. In that communication your excellency may observe a fresh proof of the desire of my Government to confine its offices to those who have in good faith retained the right to ask for them. It may be presumed that no practical difficulties can arise in verifying the nationality of the claimants. The Government of the United States exercises habitual vigilance over applications made for its intervention, and uniformly requires satisfactory evidence of citizenship in such cases. It is to be supposed that a government will not err in determining whether the provisions of its own naturalization laws have been complied with by those who seek its protection, and that the comity of nations will accord full faith and credit to the customary proof of acts of the public authorities performed in the execution of municipal laws.

In view of the foregoing considerations, and in the interest of the continued friendship of the two countries, I trust it may be agreeable to the government of His Highness the Regent to accede to the earnest desire of the President for a more convenient and expeditious mode of settling the claims in question than the one suggested by your excellency. I am instructed to state that the proposed conditions of arbitration are distinctly objectionable, and cannot be admitted by my Government. The Government of the United States, in presenting the reclamations of American citizens for injuries suffered within Spanish jurisdiction, can address no other authority than that of His Highness the Regent.

The procedure indicated by your excellency would require the President to inform the claimants that they cannot be heard through their own Government—a conclusion that might be regarded as a rejection of the amicable means upon which the President has confidently relied for the arrangement of these differences. I have, therefore, the honor to submit for the further consideration of your excellency the proposition, that the representative of Spain in Washington be authorized to agree with the Secretary of State of the United States upon the several cases, together with the papers and proofs relating to them, that shall be submitted to the arbitrators; that the said arbitrators, one to be chosen on the part of the United States by the Secretary of State, and the other, on the part of Spain, by the Spanish minister in Washington, shall first select an umpire, to decide questions upon which they may differ, and thereupon proceed to determine the amount of indemnity to be paid to each claimant; and that, to facilitate the disposition of the business, the arbitrators be named on the part of the two governments without delay.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew to your excellency the assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Madrid, November 12, 1870. (Received December 3.)

SIR: Yesterday being the usual day for the minister of state to receive the members of the diplomatic body, I availed myself of the occasion to ask Mr. Sagasta when I might have the satisfaction of communicating to you his answer to my note of October 14, on the subject of the reclamations I had presented in July last. I remarked to him that Congress would soon meet, and that it would be gratifying to the President to be enabled at least to communicate to the two Houses the fact that these questions were in a fair way of adjustment; and I also observed to his excellency that I thought we might reasonably look for the prompt and friendly action of the government of the Regent upon the several matters I had brought to its notice in the communication mentioned, as they were urged in the interest of the continued good understanding between the two countries, which the President, in his proclamation of October 12, had given a fresh proof of his earnest desire to maintain. The minister replied that, on the receipt of my last note, he had asked the colonial secretary for some additional information, necessary to the further consideration of the subject, which had not yet been received; that he would immediately renew his request, and, as soon as the required data could be obtained, he would acquaint me with the views of the government upon the proposition I had submitted. I proceeded to state that the questions had already been pending several months; that they were of a nature likely to touch the susceptibilities of the American people; that, if the President, in his annual message, should find himself constrained to inform Congress that his repeated overtures to Spain had failed to obtain for the grievances of our citizens the consideration they were entitled to receive at the hands of a friendly power, a painful impression would be made upon public sentiment which I was most anxious should be avoided by the timely and just action of this government. With these observations I left the topic to his excellency, who rather abruptly gave the conversation another direction. I could not fail to notice the reserve with which Mr. Sagasta confined himself to a mere intimation of his intention to reply at an early day to my note of October 14, without indicating any probability of an agreement upon the matters under discussion.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

SIR: Your dispatch No. 172 is received. On the 17th instant I telegraphed, in reply to Mr. Motley—to be forwarded by him to you by mail and telegraph—that your course was approved, and that you would continue to press, firmly and vigorously, the plan of settlement of the pending claims desired by this Government, as indicated in your note to Mr. Sagasta of the 14th October. A copy of this dispatch is inclosed.

The President is not disposed to accept the offer of the Spanish government or to modify the demands of the United States. He thinks that no proposition, more just or more temperate, could be made than has been made. There may be a misapprehension in Mr. Sagasta's mind as to one point in our offer, which you may correct in conversation. The President contemplates that every claimant will be required to make good before the commission his injury and his right to indemnity. Naturalized citizens of the United States will, if insisted on by Spain, be required to show when and where they were naturalized, and it will be open to Spain to traverse this fact, or to show that from any of the causes named in my circular of October 14, 1869, the applicant has forfeited his acquired rights; and it will be for the commission to decide whether each applicant has established his claim.

The President desires to know the decision of the cabinet of Madrid at an early day, in order that, should the just wishes of the United States not be complied with, Congress may be advised of that fact. It is useless to prolong discussion where the right is so clearly on the side of this Government.

I have no time, in the haste of preparation for this mail, to express more fully my sense of the excellence of your note of the 14th of October to Mr. Sagasta.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Madrid, November 19, 1870. (Received December 12.)

SIR: On Wednesday, the 16th instant, the Córtes elected the Duke of Aosta King of Spain. Three hundred and eleven members were present and voted. The whole number of deputies is 344, so that 33 constituencies were not represented. The election was by ballot, each member inscribing thereon his own name and that of the person for whom he voted. The choice was made on the first balloting, the official candidate receiving 191 votes, being a majority of 18 in a full house, and a majority of 71 of the members present. Of the minority, besides the 33 who did not vote, 19—of whom 12 were Carlists—voted blank, 63 voted for a republic, 27 for the Duke of Montpensier, and the rest scattering. It may be remarked that Article 33 of the constitution, establishing a monarchy as the form of government, was approved last year by 214 votes. The regency of Marshal Serrano, duke de la Torre, obtained 194 votes, but it should be observed that only one monarchist deputy opposed the election of the regent. It appears, therefore, that of the 229 votes cast for the several candidates for the throne, the Italian prince received 84 per cent., and of the 214 votes given in favor of the monarchical form of government he received 89 per cent. Of the 191 members voting for General Prim's nominee, 65 hold places under his administration; and rumor says that lucrative public employment will soon be given to others of the majority. The majority embraces "progressists," "democratic monarchists," and a portion of the "union liberals;" that is to say, it represents the monarchical elements of the several parties that combined to effect the revolution of September, 1868. Although great efforts were made to increase the conservative vote in favor of the government candidate, the most influential of that class of deputies either abstained altogether or voted with the opposition. From the foregoing analysis of the ballot it appears that an emphatic majority of the constituent assembly—clothed with powers somewhat greater than those usually given in our system to a constitutional convention, inasmuch as this body not only framed the Spanish constitution but put it into operation—has ratified the choice made by General Prim to fill the Spanish throne. The incidents of the session are not regarded as promising a tranquil reign, nor even a peaceful accession to the throne.

SIR: The following is a transcript of a telegraphic dispatch forwarded from this legation at 7 o'clock this evening :

HAMILTON FISH, Secretary of State, Washington :

Your instructions through Motley are received. Interview with minister to-day by appointment. He anticipated the object of my visit, and stated that the action of this government on our reclamations had been unavoidably delayed because he had not yet received necessary information from Cuba, which had been diligently sought by telegraph. I again and earnestly urged prompt action, in conformity with your views. Minister said that he would not wait longer for colonial reports, but would at once answer my note of October 14. The minister's silence about the tenor of this reply seems significant.

A copy of this dispatch goes by mail to Mr. Motley, for transmission by telegraph from London.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Madrid, November 25, 1870. (Received December 12.)

SIR: I have the honor to report that on the receipt of your instruction, through Mr. Motley, on the 20th instant, I addressed a note to the minister of state, asking him to name the earliest time convenient to himself for an interview, which was promptly appointed for Thursday, (yesterday,) at 3 in the afternoon. Mr. Sagasta, foreseeing the purpose of my visit, did not wait for me to state it, but immediately on receiving me introduced the subject of our reclamations, and proceeded to narrate the proofs of his diligent efforts to obtain the information he desired from the colonial office to enable him to answer my note of October 14. He said that the secretary of the colonies having some time ago told him that the reports required could only be prepared in Cuba, orders were immediately sent by telegraph to forward them without delay. On the receipt of my request for an interview he had again asked Mr. Moret for the data called for, and was told that no answer had been received from Cuba; and that now, not wishing to defer his reply any longer, he must do the best he could with such material as the Colonial Office had in its possession; he added that he hoped to receive from that department a communication on the subject within a day or two, and would at once write to me. I replied that his excellency had made no mistake in assuming that I had come to represent to him the desire of the President to know the views of the Spanish government with respect to the numerous reclamations I had brought to its notice, and to which my notes of July 26 and October 14 were particularly directed; that all our correspondence on the subject had been submitted to the President, and that I was instructed by a telegram just now received to ask for the immediate action of the government of His Highness the Regent upon the propositions I had submitted; that Congress would assemble early in December, and that it would become the duty of the President to inform that body of the stage the negotiation had reached; that the President had given so many proofs of his sincere desire to remove any cause of difference with Spain that his excellency would comprehend the disappointment and regret that would be felt at Washington if any further delay should occur in coming to a satisfactory understanding with the Spanish government in relation to the injuries our citizens had already suffered, as well as upon the measures suggested to prevent the recurrence of similar causes of complaint, and that I could not too earnestly commend to his excellency the importance of these considerations in the interest of the friendly relations of the two countries. Mr. Sagasta repeated his statement that he would at once give attention to the matter, and that I should hear from him very soon. I could not fail to be painfully impressed by the reflection that the minister disclosed no intimation of a disposition to accede to our reasonable demands heretofore presented, and that my allusion to the considerate and generous course of the President in all the questions which had grown out of the struggle in Cuba was received without the expression of any just appreciation of his action.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, November 25, 1870.

SIR: I inclose a copy of a decree said to have been made by a military tribunal in Cuba, and published in the Diario de la Marina on the 9th of November, current.

This decree purports to condemn to death sundry persons named in it as the central republican junta of Cuba and Porto Rico, established in New York, and to confiscate their property. It appears affirmatively in the decree that none of the condemned had appeared before the court.

This revolutionary body, known as the Cuban junta, voluntarily disbanded itself about one month before this decree was made, and announced its intention to discontinue any hostile purpose it might have entertained against Spanish rule in Cuba. During its previous history its acts, so far as conflicting with the laws of the United States and the international duties of this Government, were repressed by the President. This Department has also been officially informed by Mr.

Roberts that the state of affairs in Cuba is regarded as a favorable one by the Spanish government, and that in consequence of that the extraordinary powers previously vested in him had been withdrawn. This Government has, therefore, seen with surprise and regret the announcement of a policy in Cuba which is apparently uncalled for by any present emergencies, which is not in harmony with the ideas now entertained by the most enlightened nations as to the treatment of political offenses, and which, as it appears to us, will tend to continue the unhappy disturbances which exist in Cuba. We recognize, however, that, so far as this is a purely domestic question between the government of Spain and the persons or properties of those who are subject to that government, the United States have no other right to interpose than that growing out of the friendly relations which have always existed between them and Spain, and the good faith with which they have observed their duties and obligations in this contest. It appears, however, that on this list are to be found the names of some persons who claim to be citizens of the United States. As to each such person, you will inform the minister for foreign affairs that, if it shall appear that his claim to be a citizen of the United States is valid, and that he has done no act to forfeit his rights as such, it will be claimed and insisted that he is entitled to the trial by civil tribunal and in the ordinary form of law which are guaranteed to citizens of the United States by the article of the treaty of 1795 which has already been made the subject of correspondence between you and the Spanish government.

I am, &c.,

HAMILTON FISH.

SENTENCE OF THE COURT-MARTIAL IN THE CASE OF THE CUBAN CONSPIRATORS.

[Translation.]

At the Cuartel de la Fuerza was judged and decided yesterday, in court-martial (consejo de guerra ordinario,) the voluminous process established against those who, it has appeared, belong, or have belonged, to the central republican junta of Cuba and Porto Rico that was established in New York for sustaining, with all kinds of resources, the insurrection against Spain that broke out at Yara the 10th of October, 1868. The decision of the fiscal having been read by Colonel Montaos, in which an extensive review of the course of the rebellion, from the first moments of its existence, is made with many interesting details, and a detailed explanation of the proofs found in the process against each one of the accused, the court dictated the following SENTENCE.

In view of the process instituted by the colonel of cavalry, Don Francisco Montaos y Bovillard, by virtue of the decree of his excellency the captain general, of 2d of September, 1869, against the individuals that appear to have composed or do compose the so-called republican government of Cuba, and the central republican junta of Cuba and Porto Rico, established in New York for sustaining with every kind of resources the rebellion against Spain that broke out on the eastern department on the 10th of October, 1868, and having communicated all to the court, presided by Don Julian Pueyo, assisted by the advocate of the captain general, Don Elias de Zúñiga as assessor, and at which the defendants did not appear, being absent; and being duly examined, as also the decision of the fiscal, the court, by unanimity of votes in accordance with the prescriptions of the law 1st and 2d, title 2d of Partida 7th, and in the law 2d, title 7th, book 12th, of the Novísima Recopilacion, and as a doctrine, the 139th and 177th of the Penal Code, has condemned, and does condemn, as guilty of treason and rebellion, and to the punishment of death by the vile garrote, Cárlos Manuel Céspedes, Francisco Vicente Aguilera, Cristóbal Mendoza Eljio Izaguirre, Eduardo Agramonte, Pedro Maria Agüero y Gonzales, Salvador Cisneros y Betancour, Pio Rosado, Fernando Fornier, Miguel Betancour Guerra Jesus Rodriguez, José Izaguirre, Miguel Gerónimo Gutierrez, Arcadio Garcia, Tranquilino Valdés, Antonio Lorda, Eduardo Machado, Antonio Zambrana, Ignacio Agramonte, Rafael Morales, Lucas del Castillo, Diego Machado, Ramon Perez Trujilla.

Manuel Quesada, Thomas Jordan, Francisco Ruiz, José Valiente, José Maria Mora, Antonio Fernandez Bramosio, José Maria Bassora, Francisco Izquierdo, Plutarco Gonzalez, Ramon Fernandez Criado, Francisco Javier Cisneros, Joaquin Delgado, Ramon Aguirre, Francisco Fésser, Ignacio Alfaro, Miguel Aldama, Cárlos del Castillo, José Manuel Mestre, Hilario Cisneros, Leonardo del Monte, José Maria Céspedes, Francisco Valdés Mendoza, Nestor Ponce de Leon, Federico Galvez, Francisco Javier Balmaseda, Manuel Casanova, Antonio Mora, Luis Felipe Mantilla, Manuel Márquez, José Peña, and Joaquin Anido, without prejudice to their being heard if they should present themselves or should be found; their property, of whatever class, to be appropriated by the State for indemnification if the damages and expenses of the insurrection apprising the public exchequer to that end; also such property as belonged to José Morales Lemus, Honorato del Castillo, Luis Ayesteran, and Pedro Figueredo, with respect to whom the process ceases by reason of their deaths; absolving Mariano Alvarez and José Trujillo, for want of sufficient proof, and directing a cessation of the process with respect to Antonio Alcalá, who has been pardoned during the course of this process for having given in his submission to the government.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Madrid, December 3, 1870. (Received January 4, 1871.)

SIR: Yesterday, as I have already informed you by my telegram of the 2d instant, I called on the minister of state, it being his customary day for the reception of the diplomatic body. I remarked to Mr. Sagasta that I had not yet had the pleasure to receive his reply to the proposition made in my note of October 14; to which the minister replied that I would very soon hear from him, as he had obtained from the colonial office the information he desired in regard to our reclamations. He gave no intimation of the probable tenor of his answer. I mentioned, on the authority of our minister to Brazil, who is passing a few days in Madrid, en route to Rome, that several troublesome questions, growing out of claims upon that government for injuries to American citizens, had recently been adjusted by means of a similar arrangement, and which had much to commend it when friendly powers desired to settle such controversies. This allusion drew no direct response, but Mr. Sagasta observed that he had heard the day before, from Mr. Roberts, that the arbitrators named to pass upon the "Lloyd Aspinwall" case had awarded a large sum to the owners. I expressed my hope that the decision would be satisfactory to all parties, and that the amount would be promptly paid, to which his excellency replied that payment would be ordered without delay.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Madrid, December 8, 1870. (Received January 4, 1871.)

SIR: Your instruction No. 106 was received on the 5th instant. On the same day I sent a note to the minister of state asking for an interview. On the 7th, no answer having been received, I repeated the request in another communication to Mr. Sagasta, to which a reply was promptly returned, saying that he would receive me to-day at half past 2 in the afternoon, and stating that the note previously addressed to him had not reached his hands. Meanwhile the Madrid journals had published a telegram giving the purport of the allusion to our reclamation against Spain made by the President in his annual message. As soon as I presented myself this afternoon Mr. Sagasta expressed his regret that my note of the 5th had been inadvertently confounded with two others received from this legation at the same time, acknowledging invitations to accompany the minister on a visit to the palace of the Escorial. Mr. Sagasta at once proceeded to state that he had conferred with his colleagues, and was happy to assure me that we were quite in accord as to the proposal made in my note of October 14, for the adjustment of the claims of American citizens upon the Spanish government; that the minister of the colonies, Mr. Moret, had suggested some advantages to be found in two commissions, one to pass upon the legal questions, and the other to assess the damages in cases where the Spanish authorities should be adjudged in fault; and that he must also insist upon no case going before the commission that had not been first presented to a Spanish tribunal without obtaining due reparation. Expressing myself gratified by the prospect of an agreement between the two governments, I observed, with reference to the proposal for two commissions, that the same persons could as well, and perhaps more satisfactorily, decide all the questions involved in the respective cases; that this was the usual practice, and that whatever testimony the Spanish government might desire to offer on the subject of damages could easily be obtained through the authorities in Cuba or the consuls in the United States, and presented to the arbitrators; that two commissions would add unnecessarily to the expense of conducting the proceedings, besides inconveniently prolonging them; that to distinguish in the manner suggested between the functions of the one and the other might raise questions of jurisdiction that would prove troublesome; that while a commission chosen expressly to appraise damages might not be composed of persons best qualified to pass upon legal propositions, it would not be difficult to select commissioners entirely competent to settle the incidental as well as the principal differences to be considered, and that it was only necessary for both governments, in choosing their respective arbitrators, to bear in mind the duties to be performed, and all occasion for a separation of their functions would be avoided. Mr. Sagasta replied that he was inclined to the opinion that one commission was enough; he had acquiesced in Mr. Moret's suggestion when it was made, but it would not, perhaps, be regarded as essential. With respect to the proposition that all cases must first be prosecuted before a Spanish tribunal, I said that I did not believe it would be accepted by my Government; it was not reasonable to ask that American citizens, most of whom resided in the United States, and who had suffered injuries at the hands of the Spanish authorities, should be remitted to Spanish courts for redress, to say nothing of the expense, the delay, and the personal risk the parties would incur in going to Cuba for such a purpose; it was not fair that such cases should be heard and decided by persons appointed exclusively by the government against which the reclamations were made; that if by tribunals the minister meant authorities, I presumed there would be no objection to a stipulation requiring claims to be first presented through the United States consul general at Havana to the superior political authority of the colony, or to the supreme government at Madrid, through this legation, but that I could not assent to the doctrine that the jurisdiction of the commission should depend upon a previous adjudication by a Spanish court. His excellency appeared to yield to the latter construction of the word "tribunal;" he said the Spanish government must first have cognizance of the cases; that it would not be prudent to permit parties to go before the commission with claims which the government had not investigated. I replied that all the cases had been brought to the notice of the captain general of Cuba, or of this government, and ample opportunities for reparation had been afforded; that the Spanish authorities were in possession of all the material facts of each case; that the main difficulty was to reconcile the conflicting views which so often separate the immediate parties to a controversy, and hence it was desirable to resort to the expedient of an independent, intelligent, and disinterested tribunal, so organized as to be able to dispose of the cases promptly and equitably. I added that it would, perhaps, facilitate a comparison of views if his excellency would prepare a memorandum of any stipulations he might desire, after further reflection, to make in relation to the organization and jurisdiction of the arbitrators; that I would hold myself in readiness to call upon him at any time he would indicate, and offer such amendments as might appear to me to be necessary upon a perusal of his propositions; and that I felt confident we could arrange the details of the matter in one or two conferences, more satisfactorily, not to say more expeditiously, than by the interchange of notes. His excellency intimated his concurrence in this suggestion and promised to act upon it at an early day. I did not allude to the remaining points mentioned in your No. 106, as they were not involved in the discussion opened by Mr. Sagasta. I may have occasion to do so in our next interview.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Madrid, December 10, 1870. (Received January 4, 1871.)

SIR: I have the honor to forward herewith several printed extracts, taken from Madrid journals, ministerial, republican, and conservative, commenting upon a telegram published here on the 7th instant, purporting to give a synopsis of the remarks of the President in his annual message in relation to our reclamations against Spain, for injuries done by the authorities in Cuba to the persons and property of American citizens.

I am, &c.,

D. E. SICKLES.

[From La Epoca, Madrid, December 7, 1870.]

The Washington telegram, which we publish elsewhere, has been the subject of animated discussions. Some thought it to be of immense importance, believing that the claims in question were those of Messrs. Morales Lemus, and Aldama, who are naturalized as North American citizens. Others, remembering the circumspect attitude which has constantly been maintained toward Spain by President Grant, thought that this portion of the message was only designed to cajole certain parties for the moment.

However, as the reasoning of the United States may have been similar to that which called forth the famous note of Russia, we expect that prompt and serious attention will be given to this matter by the government. The telegraph brings us most important intelligence to-day; but as it is in open contradiction to all that President Grant has done thus far in respect to Spain, we must await fuller reports of the contents of the message.

LONDON, 6th; WASHINGTON, 6th.

The message of the President of the Republic says that a proposition has been made to Spain for the organization of a common tribunal to decide upon the petition of several American citizens for the losses suffered by them in Cuba. "If Spain," adds the message, "rejects the proposition, the President of the Republic will be obliged to communicate this fact to Congress, recommending prompt action." We presume that the government has received telegrams from the representative of Spain, and that the public will not long be kept in suspense concerning any grave event, as would be the one referred to in the above dispatch, should it really have occurred as stated.

[From La Igualdad, Madrid, December 8, 1870.]

We call the attention of our readers to the dispatch from Washington (sent to us by Fabra's agency) which we publish elsewhere. The dispatch could not be one of greater importance. The Republic of the United States, which has showed such consideration toward Spain while the government was conducted in the spirit of liberty, begins to show its displeasure as soon as we inaugurate the despotism of the monarchy of Amadeo. It will be fortunate if the caprice of General Prim does not cause severe disaster to Spain. The hostility of the North American Republic may be most fatal to us. Is this the first of the calamities which threaten us with the coming of the monarch of the never lucky Don Juan the general?

[From El Imparcial, Madrid, December 8, 1870.]

CUBA AND THE WASHINGTON GOVERNMENT.—The Washington dispatch which we publish elsewhere has caused us real surprise. The President of the United States refers, in a message to the Chambers, to the affairs of Spain, and speaks of a proposition made to our government to organize a mixed tribunal to take cognizance of the claims of American citizens who have suffered losses in Cuba. It is not easy, nor even prudent, to hazard an opinion in so delicate a matter, when we have before us nothing but the extract communicated by telegraph, in which the main statement is wanting, i. e., the class of American citizens to which the President refers in his message. We know that American citizens have taken part in the insurrection, either as soldiers in the filibustering expeditions which have gone to Cuba, or as conspirators with and auxiliaries of the insurgent forces of the island, and that there are others who, without taking any part, either as conspirators or soldiers, have seen their interests injured by the contingencies of war; and the words of General Grant cannot refer to the former. We have more than one, and more than two solemn declarations of neutrality made by the Government of the United States, and we cannot suppose that there has been a change of policy without any justifying cause. And what but an intervention would it be to demand indemnities for American citizens who, on account of having been taken with arms in their hands, or of having been judicially condemned as conspirators, have suffered injury in their persons or property? Nor do we believe that the words of General Grant refer to those Cubans who, like Aldama, Morales Lemus, and others, have become American subjects in order to bring claims on account of the measures adopted against them by the authorities of Cuba. The necessary qualifications for obtaining citizenship in the United States being known, we do not think that these gentlemen could have possessed them when they became guilty of the crimes for which they have been condemned. Does, then, the President of the North American Republic refer to those peaceable citizens whose interests have suffered injury in consequence of the operations of war? It is difficult to determine this, but if such is the fact, the attitude of the Washington Government will not be so grave as regards our cause. What is most probable is, that this part of the message of General Grant is one of the numerous political tricks which are employed by those governments in order to keep a certain portion of public opinion on their side. And such a step was never more necessary than at the opening of a Congress in which the radical party, the great support of filibusterism, is largely in the majority. In this way, even though the Government may intend to postpone the question indefinitely, it manages to quiet the excitement of the radicals long enough to give time to the Spanish Government to put down the insurrection. However, the above is nothing but mere conjecture, and we must await the arrival of the message in order to be able to express a reliable opinion with regard to the question.

[From La Epoca, Madrid, December 9, 1870.]

Advices subsequent to the Washington telegram which we published in our paper of Wednesday increase instead of diminishing the gravity of the indications made in the message of the President of the United States. We are told, and our advices are from a source which we must consider authentic, that the demands do not relate to Aldama or Morales Lemus, but to acts of confiscation, which are supposed to have been committed by the authorities of Cuba against North American citizens residing in the United States and in Cuba, without any form of trial before a legal tribunal. The demands also relate to arrests of North American citizens who had taken no part in the insurrection, to personal offenses done to citizens of the Republic, and to captures and detention of American vessels, styled illegal by that Government, whose cases are precisely similar to the recently-settled one of the Lloyd Aspinwall. We are likewise told that the manner of settlement proposed by the United States is similar to the one proposed by the United States and accepted by Spain in the case of the aforesaid vessel. The demands are not of to-day, as it appears; they have repeatedly been addressed to the minister of state by the Government of the Union, and Mr. Sagasta has been told, more than once, that if these matters were not put in the way of settlement before Congress met, they would necessarily become the subject of a communication from the President of that body. The case has presented itself, and we must lament the indifference which has been shown toward a thing which could easily be converted into a matter of serious controversy with a power with which it is of great importance for us to maintain the friendly relations which we have maintained hitherto. El Imparcial thinks that this part of the message of General Grant is one of the numerous political tricks which are used by those governments in order to keep a certain portion of public opinion on their side. And such a step, it says, was never more necessary than at the opening of a Congress in which the radical party, the great support of filibusterism, is largely in the majority; but prudence counsels us, in the case of powerful nations, to give no reason for what the Imparcial calls political tricks, since they may easily be converted into another great complication to be added to those which already weigh upon the island of Cuba. If the message means exactly what it says, although it may have nothing to do with political tricks, or with the intestine struggle which Spain is sustaining with Cuba, it is still grave as regards the relations between the two countries, and on account of the turn which the new North American Congress may give to the question. We have constantly maintained, although in opposition to the opinion of many of our friends in Cuba, that the most important thing for the government was to maintain relations of the utmost cordiality with the United States. We cannot, therefore, understand, the demands to which the message refers still being unsettled, why the subject did not receive the attention it deserved, as the errors into which the Washington Cabinet has been led by interested parties would thus have been dispelled, and this matter would never have assumed the proportions which it unfortunately has assumed.

[From La Discusion, Madrid, December 10, 1870.]

We announced to our readers more than a month since, that very friendly relations did not exist between our government and that of the United States with regard to the Cuban question. No great importance was then attached to the news. The message addressed by President Grant to the Chambers, of which the telegraph has given us a slight idea, now confirms our fears. And that no one may think that we are exaggerating, we transfer to our columns what the Epoca said yesterday in relation to the matter, this journal being certainly by no means favorable to the policy of that republic, whose Government is greatly interested in having the state of war and disturbance which has prevailed in Cuba for more than two years brought to an end, which our government is quite unable to accomplish.

[From El Universal, December 10, 1870.]

We do not yet know what are the demands of the Government of the United States with regard to property belonging to American citizens which has been embargoed or confiscated in Cuba; we do not, therefore, pay any attention to the matter, although the indications are not very satisfactory. At all events, we expect nothing good, in view of the policy of absurdities and acts of violence which prevails in the unfortunate island of Cuba.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, December 12, 1870.

SIR: I inclose herewith plenary powers to conclude a convention with the government of Spain for a mixed commission for the settlement of the claims of citizens of the United States against the government of Spain for wrongs and injuries committed to themselves, their persons, or their properties, or to the persons or properties of deceased citizens of the United States in or about the island of Cuba.

The objects to be accomplished by this commission are so fully set forth in my note to Mr. Lopez Roberts of the 9th of June last,* in my instructions to you of the 24th of June last, inclosing a copy of that note to Mr. Roberts in your note of the 14th October last to Mr. Sagasta, and in the other correspondence connected therewith, that it is only necessary to refer to those several notes. I inclose, as a general guide in framing a convention, copies of claims conventions between the United States and Venezuela, Peru, and Mexico, respectively. You will, however, be governed by the provisions of these instruments only so far as they may be found to be applicable to the present case.

In transmitting this power I have, therefore, only to call your attention to the importance of the following points:

1st. That the proposed commission shall be organized at the earliest possible day. To secure this it is necessary to have the convention here in time for the action of the Senate, before its adjournment, say not later than the 1st of February next. It will also be desirable to have the exchange of ratifications at Washington.

2d. That the commissioners shall sit at Washington; that they shall have full power to make their own rules as to the mode and time of the presentation of claims and of the proof thereof; and that they shall, before making rules, agree upon an umpire to whom all questions shall be referred on which they cannot agree, including the said rules.

3d. That they shall not have jurisdiction over claims growing out of contracts.

4th. That a reasonable time shall be given for the presentation of proofs.

5th. That claims and their proof shall be presented only through the Government of the United States, and that each government may employ one person as agent or counsel to represent it before the commission.

6th. As these claims are all against Spain, that government ought to be responsible for the expenses occasioned by their settlement by a commission; but if persistent objections are made to this course, you will propose that the expenses be defrayed by a percentage to be deducted from the amount awarded.

SIR: I called at the Foreign Office this afternoon, confident of finding the minister at his quarters, as this is the day appointed by himself for the reception of the diplomatic body. Mr. Sagasta had, however, left the department at an early hour to attend the sitting of the Cortes. I asked to see the assistant secretary of state, and desired him to remind the minister of his promise made on the 8th instant, to inform me of the conclusions he might reach after our interchange of views on that day. Mr. de Blas told me that an important debate was expected to come on to-day in the house, and that, besides, a cabinet council was to be held before the Cortes met; that for these reasons the minister had been unable to hold his usual reception this afternoon; that he, however, felt authorized to say to me, under reserve, that the council of ministers had yesterday agreed upon the bases of the reply that would be made to-morrow or next day to our proposition in relation to the reclamations of the United States against Spain; that no more than one commission would be insisted upon, and that this should have cognizance of all claims for alleged violations of the treaty of 1795.

I asked Mr. de Blas whether I might inform you by telegraph of the purport of his communication, and he replied in the affirmative.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, December 16, 1870.

SIR: Referring to your No. 195, concerning the election of the Duke of Aosta as King of Spain, I have to say that on the 19th of November Mr. Roberts called to officially inform me of that fact. I received the information without an intimation of the course that will be pursued by his Government. It has been the policy of the United States to recognize the governments de facto of the countries with which we hold diplomatic relations. Such was our course when the republic was established in France in 1848, and again in 1870, and in each case accepted by the French people. Such was our course in Mexico when the republic was maintained by the people of that country in spite of foreign efforts to establish a monarchy by military force. We have always accepted the general acquiescence of the people in a political change of government as a conclusive evidence of the will of the nation. When, however, there has not been such acquiescence, and armed resistance has been shown to changes made or attempted to be made under the form of law, the United States have applied to other nations the rule that the organization which has possession of the national archives and of the traditions of government, and which has been inducted to power under the forms of law, must be presumed to be the exponent of the desires of the people, until a rival political organization shall have established the contrary. Your course in the present case will be governed by this rule.

Should there be circumstances which lead you to doubt the propriety of recognizing the Duke of Aosta as king of Spain, it will be easy to communicate with the Department by telegraph and ask instructions. Should there be no such circumstances, the general policy of the United States, as well as their interests in the present relations with Spain, call for an early and cheerful recognition of the change which the nation has made.

MADRID, December 19.

Reply received to-night. Bases include numerous provisions. I send synopsis of those inconsistent with your instructions.

Both governments shall submit pending reclamations to arbitration in conformity to following propositions:

First. No indemnity for injuries resulting from judgment of civil or military court or other judicial proceeding agreeably to Spanish law and procedure.

Second. It must appear that the Spanish authorities inflicting the injury were informed of the nationality of the claimant.

Third. No right to indemnity if claim to American citizenship has been disallowed by judgment of any Spanish civil or military tribunal.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Madrid, December 20, 1870. (Received January 13, 1871.)

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a translation of a note dated yesterday and received last evening, from the minister of state, in reply to mine of the 14th of October last, in relation to our reclamations for injuries done to American citizens by the Spanish authorities in Cuba. You will observe that Mr. Sagasta has abandoned the principal positions taken in his communication of September 12, and in their place occupies ground not less untenable. Hitherto this government has maintained that no case could be submitted to arbitration until the claimant had prosecuted his demand before a Spanish tribunal and shown that he had failed to obtain redress in that manner. Now Mr. Sagasta insists that the arbitrators shall not have jurisdiction of any matter that has been passed upon by a Spanish tribunal, whether civil or military. And I am sure you will share my surprise on receiving from the minister a proposition so at variance with his recent declarations, as well to myself as in the Cortes, in reply to the interpellation of Mr. Bugallal. Last night I sent you by cable a synopsis of Mr. Sagasta's note, and shall, of course, defer my rejoinder until I receive your instructions, the tenor of which, however, I might easily anticipate. I am reluctant to believe that this cabinet will insist upon conditions of arbitration so plainly inadmissible. Yesterday, as I left the diplomatic tribune of the Cortes, I met the Italian minister, who inquired about the state of the negotiation. I told him that no further communication from Mr. Sagasta had yet reached me, although on Friday last I had been distinctly assured at the Foreign Office that a satisfactory reply would be sent to me, at the very latest, on the Sunday following. Mr. Blanc seemed at a loss to understand the continued delay after the public statement of the minister in his place in the Cortes.

I am, &c.,

D. E. SICKLES.

[Translation.]

MINISTRY OF STATE,
Madrid, December 19, 1870.

SIR: The government of His Highness might make a full rejoinder to the observations contained in the note of the 14th of last October, in which you were pleased to reply to my answer of the 12th of the same month (sic) concerning the reclamations of several American citizens for injuries suffered by them in consequence of the insurrection in Cuba; but after the ample and extended discussion to which this matter has already given rise, I deem it more expedient for the interests of both countries to arrive at once at a practical solution, conformably to the principles of equity and justice which animate the respective governments. The undersigned does not consider it necessary to make new protests, in the name of the Spanish government, of its earnest desire for the continued amity and good understanding existing between the cabinets of Madrid and Washington may not be interrupted, still less to reiterate the unchangeable intention of observing, for its part, the stipulations of the treaty of the 27th of October, 1795, with the same respect that it has for the international conventions celebrated with other powers. These sentiments, which have not ceased to inspire the government of his highness in the various questions that have arisen during the extraordinary circumstances through which the island of Cuba is passing, have especially guided it in considering this most important matter. Of this I have no doubt the Government of the United States will be persuaded on learning the bases which I have the honor to propose to it, and which, in the judgment of the government of His Highness, are calculated to conciliate all interests, protect all rights, and give just satisfaction to those who may have been prejudiced by administrative measures growing out of circumstances inevitably produced by a state of war, and which, in their application to individuals, should not injuriously affect the citizens of a friendly power. But the same homage which the Spanish government is, now as ever, ready to render spontaneously to the good faith of treaties and to the principles of justice in general, imposes upon it the duty of claiming, in its turn, the same tribute for the judgments pronounced by legally established Spanish tribunals, whose decisions have been considered, in Spain as in all civilized countries, entitled to the most profound respect. The proposition, set forth in the first stipulation, is in no way opposed to the provisions of the treaty of 1795; on the contrary, it is to be deduced from the contents of its seventh article, which has been cited several times by the Government of the United States in its communications to this ministry concerning the claims of American citizens. With regard to the further stipulations proposed, the undersigned believes that they cannot but satisfy the Government of Washington, inasmuch as they are for the most part founded on principles recognized and accepted by it in the course of the present negotiation, and which you have appealed to in your notes as being most conformable to the spirit of the treaty in question. In compliance with the orders of His Highness the Regent, I have the honor to propose, through you, to the Government of the United States, the following bases for the settlement of the question pending between Spain and the republic of the United States, respecting the losses and injuries inflicted by the Cuban authorities upon certain American citizens, in their persons and estates, in violation of the provisions of the seventh article of the treaty of October 27, 1795.

First. No indemnity shall be awarded for loss or injury suffered by North American citizens in their persons or property, in pursuance of the judgments and decisions of civil or military tribunals instituted in Cuba in accordance with Spanish laws, and acting in conformity with the established procedure in force in Spanish territory.

Second. Those North American citizens shall be entitled to indemnification who have been deprived of their property, or injured in their estates or in their persons, and whose reclamations have been already taken up by the Government of the United States and presented to the Spanish government or to its representative in Washington, provided the claimants unite the following qualifications:

I. That they show that they were actually American citizens when the injury was inflicted.

II. That the injury was inflicted by Spanish authorities holding no judicial position, either civil or military.

III. That they made due claim as to their nationality before the Spanish authorities who inflicted the injury.

Third. Notwithstanding the provisions of the preceding article, no claimant shall be entitled to indemnification whose plea alleging foreign citizenship may have been found against him by any Spanish civil or military tribunal in an executive judgment rendered in conformity to the laws.

Fourth. The Spanish government and that of the United States shall submit pending reclamations, to be determined in conformity to the preceding conditions, to arbitrators who shall be named in the following manner: The minister of foreign relations in Washington shall name one arbitrator, and the minister of Spain in that city shall name another. The two thus named shall agree upon a third, who shall decide questions on which they may not be able to agree. The arbitrators shall examine pending claims and the documents on which they are founded, and shall institute such proceedings and investigations as they may deem necessary to an understanding of the facts, but always in obedience to the preceding established bases, and shall declare whether the claimants are or are not entitled to be indemnified by the Spanish government, and, in the affirmative case, the sum to be paid by the latter for such purpose.

Fifth. The Spanish government undertakes to make good the indemnities fixed by the arbitrators, or by the umpire, in conformity with the preceding bases.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew to you, sir, the assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Madrid, December 22, 1870. (Received January 13, 1871.)

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of a note dated 21st instant, and sent to-day to the minister of state, in compliance with your instructions Nos. 107 and 109, in relation to the failure of this government to execute the emancipation act of June last. I have taken this occasion to reiterate some of the views expressed in your No. 65. A proposition is now under consideration in the Cortes to authorize the executive to put in operation, provisionally, most of the important measures pending in that body having reference to the peninsula.

Inclosed herewith I have the honor to forward copies of these several propositions. Of the former, the best defense offered for it is, that the worst of the preceding governments have done the same thing. It will doubtless be adopted, although a plain violation of the constitution. It is not probable, however, that the Cortes constituyentes will bestow any further attention upon the colonies. I should mention that the confirmation afforded by your No. 114, of the continued suspension of important articles of the law of June, 1870, made it expedient to dispense with any preliminary investigation in regard to the execution of that act. That it has not been executed is notorious here. If I had asked officially for information on the subject the inquiry would have been referred to Cuba, with the usual delay, and it seemed desirable that your views should be made known to Mr. Sagasta before the dissolution of the Cortes.

I am, &c.,

D. E. SICKLES.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Madrid, December 21, 1870.

SIR: I have had the honor on several occasions to communicate to the cabinet of Madrid the representations I have from time to time been instructed to make on the subject of the institution of slavery in Cuba and Porto Rico, and especially to express the earnest desire of the President that Spain might see, in the abolition of domestic servitude, a means of promoting the true interests of her American possessions and satisfying the advancing sentiment of all civilized nations that liberty is rightfully the universal law of labor. These sentiments, which found the motive for their expression in the deep interest felt by the United States in the welfare of an adjacent population with which their relations are intimate and their intercourse constantly increasing, coincide with the conviction more than once frankly declared to the government of His Highness the Regent that the policy of political and administrative reform in Cuba best calculated to restore peace to that island and promote its prosperity. It is therefore with regret that the President is informed of the delay that appears still to attend the execution of the initiatory measure of emancipation adopted by the constituent Cortes in June of the present year. By a recent proclamation emanating from the superior political governor of Cuba, it seems that several of the most beneficial provisions of that law yet remain inoperative pending the preparation of regulations for their enforcement.

The President, relying confidently upon the fulfillment of the assurances heretofore given to me by his excellency the president of the council, and by the predecessors of your excellency in the ministry of state during my official residence in this capital, the desire and purpose of the government of His Highness the Regent speedily to abolish slavery in the Antilles, directs me to represent to your excellency the solicitude felt by the Government of the United States that the benefits of the preliminary act of the last session of the Cortes may be no longer withheld from the limited class of persons contemplated in its benevolent design. That act, at best, fell far short of the reasonable anticipations of the President, since his advances on the subject have been uniformly met by the government of His Highness the Regent in a temper and spirit that indicated a disposition to co-operate cordially with the United States in eradicating this blot from the civilization of America.

The progress understood to have been made in the pacification of Cuba may be lost if the opportunity now afforded in the remaining sittings of the constituent Cortes be suffered to pass without realizing some, at least, of those liberal measures of colonial reform to which the cabinet of Madrid has distinctly pledged itself in its communications to the United States Government. Among the considerations which have contributed most to restrain and control the manifestations of the sympathy felt in the United States for those who are believed to be struggling in Cuba for self-government, has been the confident expectation, founded upon the declaration of Spain, that before the dissolution of the constituent Cortes, institutions in harmony with the Spanish constitution of 1869 would be extended to the Antilles.

The only portions of the North American continent in which slavery exists, and in which representative government is denied, are found in the Spanish possessions of Cuba and Porto Rico. Continental surroundings and associations, which cannot but exert a powerful influence upon the inhabitants of those islands, have long commended to them the example of free institutions; and now that Spain has established for herself a government based upon universal suffrage, it must be more than ever difficult for her to maintain by force a colonial system which fails to satisfy just aspirations impossible to repress.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew to your excellency the assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

D. E. SICKLES.

His Excellency the MINISTER OF STATE.

[From La Gaceta de Madrid, December 20, 1870.]

The following proposition was read :

The undersigned deputies, desiring to promote the public good, and believing themselves faithful interpreters of the sentiment of the country, hereby propose to the Cortes a measure which, according to their best judgment, that sentiment imperiously demands.

The duties of the high office conferred upon us by universal suffrage having been performed; the principles proclaimed by the September revolution having been laid down in the fundamental code; the illustrious Prince, chosen by the vote of the representatives of the nation to finish their work, having been elected monarch, and having accepted the crown, the country asks what we are waiting for in order to close the already too long constituent period, and in order resolutely and at once to enter upon our normal life and the proper exercise of our new institutions.

Some supplementary laws, the passage of which was deferred by the assembly and that of the ceremonial for the reception of the oath of the monarch-elect, do not furnish a sufficient reason indefinitely to prolong the life of the Cortes, and therewith the interim condition and the evils which all parties have recognized and condemned.

For these briefly stated reasons the undersigned propose to the assembly to be pleased to decree :

That the Cortes shall receive the oath of Prince Amadeo, King-elect of Spain, on the day of his arrival at Madrid; and to this end the Cortes shall, until the 30th day of the present month, discuss and approve the ceremonial laws for the King's reception and for his taking of the oath, the laws for the division of electoral districts, and those relating to incompatibilities, to the endowment of the monarch, and the negotiation of treasury notes; devoting two sessions daily to this task, said sessions to be held every day, holidays included; no other business to receive attention during the same, save that during the first two hours of each afternoon session propositions not for new laws and other matters may receive attention. And in case that, said day having arrived, any of the aforesaid laws (bills) shall not have been discussed and approved, the government shall cause the same to be respected as laws, although they may be discussed and approved by the next Cortes; it being understood that the reception of the King's oath shall be the last act of the constituent Cortes; which having been performed, they shall be declared dissolved, and their mission at an end.

The undersigned deputies beg the Cortes to be pleased to decree that, in case the proposed constitution for Porto Rico cannot, for lack of time, be discussed and adopted, in accordance with the provisions of article 108 of the constitution of the state, it may be one of the bills comprised in the proposition which is undergoing discussion, the colonial minister being thus authorized to establish it in Porto Rico at any time during the month of January next.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Madrid, December 23, 1870. (Received January 28.)

SIR: This afternoon I called to present my respects to the minister of state, it being his reception day, and finding his excellency alone, I took occasion to refer to his note of the 19th instant in relation to our reclamations. I said that I had immediately sent to you by post the text of his communication, and had, besides, forwarded by cable a synopsis of the several articles proposed by the Spanish government; that I had not yet received specific instructions as to the answer it would become my duty to make, but that with reference to the first and third articles, and the second and third clauses of the second article, I might at once state that they were quite inconsistent with the principles that had been already indicated for my guidance in the negotiation; that I had sought a frank conversation with his excellency on the subject, under the impression that if the bases contained in his note were entirely unalterable, further correspondence would be useless, and if they were open to modification we could more readily come to an understanding in one or two conferences than by the interchange of elaborate arguments at long intervals. Mr. Sagasta said he would be happy to hear my objections to the articles I had mentioned, premising that the Spanish government could not consent to submit the judgments of its courts to the revision of any other tribunal. I remarked that it would not be expected, on the part of the United States, that the Spanish government would submit the adjudications of its courts to be reviewed by foreign tribunals; that the jurisdiction of an international board of commissioners over the claims of American citizens to be presented to it would rest upon principles often recognized in the intercourse of sovereign states, and that the doctrine upon which these conventions were founded was quite distinct from that to which his excellency referred; that is to say, it is the duty and the right of every nation to see that justice is done to its citizens or subjects by foreign states; that if the authorities of a foreign state failed, in the judgment of the state to which the aggrieved party belonged, to do justice in any particular case, it is competent for that state to demand a suitable reparation or indemnity of the government in fault; and if the two governments fail to agree in the premises it is the better practice of our times, in place of resorting to reprisals, to refer the questions to a mixed commission, with an impartial umpire, for final adjustment.

I then proceeded to state some additional reasons which would forbid the acceptance of the particular stipulations I had enumerated. In the first place I observed that the bases proposed by the Spanish government put the adjudications of civil and military tribunals on the same footing of infallibility, that whatever degree of authority might be claimed abroad for the judgments of the civil magistracy of Cuba, a question I would not then discuss, it could scarcely be expected that the decrees of courts-martial and military commissions, often proceeding summarily (sin formacion de causa) would be accepted by the United States Government as a compliance with the seventh article of the treaty of 1795, which guarantees to American citizens within Spanish territory, in all cases, a fair trial according to the laws of Spain, before a regularly constituted judicial tribunal. Mr. Sagasta answered that military courts regularly constituted, and proceeding in conformity to law, had always held a recognized place in Spanish jurisprudence, and, when acting within the prescribed legal channel, their jurisdiction should be recognized as valid; that he would not, however, claim for the acts of a military court, proceeding summarily and without regard to judicial forms, the respect he insisted should be accorded to the regular tribunals. I then alluded to another class of adjudication in which the courts of Cuba had pronounced sentences confiscating the property of citizens of the United States not within the jurisdiction of the court, nor present at the trial, and remarked that such proceedings were so far in conflict with our notions of justice that it would be in vain to hope for the acquiescence of the United States Government in any decree of that kind affecting the persons and property of American citizens.

To this suggestion Mr. Sagasta replied that such judgments were not executory according to Spanish law; that, as regarded property, they were in the nature of attachments, and with reference to persons they were to be considered as informations or indictments; that at all events they were not final, and would not be deemed to exclude the matter from the jurisdiction of a mixed commission. Having satisfied myself that the minister was not disposed to insist, without modification, on the bases he had proposed, I yielded to his suggestion to submit in the more precise form of a written communication the amendments I might desire, to which he promised to give immediate attention. I shall, therefore, answer his note of the 19th instant as soon as I receive your instruction in reply to my telegram of that date.

At this moment the cabinet is more than usually preoccupied with domestic questions; the Cortes will adjourn without day on the first of next month; the reign of the new dynasty will be inaugurated at the same time, and with it a new ministry, and almost certainly a new secretary of state will be named. There is now pending in the Cortes a proposition to give the executive certain extraordinary powers until the election of the first congress to be chosen under the constitution of 1869. This measure has provoked a parliamentary conflict that has already occupied several sittings of the chamber. Mr. Sagasta intimated that he expected to take part in the debate this afternoon, and for that reason, among others, I forbore proceeding further with the discussion I had, perhaps, somewhat irregularly prolonged in view of the informal occasion of our interview.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Madrid, December 28, 1870. (Received January 23, 1871.)

SIR: I regret to have to report to you that last evening, while the president of the council, General Prim, accompanied by two of his aides-de-camp, was driving home in his carriage from the palace of the Cortes, he was fired upon and dangerously wounded by a party of armed men who had placed themselves in Turk street, not far from the palace of the minister of war, where General Prim resides. One of the aides-de-camp was likewise seriously wounded. It appears that neither the police nor the military guard were near enough to the scene of the occurrence to make any arrests, and in the absence of any knowledge on the subject it is supposed that political motives prompted the attack. The approaching consummation of General Prim's scheme to place a member of the royal family of Savoy on the Spanish throne had provoked intense animosity among the partisans of other dynasties—Isa-bellina, Orleanist, and Carlist. Symptoms of irritation and impatience had likewise been shown by a few republicans, although for the most part the supporters of this advanced system of government evince a wise adhesion to the temperate counsels of their leaders, who advise a reliance on peaceful and legal means to obtain power, so long as the rights secured in the constitution of 1869 are respected by the government and enjoyed by the people. I heard of the sad occurrence while at the opera, and immediately repaired to the war department to inform myself of the condition of the minister and to assure him of the solicitude with which I should look forward to his recovery from the injuries he had received. I learned that already several balls had been extracted from his left shoulder and chest, and that one or two of the fingers of his left hand had been badly shattered, rendering amputation necessary. I was, however, told by some of his colleagues and by several officers of rank that the surgeons did not regard the injuries as mortal. This favorable view of the case is confirmed this morning by the official gazette, in its bulletin; nevertheless I am not without apprehension, considering the number of shots said to have taken effect and the somewhat impaired health of General Prim, that the deplorable event may have a fatal result. The most profound agitation pervades the capital, and strong measures are taken to prevent the revolutionary outbreak which is apprehended. Deeming the occasion a proper one for some official expression of regret, I have to-day addressed a note to the minister of state, referring to the incident in terms which I trust you may not find inappropriate.

I have the honor to inclose a copy of my communication, and to remain, sir, &c.,

SIR: If I hasten to assure your excellency how deeply I deplore the assault made last night on the person of his excellency the president of the council of ministers, it is because I know that I only anticipate the commands of the President in characterizing the crime as one of those offenses against civilization that associate all nations in their denunciation of its enormity, and in their sympathy for the illustrious sufferer. At the same time I beg to offer your excellency my congratulations upon the confident hope entertained of the speedy recovery of the president of the council from the serious bodily injuries his excellency received on the lamentable occasion I have mentioned.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Madrid, December 31, 1870. (Received January 28, 1871.)

SIR: The official gazette of to-day announces that the president of the council of ministers, General Prim, died last night at forty-five minutes past 8 o'clock. I heard of his death at the palace of the minister of war, soon after it happened, as I had gone thither to inquire about him, in consequence of the rumors of his decease which had spread through the city at an early hour in the evening. It is now acknowledged that, from the first, no hope of his recovery was expressed by the attending physicians, and that grave reasons of state made it expedient to publish official statements of his convalescence. The members of the diplomatic body are requested to join the funeral procession to-morrow at the war department, and proceed thence to the church of Atocha, where the offices will be celebrated. I have the honor to forward herewith a copy of a note I have to-day addressed to the minister of state on the occasion of this sad event. The Countess of Rens, the widow of the late minister, has been created Duchess of Prim in her own right, and a further decree provides that she shall enjoy all the honors pertaining to a captain general of the army. General Prim's only son, the Vizconde del Bruch, a lad some ten or twelve years old, is created Duke of Los Castillejos, so named from a battle in the late war in Africa in which General Prim bore a distinguished part, and for which he was made a marquis by Queen Isabella. He conferred upon himself the grade of captain general after the revolution.

So far, no serious disturbance of the public tranquillity has followed the tragic occurrence to which the prime minister has fallen a victim. This fact repels the suggestion that the assault was the act of a political conspiracy, having for its object to seize possession of the government. It rather tends to confirm the more probable supposition that motives of personal revenge, perhaps originating in one of the many executions which have taken place during the past year in Cuba and on the peninsula, led to this signal crime. Although several arrests have been made, nothing is yet known of the offenders, nor is it probable, considering the inefficiency of the police in Spain and the impunity with which like offenses have been committed during the past year, that the guilty parties will ever be brought to justice.

SIR: I cannot refrain from tendering to your excellency the expression of my sympathy with the government and people of Spain in the severe and untimely loss they have suffered by the sudden decease of his excellency the Conde de Rens, president of the council of ministers. If any circumstance could deepen the impression made by this sad event, it would be found in the untoward means employed to put an end to the career of a distinguished general and statesman, whose services had often been signalized by tokens of public approbation and gratitude. The people of the United States, who have themselves suffered a like bereavement, will share with the chivalrous Spanish nation its regard for the memory of a great minister and its abhorrence of the unseen and unhallowed hands that struck him down at his post of duty.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Madrid, January 5, 1871. (Received February 3, 1871.)

SIR: On the 2d instant the Duke of Aosta reached Madrid and took the prescribed oaths of office, in presence of the Regent, the Cortes, and the diplomatic body. The ceremony was brief, and not unlike, although less impressive than, the inauguration of the President. I have high authority for the statement that His Majesty intended to read an inaugural address, which had been prepared, but that the precipitation with which the proceeding was conducted by the presiding officer of the Cortes afforded no opportunity for the royal speech. I suspect there may have been a purpose in this haste, as the King does not yet express himself with facility in Spanish. From the Cortes His Majesty was escorted by a strong column of troops of all arms to the palace. From thence he soon afterwards proceeded in a coach, unattended, to visit the widow of General Prim and the Duke de la Torre.

Although the people in the streets were anything but enthusiastic, no disturbance occurred, and the King's reception, if cold, was respectful. His person was found prepossessing, and I fancy the multitude were touched by the air of confidence in their hospitality to a stranger, if not in their loyalty, with which he rode through the streets, where the funeral procession of the minister to whom he owed his crown had passed only the day before.

To-day the official gazette announces the acceptance of the resignation of the provisional minister of Admiral Topete, and the formation of a new cabinet, in which General Serrano is president of the council and secretary of war; Señor Don Cristino Martos, minister of state; Señor Don Augusto Weloa, minister of grace and justice; Señor Don Segismundo Moret, secretary of the treasury; Señor Don José Maria de Beranger, secretary of the navy; Señor Don Práxedes Mateo Sagasta, minister of the home department, (gobernacion;) Señor Don Manuel Ruiz Zorilla, minister of public works, (fomento;) and Señor Don Adolfo López de Ayala, secretary of the colonial department, (ultramar.)

This cabinet represents the three principal monarchical parties identified with the revolution of 1868, and who united in the election of the Duke of Aosta to the throne. These parties, "progresistas," "union liberals," and "democratic monarchists," although differing in many particulars of political doctrine and administrative policy, and often antagonistic in their action, were not unfrequently associated under the adroit management of General Prim when their coalition was necessary to the success of his plans. It remains to be seen whether his successor in the direction of affairs will be able, for any length of time, to conduct an administration in which the elements are supposed to be quite incapable of cohesion except for an occasional exigency. In illustration of the composite structure of the new ministry, I may mention the rumor, apparently well authenticated, that to several of the more important departments assistant secretaries will be assigned, whose political affinities are quite distinct from those of their chiefs, although in harmony with the views of other members of the cabinet.

My own impression is that the new cabinet is the result of a truce between the representatives of rival factions, neither of which has enough of popular strength to sustain a ministry, and all of whom have a common interest in maintaining the dynasty they have contributed to inaugurate. In the late regent the King found a popular and brilliant soldier, enjoying the confidence of the army and thoroughly competent to deal with any seditious movement that might be attempted. Less pronounced in his partisanship than the civilian leaders of his own or of the other parties, his presence at the head of affairs seemed most likely to allay any suspicion of a purpose to turn the patronage and power of the prime minister to account in the approaching elections for provisional assemblies and the general congress. All parties look forward with solicitude to these elections—the first that will have taken place under the new constitution—as affording the best evidence of the popular judgment upon the results attained by the revolution of 1868. For the King, the votes will resolve the doubts expressed of the disposition of the people to accept a foreign prince for a ruler. The rival factions of the revolutionary party that sought a change of dynasty and a modification of the monarchy in a direction more or less subject to the restraints of a written constitution guaranteeing personal liberty and establishing co-ordinate powers in the state, will of course endeavor to obtain an ascendancy in the first congress to be chosen, so that a practical direction, in harmony with the opinions of one or the other, may be given to the new form of government. * * *

The dissolution of the Cortes constituyentes without action upon the subject of colonial reform postpones, I fear, for a long period, if not indefinitely, any essential change in the unhappy condition of Cuba and Porto Rico. This cabinet, if disposed to undertake the task, would not be likely to agree upon a matter which most Spanish statesmen approach with reluctance, and that involves considerations quite certain to produce discord in a ministry comprising several phases of political opinion. I shall, nevertheless, be disappointed if I do not find, in Mr. Martos, the new minister of state, a disposition to adjust some, at least, of the questions which, if left unsettled much longer, must seriously affect the hitherto friendly relations of the two countries.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Madrid, January 10, 1871. (Received February 3.)

SIR: I have the honor to forward herewith a copy of my reply to Mr. Sagasta's note of the 19th ultimo, in relation to our reclamations for injuries suffered by American citizens in Cuba.

Mr. Sagasta was transferred from the ministry of foreign affairs to the home department immediately after my last interview with him on the subject of his note, reported in my No. 230. The appointment of his successor, Admiral Topete, which was made on the 27th ultimo, was understood to be merely provisional. The decease of General Prim on the 30th, and the advent of the new King, rendered a reorganization of the cabinet necessary. I therefore determined to wait for that event before framing my reply, since its tenor would depend, in some degree, upon the minister to whom it might be addressed. It will be observed that I have confined myself to a brief and very imperfect statement of the most obvious objections to the Spanish propositions. If Mr. Sagasta had continued in office, a more thorough discussion would, perhaps, have been expedient. I cannot believe that Mr. Martos, who is regarded as a learned jurist, will adhere to the positions taken by his predecessor.

Yesterday I mentioned to the assistant secretary of state that my reply would go in to-day, and requested him to put the correspondence before the minister, in order that he might be prepared to give the matter prompt attention. Mr. de Blas told me that he had already conferred with Mr. Martos on the subject, and he was quite sure that this question would be among the first considered.

I am, &c.,

D. E. SICKLES.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Madrid, January 8, 1871.

SIR: I had the honor to receive, on the 19th ultimo, the note of that date, addressed to me by the predecessor of your excellency, in reply to mine of the 14th, in relation to sundry reclamations presented by the Government of the United States for indemnity for injuries suffered by American citizens at the hands of the Spanish authorities in Cuba. Your excellency will appreciate the reasons that have induced me to defer my present communication until the definitive organization of the ministry, in which I am happy to see that your excellency returns to the department of state.

My Government receives with satisfaction the assurance that after the ample and extended discussion of the questions hitherto at issue in the correspondence that has taken place on this subject, the Spanish government believes it most conducive to the interests of both countries to come at once to a practical solution of the matter, in accordance with the principles of equity and justice that animate the respective cabinets.

It is to be regretted that several of the articles submitted on the part of the Spanish government, as regulations for the procedure of the mixed commission proposed by the United States, are not such as would facilitate an agreement between the parties. And it is confidently believed that upon a fair and frank view of these articles, your excellency will be satisfied that the objections to them are insuperable.

It is stipulated by the Spanish government in the first of the proposed articles, in the second and third clauses of the second article, and in the third article:

First. That no indemnity shall be awarded to any party for damages sustained in person or property in consequence of any proceeding or order of any civil or military tribunal, or of any authority having judicial functions, in Cuba.

Second. That in any case in which it shall appear that the civil or military tribunals of Cuba have overruled the claim of a party to be an American citizen, no indemnity shall be awarded; and it is further said that it must appear, in every case, that the party, without delay, asserted his American nationality before the authority inflicting the injury.

It would seem, therefore, that the Spanish government, while admitting its liability, in principle, for the acts of its civil and military authorities in Cuba, declines to recognize its responsibility for acts done pursuant to the orders of persons exercising its judicial power.

In the communication on this subject that I had the honor to receive from the minister of state, under date of 12th September ultimo, it was insisted that none of these claims for indemnity could be entertained by the Spanish government unless they had been first submitted to the adjudication of the tribunal in Cuba. Against that proposition I urged, in my note of October 14, the arguments which appeared to my Government to require its rejection. It is now abandoned, and in its place a ground is taken that appears to the President wholly inconsistent with the doctrine previously held by the cabinet of Madrid, and not less repugnant to precedent and justice.

The principles of international law do not permit a nation to insist either that a sovereign state shall require its citizens to submit their alleged grievances against the authorities of another power to the municipal tribunals of that power; nor that a government is exempt from liability for the acts of its tribunals exercising jurisdiction in its name and within its territory, and subordinate to its authority. On the contrary, it may be unhesitatingly affirmed that the recognized publicists in this branch of jurisprudence distinctly admit the responsibility of governments for injuries suffered through the misdirection, negligence, or fault of their authorities, and no distinction is made in respect to such liability between the acts of judicial officers and the acts of other public agents.

In matters of contract, or in any of the ordinary transactions of commerce between the citizens or subjects of different countries, it is not expected that governments will give their sanction to reclamations based upon complaints of the action of the judicial tribunals of other states, unless it is manifest that such gross misconduct has been committed as amounts to a denial of justice. The reclamations presented by the United States against Spain rest upon an entirely different ground. It is represented to the Government of the United States, upon evidence satisfactory to the President, that sundry citizens of the United States have been wrongfully injured in their persons and property by the authorities of Cuba, in a series of measures growing out of the state of hostilities of which that island has been the theater for more than two years. It is charged that American citizens have been arbitrarily deprived of their estates and merchandise by the mere order of the captain general and those exercising authority under that officer. In some cases it is alleged that American citizens have been arrested and imprisoned without sufficient or probable cause. In other instances it appears that they have been denied the rights and immunities guaranteed to citizens of the United States by the treaty with Spain of October 27, 1795. These reclamations having been presented to the government of Spain, and it appearing that the two governments could not agree upon the facts and circumstances of the several cases, nor upon the redress to which the parties were entitled, it is proposed by the United States to submit all the claims to a mixed commission of three members, one to be named by each party and the umpire to be chosen by the other two commissioners, with power to hear and adjudge these several complaints upon just and equitable grounds.

In answer to this reasonable and friendly proposal the Spanish government now requires that the jurisdiction of the commission shall not extend to any claims in which the civil or military tribunals of Cuba have rendered judgment upon the merits of the case; and furthermore that the Government of the United States shall not be permitted to prosecute before the commission the claim of any citizen whose right to its protection has been considered and denied by a civil or military tribunal in Cuba.

In a conference with one of your excellency's predecessors on the 23d ultimo, I presented the principal grounds upon which these proposed limitations to the jurisdiction of the commission are deemed by the Government of the United States unreasonable and untenable. If I now recapitulate some of them, it is because they have not been brought to the notice of your excellency since your entrance upon the duties of the ministry of state. The proposition that the adjudications of Spanish tribunals are conclusive in all cases, whether affecting the person and property of Spanish subjects or of citizens of the United States, is in conflict with many approved precedents found in the leading authorities on international law, and is inconsistent with the practice of the Spanish government.

Grotius maintains that a judicial sentence plainly against right, to the prejudice of a foreigner, entitles his nation to obtain reparation by reprisals; "for the authority of the judge," he says, "is not of the same force against strangers as against subjects."

Bynkershoek also puts an unjust judgment upon the same footing with naked violence in authorizing reprisals on the part of the state whose subjects have been thus injured by the tribunals of another state.

And Vattel, in enumerating the different modes in which redress may be refused so as to authorize reprisals, mentions a judgment manifestly unjust and partial; and although he affirms, what is undeniable, that the judgments of the ordinary tribunals ought not to be called in question upon frivolous or doubtful grounds, yet he is evidently far from attributing to them that sanctity which would absolutely preclude a foreign government from seeking reparation in cases where, by reason of their action, its citizens have suffered wrongs.

Wheaton affirms that these principles are sanctioned by the authority of numerous treaties between the different powers of Europe regulating the subject of reprisals, and declaring that they shall not be admitted unless in cases of the denial of justice. "An unjust sentence," he adds, "must certainly be considered a denial of justice, unless the mere privilege of being heard before condemnation is all that is included in the idea of justice."

It may be remarked that it is by no means an uncommon occurrence for judgments affecting life and property to be pronounced by the tribunals in Cuba in the absence of the accused and without hearing any one authorized to appear in his behalf. Citizens of the United States can only be expected to acquiesce in the judgments of Spanish courts so far as their decrees are agreeable to the law of nations and to the treaties in force between the two countries. The Spanish government is bound to see that justice is done within Spanish territory to the citizens or subjects of other countries. And if justice is denied them, the aggrieved citizens of other states may rightfully seek through their respective governments an adequate indemnity.

Under the treaty of 1794 between the United States and Great Britain, a mixed commission was appointed to determine the claims of American citizens. In the course of the proceedings objections were made on the part of England against hearing any case where the British judicial tribunals had decided the reclamation adversely to the claimant, inasmuch as it was to be presumed that justice had been done. But this objection was overruled and the claims were allowed in many cases where equity seemed to require indemnity.

The United States made a like demand upon Denmark for indemnity in consequence of the denial of justice to American citizens by Danish courts. It was admitted, after a very elaborate and able discussion, that the most fit and proper measure by which a nation could satisfy itself of the injustice of sentences pronounced by its courts, was an impartial tribunal organized under the sanction of the two countries, for the purpose of determining between government and government whether any wrong had been done by the judicial authorities of the one power against the citizens of the other, and for determining what redress ought to be granted to the latter. In conformity to these principles a treaty was concluded by which a satisfactory indemnity was provided for the American claimants. In the treaty of 1835 between Spain and Great Britain, article 7, it is provided that mixed tribunals shall decide questions arising within Spanish jurisdiction affecting Africans.

In the treaties between Spain and Turkey, Morocco, Tunis, and Tripoli, it is provided that Spanish subjects shall not be subject to the jurisdiction of the courts of those countries.

From 1667 down to 1869, more than two centuries, Spain admitted in her treaties with European states the right of foreigners to an exceptional and special jurisdiction within Spanish territory. This fuero de extranero, at first conceded in the treaty with England, was afterward extended under the "most favored nation" clause to other powers. The tribunals organized for the exercise of this jurisdiction were under the immediate direction and control of the Crown, and all their judgments and proceedings were subject to the royal revision and sanction, so that their acts were, in fact as in theory, the acts of the government, and for which it was responsible to the powers interested in the protection of their citizens and subjects.

It appears, therefore, from the foregoing review of the public law and of the precedents found in the public transactions of states, that the limitations proposed by Spain to the jurisdiction of the mixed commission are inconsistent with her own practice and that of other nations in analogous cases, and contrary to the principles defined by the recognized authorities in questions of international right. I am instructed to state that the President regards the conditions I have specified as inadmissible, and he trusts that upon further consideration the government of Spain will find it agreeable to its views of equity to concede to the impartial tribunal proposed to be created ample jurisdiction to redress whatever injuries American citizens may have wrongfully suffered at the hands of Spanish authorities in Cuba.

The President contemplates that every claimant will be required to make good before the commission his injury and his right to indemnity. It is not desired that the commission shall take cognizance of claims growing out of contracts. Naturalized citizens of the United States will, if insisted upon by Spain, be required to show when and where they were naturalized; and it will be open to Spain to traverse this fact, or to show that from any of the causes named in the circular of the Department of State of the United States, of October 14, 1869, the applicant has forfeited his acquired rights. I am quite sure that your excellency will find in such a provision abundant safeguards against any alleged abuse of the claim of American citizenship.

I must decline any discussion of the third proposition presented in the note from the ministry of state of December 19, which seems to maintain that the adjudications of Cuban civil and military tribunals upon the naturalization laws of the United States should be accepted by my Government as determining the nationality of those it may deem entitled to its protection. That proposition cannot be entertained.

It is besides contemplated by the President that the respective claims and the proof appertaining to them shall be presented only through the Government of the United States; that each government may employ a person as agent or counsel to represent it before the commission; that the commissioners shall have full power to make their own rules as to the mode and time of the presentation of claims and of the proof thereof; and that before making such regulations, they shall agree upon an umpire to whom shall be referred all questions on which they cannot agree, including the rules aforesaid. And it will be for the commission, so constituted, after hearing the allegations and proofs on the part of the two governments, to decide upon all the facts and circumstances of each case, whether or not the claim is just, and the amount of indemnity, if any, to be awarded.

It is desirable that the proposed commission be organized at an early day. To this end it would be convenient if the convention were transmitted to Washington during the present month, in time for the action of the Senate before the day fixed for its adjournment, and that the exchange of ratifications take place at Washington.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew to your excellency the assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

SIR: This ministry duly received your considerate note dated the 31st ultimo, making known the profound regret with which you had learned of the unqualifiable attack committed on the person of the president of the council of ministers, on the night of the 27th of December, and of the sad event which was its consequence.

In taking upon myself the charge of responding to this as well as to the note addressed to my predecessor in relation to the same deplorable occurrence, I fulfill the grateful duty of making known to you the expression of the sincere thankfulness with which the Spanish government has received your feeling communications, and it only remains for me to add that, as far as I am personally concerned, they serve to demonstrate to me once more the cordiality and good faith with which the Government of the United States responds to the friendly sentiments of that of His Majesty the King of Spain.

SIR: I have received your No. 223, dated the 20th ultimo, inclosing a copy of Mr. Sagasta's note of the 19th ultimo, relative to the reclamations for injuries done to American citizens in Cuba by the Spanish authorities. I also received your telegram of the 27th ultimo, suggesting a proposal of certain modifications of the Spanish bases set forth in Mr. Sagasta's note, the effect of which not being entirely comprehended by the President, I telegraphed you to that effect, and added that I would await the arrival of the text of the note; and, in my No. 234, of the 27th ultimo, I transmitted to you a copy of that telegram. Since then I have further received your telegram of the 13th instant, informing me that you had replied to Mr. Sagasta's note of the 19th ultimo. I shall await the receipt of that reply before making further comments. You correctly characterize the Spanish conditions as "plainly inadmissible." It is sincerely to be hoped, in the best interests of both countries, that these negotiations may at an early day reach a satisfactory conclusion.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a translation of a note dated the 17th instant from the minister of state, in reply to mine of the 21st ultimo, relating to the delay in the execution of the law of 23d June, 1870, emancipating certain classes of slaves in the Antilles.

I inclose also, for your information on the subject of colonial reform, a fuller report, taken from El Correo de España, of the debate in the Cortes, of which I sent you what now appears to have been a resumé in my No. 233.

Mr. Martos, one of the signers of the proposal made to the Cortes on the 20th ultimo, to authorize the government to put the proposed constitution for Porto Rico into immediate operation, is now minister of state for foreign affairs. Mr. Moret, then minister of the colonies, is the secretary of the treasury in the present cabinet.

MINISTRY OF STATE,
The Palace, January 17, 1871.

SIR: The minister of the colonies, to whom a copy of your note dated the 21st of last December, respecting the question of slavery and political reforms in Cuba and Porto Rico, was duly furnished, in a communication of the 12th instant, makes the following statements, which I have the honor to set before you.

"The law of slavery, passed by the constituent Cortes on the 23d of June last, has been fulfilled and obeyed in all its parts in Cuba from the date of its publication, although the absence of regulations for its execution makes it necessary that what would have otherwise been a matter of mere form should be made the basis for regularly instituted proceedings for the clear determination of each case. In order that the execution of the said law may suffer no obstruction, this ministry has prepared ample and detailed bases to serve as a starting-point for the regulations referred to, which have been already framed at some length by the superior civil governor of that Antilla, and have been transmitted to the council of state, subject to the provisions of the law organizing that high body, in order that the definitive regulations for carrying out the law in question may be drawn up without delay. Meanwhile it has been ordered that the bases referred to shall be provisionally obeyed in all cases where their enforcement may not be absolutely impossible. In Porto Rico the law of the 23d of June has also been promulgated, and the preparation of its regulations is under consideration. The slaveholders of that island have anticipated abolition in the name of the Cortes and the government, and the fact of the law not having been before promulgated in that Antilla is mainly owing to the desire on the part of the authorities to give time to the proprietors to accomplish emancipation spontaneously, as, in fact, the greater number have already done, for it is better that the slaves should owe much to their masters in the question of freedom, and that they should not depend alone on the action of the government. Besides the precepts of the law passed by the Cortes, in which the public opinion of all countries has seen the demonstration of the intention of the Spanish government to bring about the disappearance of slavery from its American domain, this ministry is in active correspondence with the superior authorities of the Antilles with the aim of accomplishing the complete abolition of slavery, and for this purpose the government has authorized meetings of the slaveholders, that they may consider and prepare a plan for the immediate realization of this object. The representative of the United States at this court can bear witness to the earnestness with which the government of Spain is acting in the question of slavery, and knowing, as he does, as well by the official documents made public by this ministry as by the communications made to him personally, all the steps that have been taken in so important a matter, he must appreciate the good results thus far obtained and those confidently to be looked for in the future. None of the nations in whose dominions slavery existed were able to realize its abolition, nor even to modify the system preparatory to its subsequent extinction, without serious perturbation of public order and detriment to agricultural and industrial interests. Spain, although occupied with internal questions of policy and forced to sustain a formidable conflict in the most important of her possessions, has initiated and made great progress in the solution of this transcendent problem without complications or disturbances arising, and has seen with satisfaction that the slaveholders themselves, animated by feelings of pure patriotism, are aiding her in her humanitarian work, and are even considering and preparing for complete abolition. As for the political reforms proposed for the Antilles by the government in the early days of the revolution, your excellency is perfectly aware how sincere this ministry has been in its intentions and what perseverance it has shown in the fulfillment of those promises. A provincial law and a municipal law in complete harmony with the Peninsular government are now in force, and are obeyed without opposition in Porto Rico, and that island has been represented in the constituent Cortes.

"The war in Cuba has impeded the extension of analogous reforms to that colony, but its end being near, the government will soon have facilities for realizing with all proper prudence the designs above indicated."

I improve this occasion to reiterate to you the assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Madrid, January 23, 1871. (Received February 17.)

SIR: On the receipt of your instruction of the 18th instant, through the legation at London, I communicated the purport of it unofficially to a member of the cabinet, suggesting its significance, and at the same time I addressed a note to the minister of state, asking an interview. Mr. Martos promptly replied, desiring me to come to the palace to-day at 3 in the afternoon. I then recapitulated to the minister the successive steps in the negotiation for a claims convention begun in June last, touching incidentally upon the frequent modifications of the attitude of his predecessor, Mr. Sagasta, in the course of the correspondence, as well as in our personal conferences. After calling the attention of Mr.

Martos to the patience with which the President had permitted me to follow the discussion so tardily conducted by the Spanish government, and his forbearance in asking for a decisive answer to our propositions while the cabinet of Madrid found itself preoccupied by important home questions, I stated that, in view of the completed organization of this government, and of the approaching termination of the last session of the present Congress, I was instructed to report at once to the President whether there was any probability of an early and favorable issue to the negotiation, and I added that, while I ought not to conceal from his excellency the impression that would be made by a negative answer, I must frankly state that I could not, without a further communication from him, send any other than a most discouraging reply to the inquiry addressed to me by my Government.

The minister immediately sent for the assistant secretary, Mr. de Blas, and asked him for a statement of the points at issue, remarking that, although he had given some attention to the subject, he had not yet gone through the voluminous correspondence and papers relating to it. Mr. de Blas proceeded to give a resumé of the discussion, which I had occasion to complete by directing Mr. Martos's attention to Mr. Sagasta's proposed limitations of the jurisdiction of the commission, as stated in his note of December 19, these being, as I remarked, the principal obstacles in the way of an agreement.

The minister then stated that he would take up the subject to-morrow, and after a conference with his colleagues, would be prepared on the following day, when he expected to meet me at dinner at my house, to acquaint me, at least informally, of the reply I might rely upon receiving this week to my note of the 8th instant.

Upon the suggestion of Mr. de Blas, the minister desired me to inform you by telegraph of the assurance he had given me. The conversation then drifted toward a discussion of the doctrine propounded by Mr. Sagasta, that no case which had been decided by a Spanish tribunal could be submitted to international arbitration—a proposition that neither Mr. Martos nor Mr. de Blas appeared disposed to maintain.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Madrid, January 26, 1871. (Received February 23.)

SIR: I have already sent to you by telegraph to-day the substance of the verbal communication made to me last night, at my house, by the minister of state.

Mr. Martos said that he sincerely desired to come to an understanding with me as to the best manner of disposing of the reclamations I had presented; that he believed an expeditious and satisfactory arrangement would be found in following the precedent of the "Lloyd Aspinwall" case, inasmuch as a formal convention or treaty must be laid before the Spanish as well as the American Senate; that the former body had not yet been chosen, and no day having been appointed when it should meet, considerable delay would attend the exchange of ratifications of a treaty.

With reference to the question of the jurisdiction of the arbitrators, he was disposed to yield the principal points of difference that had arisen in the course of the negotiation; he would agree to the arbitration of all claims of American citizens for violation of the treaty of 1795: he deemed it right, however, to insist that whenever a case had been adjudicated by the Spanish tribunals, in conformity with the guarantees and forms stipulated in the treaty of 1795, the judgment should be allowed to stand; and, also, that in any case in which an American citizen had failed to disclose his nationality to the tribunal before which he appeared, he should be debarred from claiming indemnity for the same subject-matter from the arbitrators; but in regard to the adjudications of Spanish tribunals upon the nationality of persons claiming to be American citizens, he agreed that such judgments should in no case preclude the parties from having their claims heard and decided by the arbitrators.

Mr. Martos, in making this verbal communication, stated that during the present week I would receive a formal reply to my note of January 8th. I observed that I would acquaint you with what he had said, and reserve any observations I had to make until the receipt of his note.

Referring to articles 70 and 74 of the Spanish constitution, it will be seen that, although the King may declare war and make peace, he cannot, unless authorized by law, cede any part of Spanish territory, admit foreign troops on Spanish soil, ratify a treaty of alliance offensive, or a commercial convention, or a stipulation to pay a subsidy to a foreign power, or any compact that may personally bind his subjects. It does not distinctly appear that a claims convention is embraced within these provisions; but upon a question involving the powers belonging respectively to the several departments of this government, I hesitated to dissent from the opinion expressed by so distinguished a jurist as the minister of state.

The dispatch, as sent to his excellency, read as follows:

HAMILTON FISH, Secretary of State, Washington:

Minister says that this government will arbitrate all claims for violation of treaty ninety-five. Arbitrators may award damages in cases decided by Spanish tribunals; it appears that treaty has been violated. Adjudications of Spanish tribunals on the question of citizenship not to bar jurisdiction of commission. No adjudicated claim to be considered, if presented by a party who appeared before a Spanish tribunal and failed to assert his nationality. Spanish government prefers that this arrangement be made by an interchange of notes, as the Aspinwall case was settled, without formal convention or treaty.

General SICKLES :

ESTEEMED SIR: Mr. Martos, to whom I have just read the draught of the telegram you were pleased to send him by your secretary, Mr. Adey, instructs me to state to you that it is correct without any alteration save the re-writing, for greater clearness, of the paragraph commencing "Arbitrators may award damages," &c., in the following form :

The arbitrators may award damages in cases already adjudicated by the Spanish tribunals, if it appear that in their judgments the guarantees and forms consigned in the treaty of 1795 have been violated.

In complying with Mr. Martos's order, I improve this opportunity to offer myself to you as your obedient servant,

A corresponding change was made, in accordance with Mr. Martos's wishes, and the dispatch was transmitted to you, by way of the United States legation in London, at 7 o'clock last evening, in the following words :

BENJAMIN MORAN, United States Chargé, London :

Telegraph the following to Fish when intelligibly received :

Minister says this government will arbitrate all claims for violation of treaty of ninety-five. Arbitrators may award damages in cases decided by Spanish tribunals if it appear that their judgments have violated the guarantees and forms of the treaty of ninety-five. Adjudications of Spanish tribunals on the question of citizenship not to interfere with jurisdiction of commission. No adjudicated claim to be considered if presented by a party who appeared before a Spanish tribunal, and failed to assert his nationality.

Spanish government prefers that this arrangement be made by an interchange of notes, without formalities of a convention or treaty, as the Aspinwall case was settled.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

SIR: In compliance with the request of the minister of state, I called upon him yesterday afternoon at 2 o'clock, when he informed me that the preparation of his reply to my note of the 8th instant had been unavoidably delayed; but that, in deference to the wish I had so often expressed for prompt action in the matter of our reclamations, he was then prepared to submit to me the concluding portion of his answer, embracing the bases proposed by the Spanish government for a settlement of the question.

I remarked that I would send you a translation of his propositions, and wait the receipt of your instructions in reply to my telegram of the 5th instant, informing you of his previous verbal statement of the same propositions. Mr. Martos then kindly offered to forward my telegraphic dispatch through the Spanish legation in London, giving it precedence in the Spanish wires over all other matter. This courteous offer I accepted, and at 6 o'clock last evening the following dispatch, addressed to our chargé d'affaires in London, was left at the ministry of state for transmission to that city :

BENJAMIN MORAN, United States Chargé d'Affaires, London :

Send following by cable to Washington :

Minister of foreign affairs communicates following bases for settlement of our reclamations :

First. The arbitrators shall adjudge reclamations preferred by American citizens against acts of the Spanish authorities in Cuba, and also against judgments of tribunals or military commissions in Cuba, for the sole object of investigating and deciding whether the forms of law have been observed in those adjudications, and especially whether the guarantees in the treaty of 1795 have been complied with.

Second. The arbitrators shall also have cognizance of the reclamations of those Spaniards naturalized as American citizens who, having asserted their acquired nationality before the tribunals or military commissions, have had their allegation disallowed. In these cases the arbitrators shall have full powers to decide whether the claimants possess the qualifications of American citizens or not. The commission having recognized the quality of American citizenship, the claimants will possess the rights to which the first paragraph refers.

Third. Those naturalized Spaniards who failed to allege their quality as foreigners before the tribunals or Spanish authorities, shall have no right to a hearing before the commission.

The failure to assert their nationality shall be accepted as a submission to the tribunals and authorities of Spain in Cuba.

Article fifth. The bases being accepted, the corresponding document shall be drawn up and exchanged by means of notes between the two governments of Madrid and Washington.

Articles four and six relate to matters of detail, and substantially agree with our views.

SIR: A telegram was sent to you on the 28th instant, through the United States legation at London, the text of which is as follows :

"MORAN, Chargé, London :

Send the following to Sickles by a special messenger, by the earliest opportunity :

"Telegram of 26th received. We prefer a convention, but will not refuse submission, as proposed, of all claims, such as were indicated in the power sent you, dated 13th December last, whether in violation of international law or of treaty rights. Your notes of July 26th and October 14th cover this ground. Understanding the proposition thus, it is not objectionable. The arbitrators should have the powers given by article 21 of the treaty of ninety-five. The time for the presentation of claims may be limited. The convention or submission must allow the presentation of claims not heretofore presented, as was contemplated in your notes."

First point in telegram of 30th inadmissible, if construed as forbidding us to question judgments in violation of international law or of treaty, or if made in the absence of parties. The second and third points seem to exclude naturalized citizens who have not asserted their nationality before Spanish tribunals. My telegram of 28th explains our views. Are these changes, which are inconsistent with telegram of 26th, made for the purpose of delay? Answer, in order that instructions may be given in such case. If Spanish government desire to settle in same manner as in Aspinwall case, why not give Roberts full powers as in that case?

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

SIR: I have the honor to forward herewith a translation of Mr. Martos's reply to my note of the 8th ultimo, in relation to the proposed claims convention. It is dated January 30, and was received on the 31st, although the concluding summary of propositions was read to me at the ministry on the 30th ultimo, and a copy furnished, from which I compiled my telegram of the same date.

I have not yet received your telegram of the 28th ultimo. Mr. Moran informs me that he will send it by special messenger; and I shall defer my reply to Mr. Martos until I receive those instructions, as I suppose they relate to my telegram of the 26th, in which I informed you of Mr. Martos's verbal communication of the previous day.

You will notice in these several papers the usual variation that occurs from time to time in the statement of the views of the government upon the points at issue. I hope, however, to be able very soon to present to the minister of state a memorandum of an arrangement upon which we can agree, and that it will meet the requirements of your instructions.

 [Translation.]

MINISTRY OF STATE,
Madrid, January 30, 1871.

SIR: I have received your note of the 8th instant, in which you are pleased to answer the communication addressed to you under date of the 19th December last, by my worthy predecessor in this ministry, respecting the principles and rules which the Spanish government believed necessary to be followed in the fulfillment of its task by the commission of arbitrators to be named for the purpose of considering the reclamations of American citizens for losses and injuries growing out of the Cuban insurrection.

The undersigned sees with satisfaction that the President of the United States is convinced of the sincere desire of the Spanish government to arrive, as soon as possible at a practical solution which, without infringing the principles of equity and justice that animate the two nations, will result in a happy termination of this question.

For this purpose, and in order to confirm this just confidence, it is indispensable to add a few explanations to the note of December 19, which, by reason of a misapprehension of its meaning or insufficient clearness in expressing the propositions therein contained, has given rise to the observations made by you. I propose to answer these, in the hope that, certain doubts being cleared away, and certain principles duly fixed, the proposal of the government of His Majesty will, in the end, be found to deserve complete acceptance on the part of the United States.

In the different notes addressed to you upon this important question by this ministry of state, the Spanish government has uniformly expressed its unaltered purpose to scrupulously observe the stipulations of the treaty celebrated in 1795, between Spain and the United States, since in this it but obeys its good faith and its loyalty to the cordial relations that since that time have uninterruptedly existed between the two countries.

This starting-point, which we have never lost sight of in the course of this negotiation, is the one that will most certainly lead to a satisfactory termination, narrowing the matter thenceforth to perfectly defined limits, and rendering unnecessary any discussion whatever in the field of the general principle of the law of persons or in that of international private law.

This consideration, moreover, relieves me from the not difficult task of disproving the relevancy of several citations from writers of high authority, brought forward in your note to prove the cases in which reparation is made on the part of one state to the subjects of another power, since your excellency cannot fail to recall how many inexhaustible sources allure the student of this branch of the law, who may seek therein reasons and arguments to support or impugn in turn all that, not being derived from the province of theory, as yet holds no fixed place in written law.

Neither is there any need to pause to demonstrate the lack of foundation of certain examples adduced by you in your note, endeavoring to prove how the subjects or citizens of one power may not be held subject to the jurisdiction of the tribunals of a foreign nation, within whose territory the laws have been violated. The example of the treaties celebrated between Spain and the countries of the east, cited by you, is not, in truth, upon even slight consideration, one which can carry conviction to the mind of any one in this connection. In those treaties, framed in an identical spirit by Spain and by other European nations, stipulations are made for a special legislation, called for by the high interests of civilization, and also by other considerations of a special character, which do not exist in other states, and which cannot be even indirectly attributed to them without injuring their standing among nations.

There is, lastly, another error in the note to which I have the honor to reply, which cannot pass without comment, inasmuch as it affects our constitutional rights and the independence of the powers of the State in the exercise of their elevated functions. You seem to regard it as an accepted fact that the "alien right" (fuero de extranjeria) conceded in Spain to the subjects of other powers, and by which their protection was confided to the jurisdiction of military tribunals, was under the immediate direction and supervision of the crown, all the judgments pronounced by such tribunals being subject to the revision and sanction of the monarch. In all this there is an evident misconception. Before the decree of the 6th of December, 1868, which established the unification of jurisdictions, the captain-generals of districts were, in effect, the protectors of foreigners, and before them the latter enjoyed the privilege of foreign citizenship; but the consideration, trial, and decision of the cases brought to the notice of the said authorities took place with the assistance of a magistrate of the judicial class, called the auditor of war; and he it was who pronounced the sentence. From these judgments an appeal was heard by the tribunal then called the supreme tribunal of war and of the navy, which definitively confirmed or revoked them, but without any kind of intervention on the part of the executive power.

Coming now to the principal object contemplated by the government of His Majesty in this reply, which is, as before said, to set in their true light and give the proper signification to the propositions presented on the 19th of December, I shall commence by stating to you that, in claiming for the judgments of the tribunals of justice the profound respect accorded in all countries to judicial decisions considered as a result of the independence of each state, the Spanish government could not have confused the simplest principles of public law or of the law of persons, nor have attempted to overstep the limits set to the jurisdiction of its legitimate sovereignty. Its purpose was solely to save the independence of the judicial power in all matters referring to the essential features of its judgments, and the ordinary formalities of legal proceedings; but if it appears that the latter have not been complied with, and especially that the guarantees and stipulations in favor of the two contracting parties in the treaty of 1795 have been infringed, the decisions of the tribunals are undoubtedly subject to arbitration, and will have to be adjudged by the commission. So that if, by chance, any American citizen should present a reclamation against the sentence or decision pronounced by a tribunal or military commission of the island of Cuba arising from the insurrection, and if it shall appear that in his case any of the ordinary proceedings were not observed in the judgment, or that the guarantees enumerated in the seventh article or in any other of the treaty were infringed, the arbitrators shall have power to invalidate such decision, and to award, in consequence, the indemnity that may be equitably due.

This explanation of the first of the propositions of the note of December 19 will not only make known to you the purpose of the government of His Majesty to respect the before-cited convention, but will also show the slight foundation there is for your supposition, in the note to which I have the honor to reply, that the Spanish government does not assume in the same manner and in equal proportion the responsibility of the acts of its authorities in Cuba, whether military, civil, or judicial.

Neither has the government of His Majesty asserted, as you are inclined to think, that the judgments of the civil and military tribunals of Cuba concerning the naturalization of Spanish subjects as citizens of the United States, should be accepted and recognized by the North American Government. It is sufficient to enunciate this proposition in these terms, to perceive that it has been mistakenly interpreted. What the government of His Majesty requires, with perfect justice and consistency, is that those American citizens against whom proceedings may have been instituted or decisions pronounced by the Spanish authorities, should have alleged at the time of making reclamation against their enforcement their quality as foreigners, without which they have no right to the guarantees of the treaty. Those who, after the lapse of the necessary opportunity, may have omitted to comply with this requirement, may be naturally separated into two classes—either they who have not been able to prove their supposed nationality, or, in the exercise of a legitimate right, they have submitted with good grace to the jurisdiction of the Spanish authorities; and it is clear that in neither case do they possess the right to have their claims investigated by the commission.

It might, however, happen that some, having alleged their nationality at the proper time, may have seen their assertion disallowed by the tribunals, or by the Spanish authorities in Cuba. Those who are found in this class will sustain no prejudice if they submit anew to the commission of arbitration the definitive decision of their personality, and this being decided will correspondingly affect the claims presented.

The Spanish government having, therefore, fixed with all possible clearness and precision on its part the basis which, in its judgment, will reconcile the interests of the two countries in the adjustment of the reclamations of American citizens by means of the proposed commission, it only remains to call your attention to the concluding portion of your note, in which you are involuntarily led into a contradiction.

You are pleased to recommend all possible activity in the settlement of this matter, in order that both cabinets being in accord, it may be practicable to submit the result to the examination and approval of the Congress at Washington, now near the termination of its session. This course is indicated for the first time in your note of the 8th instant, not having been mentioned in any of your previous communications relative to this question, in which, on the contrary, all your efforts were directed to heightening the necessity of authorizing the representative of Spain in Washington, without loss of time, to proceed to name one of the arbitrators and to inaugurate the labors of the commission. The government of His Majesty, being no less desirous on its part of terminating this matter, does not merely consider the intervention of the legislative body of either country unnecessary, but also fears that the American Congress, being overburdened with the numerous affairs which usually accumulate in the last days of its session, may not, even with the best exertions, avoid the postponement of the approbation of the present basis, the consequent delay being to the prejudice of all parties. The government of His Majesty, therefore, deems it preferable that the proposed settlement should be effected by a simple exchange of notes, thus economizing the time that would necessarily have to be devoted to the approval of the convention, and the interchange of the ratification of the same; if the arrangement were made in the form of a convention, which, on the other hand, does not appear to be entirely regular, especially as the celebration of a new compact is not contemplated nor even the modification of the existing treaty, but rather the application of its provisions in a special case.

Desiring, lastly, to sum up what I have already set forth in the present note, and to reduce to definite form the propositions the Spanish government deems suitable, to be presented for the consideration of that of the United States, I have the honor to propose the following bases:

First. The commission of arbitrators shall take cognizance of and adjudge reclamations preferred by American citizens against acts of the Spanish authorities in Cuba, and also reclamations made by American citizens against the judgments of the tribunals or military commissions of Cuba, for the sole purpose of investigating and deciding whether the forms of law have been observed in those adjudications, and especially whether the guarantees consigned in the treaty of 1795 have been complied with.

Second. The commission of arbitration shall also take cognizance of the reclamations of those Spaniards naturalized as American citizens who, having asserted their acquired nationality before the tribunals or military commissions, have had their allegations disallowed. In these cases the commission of arbitration shall have full powers to decide whether the claimants possess the qualifications of American citizens or not. The commission having recognized the quality of American citizenship in the claimants, they will possess all the rights to which the first paragraph refers.

Third. Those naturalized Spaniards who failed to allege their character as foreigners before the tribunals or Spanish authorities, shall have no right to a hearing before the commission. The failure to assert their nationality shall be accepted as a submission to the tribunals and authorities of Spain in Cuba.

Fourth. The Spanish government and that of the United States shall each respectively name one person to represent it before the commission of arbitrators, and these shall have power to examine and verify the authenticity of the documents presented by the claimants, and to speak in defense of the interests of their respective governments.

Fifth. The present bases having been approved and accepted, the corresponding document shall be drawn up and exchanged by means of notes between the two governments of Madrid and Washington.

Sixth. The Spanish government and that of the United States shall reciprocally bind themselves to give full respect to and to comply in every particular with the decisions of the commission of arbitration.

I improve this opportunity to reiterate to you the assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

SIR: The following is the text of a telegraphic dispatch sent this afternoon to the Department of State at Washington, through the Spanish ministry of state, in the same manner as my telegram of the 30th ultimo:

HAMILTON FISH, Secretary of State, Washington:

Your telegram of 1st instant read to minister of state. He agrees to this reply:

Proof of the desire of this cabinet to settle reclamations promptly is seen in their proposal to avoid delay and formalities of a convention. Roberts will receive full powers, as in Aspinwall case, when bases are settled here. Judgments of Spanish tribunals pronounced in the absence of defendants, or in violation of international law or of treaty, may be reconsidered by the arbitrators. It is also proposed that, when naturalized Spaniards have appeared before Spanish tribunals in Cuba without asserting American nationality, they shall be presumed to have waived or renounced their new allegiance.

My telegram of January 26 was shown to minister before transmission. He now re-affirms its contents.

Your instructions of January 28 not yet received.

SIR: General Badeau reached Madrid on Wednesday, the 8th instant, and delivered to me the text of your telegram of the 28th ultimo, forwarded through the legation at London. I immediately draughted, and on the following day handed to the minister of state, in a personal interview, the note of which the inclosed is a copy, containing the bases of arbitration proposed on our part. I remarked to Mr. Martos that if he agreed to the conditions named, he was at liberty to regard the communication as official, and if he found occasion to suggest any modification, he might treat it as a draught submitted for revision, and return it to me with such amendments as he desired made. I stated that the same messenger who had brought me your final instructions was directed to wait and take with him my report of the conclusion of the negotiation, in order that it might reach Washington before the adjournment of the present Congress, on the 4th proximo.

His excellency promised to give early attention to the subject, and before I took leave of him he sent for Mr. Millan y Caro, the official in charge of the papers, and requested him to translate my note at once, and to have all the documents relating to the matter in readiness for examination on the following day.

I am, &c.,

D. E. SICKLES.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Madrid, February 7, 1871.

SIR: Referring to our several conferences, and to the correspondence which has taken place on the subject, I have the honor to submit for your approval the following memorandum of the proposed arbitration for the settlement of the claims of corporations, companies, or citizens of the United States, against the government of Spain, for wrongs and injuries committed against their persons and property or against the persons and property of citizens of the United States, now deceased, by the authorities of Spain in or about the island of Cuba, since the commencement of the present insurrection.

1. It is agreed that all such claims shall be submitted to arbitrators, one to be appointed by the Secretary of State of the United States, another by the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of Spain at Washington, and these two to name an umpire, who shall decide all questions upon which they shall be unable to agree; and in case the place of either arbitrator or of the umpire shall from any cause become vacant, such vacancy shall be filled forthwith in the manner herein provided for the original appointment.

2. The arbitrators and umpire so named shall meet at Washington within one month from the date of their appointment, and shall, before proceeding to business, make and subscribe a solemn declaration that they will impartially hear and determine, to the best of their judgment, and according to public law and the treaties in force between the two countries and these present stipulations, all such claims as shall, in conformity with this agreement, be laid before them on the part of the Government of the United States; and such declaration shall be entered upon the record of their proceedings.

3. Each government may name an advocate to appear before the arbitrators or the umpire, to represent the interests of the parties respectively.

4. The arbitrators shall have full power, subject to these stipulations, and it shall be their duty, before proceeding with the hearing and decision of any case, to make and publish convenient rules prescribing the time and manner of the presentation of claims, and of the proof thereof; and any disagreement with reference to the said rules of proceeding shall be decided by the umpire. It is understood that a reasonable period shall be allowed for the presentation of the proofs; that all claims, and the testimony in favor of them, shall be presented only through the Government of the United States; that the award made in each case shall be in writing, and, if indemnity be given, the sum to be paid shall be expressed in the gold coin of the United States.

5. The arbitrators shall have jurisdiction of all claims presented to them by the Government of the United States for injuries done to citizens of the United States by the authorities of Spain, in Cuba, since the 1st day of October, 1868. Adjudications of the tribunals in Cuba, concerning citizens of the United States, made in the absence of the parties interested, or in violation of international law, or of the guarantees and forms provided for in the treaty of October 27, 1795, between the United States and Spain, may be reviewed by the arbitrators, who shall make such award in any such case as they shall deem just. No judgment of a Spanish tribunal disallowing the affirmation of a party that he is a citizen of the United States shall prevent the arbitrators from making a reclamation presented in behalf of said party by the United States Government; nevertheless, in any case heard by the arbitrators, the Spanish government may avise the allegation of American citizenship, and thereupon competent and sufficient proof thereof will be required. And it is further agreed that the arbitrators shall not have jurisdiction of any reclamation made in behalf of a native-born Spanish subject naturalized in the United States, if it shall appear that the same subject-matter having been adjudicated by a competent tribunal in Cuba, and the claimant having appeared therein, either in person or by his duly appointed attorney, and being required by the laws of Spain to make a declaration of his nationality, failed to declare that he was a citizen of the United States; in such case, and for the purposes of this arbitration, it shall be deemed and taken that the claimant, by his own default, had renounced his allegiance to the United States; and it is further agreed that the arbitrators shall not have jurisdiction of any demands growing out of contracts.

6. The expenses of the arbitration will be defrayed by a percentage to be added to the amount awarded. The compensation of the arbitrators and umpire shall not exceed $3,000 each; the same allowance shall be made to each of the two advocates representing respectively the two governments; and the arbitrators may employ a secretary, at a compensation not exceeding the sum of $5 per day for every day actually and necessarily given to the business of the arbitration.

7. The two governments will accept the awards made in the several cases submitted to the said arbitration as final and conclusive, and will give full effect to the same in good faith and without delay.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew to your excellency the assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

After a brief allusion on my part to the topics of the day, the minister stated that he had read my note attentively, and found it entirely satisfactory in all essential particulars; that he noted a few slight amendments, to which he has no doubt I would assent, as they would remove any possible ground for conflicting interpretations of the articles in question. He then sent Mr. Millau y Caro, the official in charge of the papers, and read to me the modifications he desired. They did not in any manner deviate from your instructions, and I assented to them. Mr. Martos then stated that his amendments would be put in form and sent to me, to be incorporated in an engrossed copy of our agreement, which I promised to submit to him for his approval. LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Madrid, February 12, 1871. (Received March 3.)

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith inclosed translation of a note from the minister of state, dated yesterday, together with a translation of a paper inclosed therein, containing the several amendments suggested by Mr. Martos to the articles of agreement proposed in my note to him dated the 7th instant. I have already reported to you, in my No. 281, my assent to these modifications of my draught.

The omission of the words "corporations" and "companies" does not exclude the claims of corporate bodies or of associations, since they are, nevertheless, embraced in the more general description of the person whose injuries may be redressed by the arbitrators. Mr. Martos said he preferred to follow the phraseology descriptive of the claimants that we had heretofore employed in our correspondence.

The amendment to the clause designed to admit as claimants the legal representatives of deceased sufferers widens the scope of the original text, because, as amended, alien heirs may have indemnity if the injured parties were citizens of the United States.

The phrase "within the maritime jurisdiction thereof" substituted for "or about the island of Cuba," is more technical than the words in the original text, which were taken from your instruction No. 122. If the Spanish naval forces have committed depredations upon our commerce beyond the maritime jurisdiction of Spain, I presume you would prefer to treat such aggressions separately. On the other hand, it may be supposed that this Government will insist that its authority has only been exercised in waters or on territory within its exclusive jurisdiction, so that no claims arising out of injuries to our commerce that we choose to present to the arbitrators will be excluded by the acceptance of the more definite terms proposed by Mr. Martos.

The amendment proposed to article 5 is a mere amplification of the text.

The substitution of the words "as soon as possible" for the words "without delay," is attributable to the meaning given to the literal translation of the latter into Spanish, which the minister intimated was somewhat too peremptory for a document recognizing the good faith and the high sense of honor of both parties.

These amendments have been incorporated in an engrossed copy of the articles, which I have to-day sent to the ministry of state.

I am, &c.,

D. E. SICKLES.

SIR: I have carefully examined the memorandum which you were pleased to send me in reference to the manner of accomplishing the settlement of the reclamations of citizens of the United States, in consequence of the insurrection in the island of Cuba, and finding that it conforms to what has been agreed upon and accepted in the different conferences we have held on the subject, and to the spirit of the communications that have passed between your legation and this ministry of state, I have much satisfaction in stating to you that the government of his majesty accepts the bases agreed upon, as you have prepared them, with the slight modifications that for greater clearness and precision I have the honor to suggest to you, and that when you are so disposed, the drawing up of the necessary document may be proceeded with, in order that there may be no delay in the definitive conclusion of this matter.

I avail myself of this opportunity to reiterate to you the assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

MINISTRY OF STATE.

Memorandum.—In order to avoid interpretations and doubts which might embarrass the commission of arbitration in the execution of its work, the words "corporations" and "companies" may be struck out from the first lines of the memorandum presented by General Sickles. For the same reason there should be added, after the words "citizens of the United States," the following, "or their heirs," (ó sus herederos.) the paragraph which speaks of American citizens now deceased (que hayan fallecido) being suppressed as unnecessary.

In place of the somewhat vague expression "in or about the island of Cuba," greater precision can be given to the phrase by saying in the island of Cuba, or within its maritime jurisdiction, (en la isla de Cuba ó en sus aguas jurisdiccionales.)

The stipulations numbered 1, 2, 3, and 4 conform entirely to what has been agreed upon.

In the fifth, after the declaration that "the Spanish government may traverse is allegation of American citizenship," there should be added the following paragraph taken from the second of the bases proposed with the note of the 30th of last January: "To commission having recognized the quality of American citizens in the claimants, they acquire the rights accorded to them by the present stipulations as such citizens," (Una vez reconocida por la comision la calidad de ciudadanos Americanos en los reclamantes, obtendrán estos los derechos que como á tales ciudadanos les reconocen las presentes estipulaciones.)

In the 7th or last, the expression "without delay" may be replaced by the following and as soon as possible, (y á la posible brevedad.)

SIR: I have the honor to forward herewith a copy of a communication of yesterday's date addressed by me to the minister of state, embodying the agreement made by me on the part of the Government of the United States with Mr. Martos, representing that of Spain, for the settlement by arbitration of the reclamations of American citizens for injuries done to them by the Spanish authorities in Cuba during the present insurrection in that island. I have the honor to inclose also a translation of the reply of the minister of state of this day's date, assenting to the articles of agreement embodied in the aforesaid communication.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Madrid, February 11, 1871.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive the note of to-day's date addressed to me by your excellency, proposing certain modifications of the plan of arrangement submitted to you on the 7th instant, for the adjustment of the reclamations made by my Government against that of Spain. I take much pleasure in stating that the changes suggested in the memorandum inclosed in your note have my entire concurrence, and have been duly embodied in the following record of the bases upon which we have agreed.

Memorandum of an arbitration for the settlement of claims of citizens of the United States, or of their heirs, against the government of Spain for wrongs and injuries committed against their persons and property, or against the persons and property of citizens of whom the said heirs are the legal representatives, by the authorities of Spain in the island of Cuba, or within the maritime jurisdiction thereof, since the commencement of the present insurrection:

1. It is agreed that all such claims shall be submitted to arbitrators, one to be appointed by the Secretary of State of the United States, another by the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of Spain at Washington, and these two to name an umpire who shall decide all questions upon which they shall be unable to agree, and in case the place of either arbitrator or of the umpire shall from any cause become vacant, such vacancy shall be filled forthwith in the manner herein provided for the original appointment.

2. The arbitrators and umpire so named shall meet at Washington within one month from the date of their appointment, and shall, before proceeding to business, make and subscribe a solemn declaration that they will impartially hear and determine, to the best of their judgment and according to public law and the treaties in force between the two countries and these present stipulations, all such claims as shall, in conformity with this agreement, be laid before them on the part of the Government of the United States, and such declaration shall be entered upon the record of their proceedings.

3. Each government may name an advocate to appear before the arbitrators or the umpire to represent the interests of the parties respectively.

4. The arbitrators shall have full power, subject to these stipulations, and it shall be their duty before proceeding with the hearing and decision of any case, to make and publish convenient rules prescribing the time and manner of the presentation of claims and of the proof thereof; and any disagreement with reference to the said rules of proceeding shall be decided by the umpire. It is understood that a reasonable period shall be allowed for the presentation of the proofs; that all claims and the testimony in favor of them shall be presented only through the Government of the United States; that the award made in each case shall be in writing, and, if indemnity be given, the sum to be paid shall be expressed in the gold coin of the United States.

5. The arbitrators shall have jurisdiction of all claims presented to them by the Government of the United States for injuries done to citizens of the United States by the authorities of Spain in Cuba, since the 1st day of October, 1868.

Adjudications of the tribunals in Cuba concerning citizens of the United States made in the absence of the parties interested, or in violation of international law, or of the guarantees and forms provided for in the treaty of October 27, 1795, between the United States and Spain, may be reviewed by the arbitrators, who shall make such award in any such case as they shall deem just. No judgment of a Spanish tribunal disallowing the affirmation of a party that he is a citizen of the United States shall prevent the arbitrators from hearing a reclamation presented in behalf of said party by the United States Government. Nevertheless, in any case heard by the arbitrators the Spanish government may traverse the allegation of American citizenship, and thereupon competent and sufficient proof thereof will be required. The commission having recognized the quality of American citizens in the claimants, they will require the rights accorded to them by the present stipulation as such citizens. And it is further agreed that the arbitrators shall not have jurisdiction of any reclamation made in behalf of a native-born Spanish subject naturalized in the United States if it shall appear that the same subject-matter having been adjudicated by a competent tribunal in Cuba, and the claimant having appeared therein either in person or by his duly-appointed attorney, and being required by the laws of Spain to make a declaration of his nationality failed to declare that he was a citizen of the United States, in such case and for the purposes of this arbitration it shall be deemed and taken that the claimant, by his own default, had renounced his allegiance to the United States. And it is further agreed that the arbitrators shall not have jurisdiction of any demands growing out of contracts.

6. The expenses of the arbitration will be defrayed by a percentage to be added to the amount awarded. The compensation of the arbitrators and umpire shall not exceed three thousand dollars each. The same allowance shall be made to each of the two advocates representing respectively the two governments, and the arbitrators may employ a secretary at a compensation not exceeding the sum of five dollars a day for every day actually and necessarily given to the business of the arbitration.

7. The two governments will accept the awards made in the several cases submitted to the said arbitration as final and conclusive, and will give full effect to the same in good faith and as soon as possible.

I avail myself of this opportunity to renew to your excellency the assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

D. E. SICKLES.

MINISTRY OF STATE,
Madrid, February 12, 1871.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive the note you were pleased to address me under date of yesterday, communicating to me the definitive record of the memorandum in reference to the manner of arranging the settlement of the reclamations of citizens of the United States consequent upon the insurrection in the island of Cuba, and as in drawing up this document, you have kindly incorporated the slight modification I proposed to you, for greater clearness and precision, in my note of yesterday in answer to yours of the 7th, I take pleasure in informing you that I entirely concur in the contents of the said memorandum.

I improve this occasion to renew to you the assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

No. 289.] MADRID, February 13, 1871. (Received March 9.)

SIR: I have the honor to forward herewith a translation of a note from the minister of state, dated 4th instant, and received on the 9th, in reply to mine of July 16, 1870, acquainting me with the favorable action of the Spanish government upon the several representations made in that communication in obedience to your instructions No. 66, with reference to the oppressive regulations enforced against foreign vessels in the ports of the island of Cuba.

The Department may desire to send to the consul general at Havana the text of the minister's communication, and I therefore inclose a copy of the original in Spanish.

I am, &c.,

D. E. SICKLES.

[Translation.]

MINISTRY OF STATE,
Madrid, February 4, 1871.

MY DEAR SIR: I have received the reports of the minister for the colonies respecting the note of your excellency dated 16th July last, in which you requested that certain reforms be introduced in the customs regulations for the island of Cuba, so as to stop the injuries of which the captains of North American vessels have complained, and in answer thereto I have the honor to inform your excellency that the principal wishes expressed in your above-mentioned note are fulfilled.

Captains of foreign vessels are no longer required to declare the tonnage of their vessels in Spanish measure, it being sufficient on the first voyage for them to make such declaration in conformity with the builder's measurement, or according to the measurement of the respective nations to which they belong, being, however, obliged thereafter to show certificates of the measurement that shall have been used for the collection of tonnage dues, as laid down in the order of 9th of July last.

Respecting fines inflicted on captains of vessels for informalities in their manifests, or for not having presented them, in addition to the cargo list certified by the Spanish consul at the port from whence they sail, considering that in these omissions there was no intention to defraud, the said fines have been remitted in those cases in which the vessels had entered the ports of the island of Cuba since the 19th of December, 1863, that being the date when the order of the provisional government of the 11th of November then last past commenced to be in force.

The evidence hitherto required to exonerate the masters of foreign merchant vessels having been the occasion of reclamations, the administration has taken the matter into consideration, and instead of demanding certificates of the port captains, as heretofore, it is now ordained that a certificate shall be furnished from the consul at the port of arrival, showing that, according to the log-book, the vessel had not before entered a port of the island, the consuls being at liberty to ask from the captain such other facts as may appear necessary to certify with exactitude upon the matter. The fines were legally inflicted, and in remitting them the government has acted in conformity with sentiments of equity and deference. Your excellency will therefore understand that captains subjected to fines have the means to exempt themselves from payment if they fulfill the conditions indicated.

Touching the request to modify the regulations in force, it will be taken into consideration by the board engaged in the compilation of the new orders and regulations for the customs of the colonies, which will endeavor to conciliate as far as possible the interests of legitimate commerce with those of the public treasury.

I avail myself of this occasion to reiterate to your excellency the assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, May 4, 1871.

SIR: I transmit a copy of the protocol of the second conference between the representative of Spain and those of the allied republics of the Pacific, which was held here on the 11th ultimo. A duplicate of the articles of armistice to which it refers is also herewith transmitted. The latter you will communicate to the minister for foreign affairs of Spain with a suggestion that the ratification of that government should also be executed in duplicate, for exchange here with the representatives of each of the parties respectively, to be sent by separate conveyance. This course seems advisable with a view to guard against delay in the exchange through any possible hazards and casualties incident to communication by sea.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

HAMILTON FISH.

Protocol of the peace conference held in Washington on the 11th day of April, 1871, the Secretary of State of the United States presiding, between the Plenipotentiaries of Spain, Bolivia, Chili, Ecuador, and Peru.

The plenipotentiaries of Spain, and of the allied republics of South America, having met at the Department of State in Washington on the 11th day of April, 1871, the Secretary of State ordered the reading of the proceedings of the previous session, and this having been approved he inquired whether Bolivia was represented as he understood.

To this the plenipotentiary of Peru replied that he had been appointed plenipotentiary ad hoc by the government of Bolivia, but that he could not make use of his powers before receiving the acquiescence of his government; that he would therefore act ad referendum, in the name of Bolivia.

This declaration having been accepted, the powers conferred by the government of Bolivia were exhibited, which were found to be in good and due form.

A discussion followed, of the different articles, between the Secretary of State and the plenipotentiaries, after which the conditions of the armistice were definitely laid down in the terms of the convention signed this day.

Articles of armistice between Spain, on the one hand, and the allied republics, Bolivia, Chili, Ecuador and Peru, on the other.

The mediation of the United States having been offered and accepted towards relieving Spain and the allied republics of the Pacific from the technical state of war which has existed since the hostilities of 1866, the President of the United States has, for this purpose, conferred full powers upon Hamilton Fish, Secretary of State.

His Catholic Majesty has conferred like powers on Mauricio Lopez Roberts, Knight Grand Cross of the Royal Order of Isabel the Catholic; Knight General Cross of the Order of Christ, of Portugal, grand officer of those of the conception of Portugal, and of Leopold of Belgium; Knight Commander of the Legion of Honor of France, superior chief of administration, deputy in various legislatures, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of His Majesty Amadeo I, King of Spain, to the United States of America.

The President of the republic of Bolivia has conferred like powers on Colonel Manuel Freyre, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of Peru to the United States of America.

The President of the republic of Chili has conferred like powers on Joaquin Godoy, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of that republic to the United States of America.

The President of the republic of Ecuador has conferred like powers on Antonio Flores, a senator of that republic, and its minister plenipotentiary ad hoc.

And the President of the republic of Peru has conferred like powers on Colonel Manuel Freyre, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of that republic to the United States of America. And the said plenipotentiaries having exchanged the full powers, which were found in due and proper form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE I. The suspension of hostilities existing de facto between Spain, on the one hand, and the allied republics of Bolivia, Chili, Ecuador, and Peru, on the other, is converted into a general armistice or truce.

ARTICLE II. This armistice shall continue indefinitely and cannot be broken by any of the belligerents, save in three years after having expressly and explicitly notified the other of its intention to renew hostilities. In this case, such notification must be made through the Government of the United States.

ARTICLE III. Each of the belligerents, during the continuance of this armistice, shall be at liberty to carry on commerce freely with neutral nations in all articles in which trade is considered lawful in a state of peace, all restriction on neutral commerce therefore ceasing.

ARTICLE IV. The present agreement shall be ratified by the respective governments and the instruments of ratifications shall be exchanged at the Department of State at Washington within four months from date.

ARTICLE V. Those governments which shall not have sent their ratification within the time fixed in the preceding article may make the exchange separately in the two months following.

ARTICLE VI. If any one of the governments, on account of circumstances over which it has no control, shall not be able to effect the exchange of the ratifications within the terms fixed in the foregoing articles, such delay shall be granted it as it may request from the other party without necessity for a new agreement.

ARTICLE VII. The proceedings for the ratification and exchange shall not interfere with the continuation of the conferences designed for the negotiation of a peace.

In testimony of the stipulations made in the foregoing seven articles, the undersigned, Secretary of State of the United States, in the character of mediator, and the plenipotentiaries of Spain, Bolivia, Chili, Ecuador, and Peru, have signed the foregoing agreement at the Department of State at Washington on the eleventh day of April, 1871.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Madrid, May 30, 1871. (Received June 20.)

SIR: In a recent conversation with a distinguished Spanish general, whose official employments afford him ample means of accurate information, he told me that more than forty millions of dollars had been expended for military purposes during the past year in Cuba. He did not state whether or not this large sum included any portion of the amount disbursed for the fleet of gun-boats maintained in those waters especially with reference to the insurrection.

My informant added that the aggregate force under arms exceeded one hundred thousand men, more than half of whom were regular troops, and that the losses of the army of Cuba, from the various casualties of the service, exceeded eighteen thousand men. It was his impression that the insurgent force did not number more than six thousand of all arms.

I hear from trustworthy sources, likely to be well informed, that the insurgents have lost no ground of importance; that their troops are better armed and better disciplined than heretofore; and that, in several recent actions, they have gained considerable advantages over the Spanish troops, many of whom are represented as deserting to the insurgents. Reports of the most cruel severities against prisoners of war and against non-combatants, perpetrated by both parties, continue to reach Madrid.

The consul at Cadiz informs me that several detachments of troops, destined for service in Cuba, have embarked from that port within the last two months.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Madrid, June 17, 1871. (Received July 3.)

SIR: In compliance with your instruction No. 195, I have communicated to the minister of state the duplicate of the articles of armistice concluded between the representatives of Spain and the allied South American republics at the conference held at Washington on the 11th of April last, and at which you presided. At the same time, in an interview with his excellency yesterday, I informed him of your suggestion that the ratification of this government should also be executed in duplicate, for exchange at Washington with the representatives of each of the parties, respectively, and that these documents should be forwarded by separate conveyances, as a precaution against delay in the exchange through any possible hazard or casualty incident to communication by sea.

Mr. Martos desired me to convey to you his deep sense of the service rendered to Spain by the mediation of the United States in this proceeding, and that he hoped your good offices would be crowned with equal success in the settlement of a firm and lasting peace between Spain and the allied republics, with whom this country desired to cultivate the most friendly relations. The minister added that your suggestion with reference to the exchange of ratifications would be followed.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, June 20, 1871.

SIR: Your dispatch No. 351, of the 1st instant, has been received.

It may be premature for the Department to express an opinion in regard to the proposed new Spanish prize-code in the absence of a copy of the bill which you propose to forward hereafter, or to authorize you to protest against its application to captures off Cuba, until the bill shall become a law. The passage in the report of Mr. Beranger to which you refer seems to justify your remark in regard to the incompatibility of the application of the proposed code to captures connected with hostilities in Cuba to the claim of the Spanish government on foreign nations to regard that contest as a mere seditious movement. If, however, a proper opportunity should occur, it may not be amiss for you to refer to this subject in unofficial conversations with the minister for foreign affairs and other persons in authority.

No. 377.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE AND THE SPANISH LEGATION AT WASHINGTON.

Mr. Lopez Roberts to Mr. Fish.

[Translation.]

WASHINGTON, December 17, 1870. (Received December 17.)

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of Spain, has the honor herewith to send to the honorable Secretary of State a copy of the communication which the consul of Spain at New York, in the fulfillment of his duty, addressed on the 8th instant to the district attorney of the southern district of New York, in relation to the steamer Hornet; and he likewise sends a copy of that which the said consul has received in reply from Mr. Noah Davis.

Since then, or rather on that same day, the steamer Hornet put to sea from the port of New York without the judicial authorities of the Federal Government having taken such measures to prevent her departure as should have been dictated to them by the circumstances and criminal antecedents of the aforesaid vessel. Not only has this happened, but it further clearly appears, from the annexed letter of the district attorney, that this functionary entertains the very singular opinion that, for a crime which is being committed in the territory of the United States, it is not of these (the United States) that the government of Spain ought to ask justice and the maintenance of the laws of the country, but that it ought to address the British authorities.

This intelligent and skillful lawyer, in forming such a resolution, doubtless did not previously consult the Federal Government; had he done so, he would without doubt have been reminded of the exact similarity which exists between this case of the steamer Hornet and those of certain vessels which, in the year 1862, left the ports of Great Britain. It is further evident to the undersigned that the Hon. Noah Davis did not consider the language used by Mr. Hamilton Fish in his dispatch of September 25, 1869, to the minister of the United States at London, when he alluded as follows to the claims which had their origin in the infractions of the law of neutrality tolerated by the English authorities during the Southern rebellion:

"We hold that the international duty of the Queen's government in this respect was above and independent of the municipal laws of England. It was a sovereign duty attaching to Great Britain as a sovereign power. The municipal law was but a means of repressing or punishing individual wrong-doers; the law of nations was the true and proper rule of duty for the government."

And further:

"But the Government of the United States has never been able to see the force of this alleged difficulty. The common law of England is the common law of the United States. In both countries, and certainly in England, revenue seizures are made daily, and ships are prevented from going to sea on much less cause of suspicion than attached to the suspected ships of the confederates."

The terms of this remarkable dispatch of Mr. Hamilton Fish are of immense importance by reason of their significance in a matter like the present, and the undersigned cannot comprehend how this can have remained unnoticed by the district attorney in writing a letter which reproduces a similar case, and of the same kind and nature as one of those which the Government of the United States has pending for settlement with Great Britain, and which may, in the end, lead Spain to think herself fully justified in bringing a claim, in the same sense, against the United States.

It is not the purpose of the undersigned now to enter upon a discussion of the points to which so grave and delicate a question may give rise; his object is only to show in this note some of the most important facts, which should not be lost sight of in the matter in question.

The steamer Hornet is still the property of the same individual, Macias, who purchased it from the Federal Government in 1869. The formalities ordered by law to be made for the transfer of property in vessels were gone through in the New York custom-house by one George W. Brown, of said city. This George W. Brown has figured, since the year 1869, as the organizer of all the filibustering expeditions undertaken by the steamer Hornet. This same Brown is the one who, in 1869, furnished the arms, munitions, and coal necessary for this vessel when she was off the coast of Long Island preparing to commence her acts of piracy against the commerce of a friendly nation.

The undersigned feels bound to call the attention of the honorable Secretary of State to some of the main incidents which form a part of the subsequent history of this vessel, and which are public and notorious.

Mr. Hamilton Fish has certainly not forgotten the detention of the Hornet in the port of Wilmington. The officers and men of this pirate were indicted, and a suit which was commenced for so legitimate a cause, in which public justice was interested, was not continued. If the Federal Government had given the necessary orders for it to be continued in the courts of justice, it is not to be doubted that, at the present moment, the steamer Hornet would not be about to commence new and criminal adventures.

It is also the duty of the undersigned to remind the honorable Secretary of State of the incident which relates to the return of the Hornet on the 7th of June last to her owner Macias. Should not this restitution be considered in itself alone, and in a certain sense, as an incompressible act of neglect which has just been made more evident by the recent departure of the Hornet?

On the 6th of October, 1870, the steamer Hornet is again detained in the port of New York, on petition of the consul of Spain; but nine days afterward the order for her detention is revoked, on account of affidavits made by a certain White, and by Macias and Brown—that is, by the parties interested; the course of justice being thus altered, and the courts of the country being prevented from taking cognizance of and deciding with regard to the guilt of said vessel.

Finally, the Hornet gets ready to sail from New York, and the consul of Spain informs the district attorney that, according to the information which he possesses, the said vessel is going to convey an armed expedition to the island of Cuba, and the district attorney pays no regard to these statements nor to the documents presented to him, and pretending to be ignorant of the history of this pirate vessel, forgetting the names of her owner and of the agent who represents him, he replies to the consul of Spain that, from the careful examination which he pretends to have made of the cargo of the vessel, he has found, on the part of the persons dispatching her, no hostile intention. But the undersigned takes the liberty of calling the attention of Mr. Hamilton Fish to the noteworthy fact that the district attorney in no wise seeks to conceal from the consul the knowledge which he has of the future movements of the steamer Hornet. He admits that the vessel is, indeed, going to an intermediate port before arriving at that of her final destination. So that the whole argumentation of Mr. Noah Davis consists in throwing the responsibility upon the authorities of this intermediate port; a responsibility which must eventually rest upon the power which has permitted this pirate freely to leave one of its ports.

The undersigned regrets to find himself compelled to call the attention of Mr. Hamilton Fish to the gravity of the facts which he has just set forth, and he avails himself of this occasion to reiterate to him the assurances of his highest consideration.

MAURICIO LOPEZ ROBERTS.

NEW YORK, December 8, 1870.

SIR: The Secretary of State of the United States has informed his excellency the minister of Spain that all complaints or information in respect to violations of the neutrality laws of this Government to the prejudice of the lawful authority of Spain, shall be presented to you as the prosecuting officer of the United States. In obedience to this suggestion it becomes my duty to call your attention to the steamer Hornet now just on the eve of departure from this port upon an enterprise in violation of public law and in palpable disregard and disobedience of the proclamation of the President of the United States of October 12, 1870.

The career of this steamer is not unfamiliar to you. She was purchased from the Navy Department of this Government, as is understood, in June, 1869, in behalf of the Cuban insurrectionists. In that transaction one Macias, in whose name the steamer to-day stands in the books of the custom-house of this port, has avowed himself the purchaser. On or about August 1, 1869, the steamer was cleared at Philadelphia for Queenstown, but near Reedy Island, taken back to Philadelphia, subsequently released by orders from Washington, and sailed for Halifax, where she arrived August 18, 1869. In that port she was arrested by the British authorities, but discharged on finding no arms on board. The steamer shortly after left Halifax and at "No Man's Land," near the Massachusetts coast, took on board two sixty-pound Parrott guns and two twenty-four-pound howitzers, with complete outfit of carriages and powder, together with a great quantity of small-arms and sailors. From "No Man's Land" the steamer proceeded to the coast of Long Island Sound and to Fire Island light, where, within the jurisdiction of this Government, she took on board twenty sailors and small-stores, 150 tons of coal, provisions, marines, and naval officers; soon after this was done, the steamer put to sea, and one Higgins took command of her and announced she was a man-of-war of the republic of Cuba, changing her name to Cuba. She ran into the port of Wilmington for coal, was there seized, libeled, and claimed as belonging to the republic of Cuba. Subsequently, on June 7, 1870, the steamer was released on application of the said Fernando Macias, upon bonds, given to the satisfaction of this Government; came to the port of New York, and was placed in the hands of George W. Brown, of this city, (as agent for said Macias,) who fitted out the said steamer from this port just after she left "No Man's Land," as aforesaid.

On October 6, 1870, the steamer was again seized and libeled in this port by your direction, on the request of this consulate dated October 5, 1870, but released October 15, 1870, on affidavits of the aforesaid Macias and Brown, and one White, against the earnest protest of this consulate and that of its consul, dated October 13, 1870, to which I respectfully call your attention.

I have now information on which I rely with perfect confidence, that this steamer in the hands of said Macias and his agents is being fitted out in this port to at once sail, to take on board at sea a military expedition from Nassau of some two hundred men and military officers, which will leave there in a vessel, and another military expedition from Key West of some one hundred men under command of one Cabaleiro, after all of which, and taking on board at sea arms provided, one Cisneros (who with General Jordan was joint commander of the Perit expedition from this city) will take charge of and conduct her to the coast of Cuba.

I respectfully submit that the ownership and history of this steamer, together with her outfit on board and her preparations, easily ascertainable by this government if prompt movement be made, are sufficient to call for the exercise of the ample preventive power of this government against her departure. Trusting that, in a proper way I have complied with the disposition of this government that I lay complaints of this character before you. I hereby leave in your hands the responsibility of permitting this formidable instrument to proceed on her illegal expedition to the great injury of my government.

I may be permitted to add that at this moment the steamer has not been cleared at the custom-house.

I have, &c.,

SE DE URIARTE,
Consul General of Spain.

Hon. NOAH DAVIS,
Attorney of the United States.

OFFICE OF THE DISTRICT ATTORNEY OF THE UNITED STATES FOR THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK,
New York, December 8, 1870

SIR: I have this moment your favor of this date.

You accompany your letter with no proof or evidence that would authorize me to seize the Hornet for the alleged intended breaches of our neutrality laws, or to take any steps beyond those I have already taken. I have caused the most rigid scrutiny to be exercised to see that the Hornet has taken on board nothing of a nature to indicate the hostile intentions you mention. I am advised that her intention is to clear and to sail in ballast for Nassau. What her intentions may be on reaching that port are things that remain unproven, and in no wise indicated except by the intimations of your favor. I cannot legally act on mere surmise; but if furnished with proper evidences I shall not hesitate to take any steps necessary to prevent violations of our laws. For intended violations of British laws, the remedy, if any, must be sought at the hands of British authorities.

I am, &c.,

NOAH DAVIS.

No. 378.

Mr. Lopez Roberts to Mr. Fish.

WASHINGTON, December 17, 1870. (Received December 17.)

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of Spain, regrets to be again compelled to call the attention of the honorable Secretary of State of the United States to the matter of the American steamer George B. Upton, and the filibustering military expedition which, in the month of May last, was conveyed by the said vessel from the port of New York to the island of Cuba. On the return of the Upton to New York, with its officers, crew, and three of the principal promoters of that enterprise, organized and carried out in violation of the laws of the United States, the undersigned had the honor of placing in the hands of the honorable Secretary of State copies of three affidavits made in New York by persons who formed a part of the expedition, in which was shown the true character of the same, and to request that steps might be taken to inflict due punishment not only upon the delinquent steamer, but also upon any individual guilty of having assisted on that occasion in conveying supplies of arms to the insurgents of Cuba.

In view of the observations made by the undersigned, the honorable Secretary of State ordered the matter to be investigated by the district attorney of New York, and in consequence thereof the undersigned caused to be submitted to the examination of the aforesaid authority the three affidavits aforementioned, together with the steamer's log-book.

The district attorney has not only refused to embargo the vessel, but also to bring any criminal action against its officers or against the promoters of the expedition, who then were and still are within reach of the judicial authorities of his district. He bases his refusal in regard to the vessel on the fact that, since her criminal voyage, she has been sold and is now the property of persons who, as he states, are innocent and honorable men; and in regard to the individuals, on the consideration that, in virtue of the proclamation of the President of the United States of October 12, 1870, all offenses against international or municipal law committed in this country previous to said proclamation, the object of which was to grant pardon or condonation to this class of offenses, are to be considered as pardoned or condoned.

It is important to add that, both in the matter of the steamer and of the individuals, the district attorney did not hesitate to declare his opinion that the testimony presented was sufficient to justify the adoption of the measures requested by the undersigned, and that the transfer of the steamer, if a transfer was really made, to other owners took place with knowledge, on the part of the latter, of its previous guilty career, and of the punishment which, for that reason, threatened it.

The undersigned does not doubt for an instant that the Secretary of State will find in the aforesaid affidavits and in the copy of the log-book of the Upton sufficient proofs that the purchase of the vessel, the selection of its officers and crew, the recruiting and organization of the persons who went on board, the instruction which they afterward received in military drill and their landing as armed troops, the purchase and shipment of arms and munitions of war, and its clearance at the New York custom-house, constituted a military expedition commenced in this country in order to operate against the legitimate authorities in the island of Cuba, and that any person who took part therein should be considered as guilty, the acts of such being punishable by the law of the United States with fine and imprisonment.

In order to show the importance of a decision as to whether all the rigor of the penalty provided by the laws of this Government against crimes so grave as those which characterize the proceeding of the Upton should be applied to the persons principally implicated, such as Dornin, Somers, Brown, Kingsbury, Cisneros, Fernandez, and Muñoz, the undersigned begs the honorable Secretary of State to consider the following circumstances:

1st. Dornin served as second officer, Somers as ensign, and Muñoz as midshipman, on board of the steamer Hornet, which commenced in 1869 to make her preparations at Philadelphia, continuing the same at Queenstown, on "No Man's Land," on the coast of Massachusetts on Fire Island, near Mautauk Point, and, finally, near the light-ship stationed at the entrance of the port of New York, localities which are all within the jurisdiction of the United States, for the purpose of cruising against the commerce and destroying the property of Spain.

2d. George Brown, at that time belonging to the house of Phillips & Brown, shipping brokers, established at No. 155 South street, in New York, and now residing in said city, was the agent of the Cuban rebels for the procurement of seamen, soldiers, supplies for the vessel, and munitions of war for the aforesaid steamer Hornet; subsequently, on the voyage of the latter to Queenstown, and her return via "No Man's Land" to the coast of New York, where, at the distance of three miles from the revolving light at Fire Island Inlet, she received from a vessel proceeding from New York in charge of the said Brown, seamen and provisions, and still later, behind Montauk Point, about half a mile from Long Island, she received from a schooner a quantity of coal sent by the same Brown, and soon afterward, from another vessel proceeding from New York, and under the personal direction of Brown, provisions and men, with three officers named Reid, Somers, and Mason, and, finally, more men and provisions from a steamer also in charge of Brown, on a line with the light-ship at the entrance of the port of New York. Proofs are abundant that the said Brown busied himself for more than a year with the greatest zeal and quite openly in the interests of the Cuban junta of New York, and of other persons of equally evil intentions, in organizing and preparing military expeditions in that and other ports destined to operate against the legitimate authorities of the island of Cuba, and thus far he has suffered no punishment.

3d. E. B. Kingsbury, of whom mention has already been made, served as boatswain (contramarstre) of the crew of the Hornet and has his office at No. 155 South street, in the city of New York, at which place Brown's office was likewise when the latter furnished the equipments of the Hornet and of various other expeditions against Cuba, which circumstance proves that the said individual established himself, with full knowledge of what he was doing, in the very center of the persons who are conspiring in New York against the neutrality of this country.

4th. Cisneros, who embarked on board of the Upton and when on the high seas assumed and exercised military command over the men who were on board, was, together with the so-called General Jordan, chief of the military expedition which left New York in May, 1869, on board of the steamer Perit, and landed the men and cargo on the coast of Cuba. This steamer was the property or was under the orders of Messrs. Spofford, Tileston & Co., of New York, who ordered the captain, in writing, to obey, in regard to the place and manner of effecting the landing in Cuba, the instructions which might be given him by the aforesaid Jordan and Cisneros, who were on board.

Very well, although the said individuals have been for some time in the city of New York, the district attorney has not seen fit to institute criminal proceedings for the aforesaid acts, or for any other of their numerous offenses against the laws of the United States. In order more fully to show what opinion ought to be formed as to whether the persons concerned in the expedition of the Upton ought to remain unpunished or not, the undersigned takes the liberty to state the following facts, viz: One Nicholas H. Sling was the person who directed the movements of the Hornet from the time of her departure from Philadelphia until the moment when she received her last contingent of men and munitions of war at the entrance of the port of New York, when he gave up the command to Commodore Higgins. David A. Telfair, Louis French, Chief Engineer Richard H. Gibson, Ensign Donald G. Monroe, commander of marine infantry, William D. Phillips, midshipman, and John Lynch, of the crew of said vessel, were indicted at Wilmington before Commissioner Rutherford, for offenses committed in connection with the Hornet, transferred from that place by order of the judge of the court of the district in which is situated Cape Fear, in North Carolina, to the eastern judicial district of New York, and, on the 8th of November, 1869, obliged to furnish bail in Brooklyn for their appearance for trial in one thousand dollars each, and yet, notwithstanding the notoriety of these acts, no steps have been taken to indict those who committed them before a grand jury, or to cause them to feel in any way the consequences of their criminal deeds. The undersigned is far from wishing to make any suggestion which could be interpreted as an interference in the administration of the laws of this country in that which relates to past offenses against neutrality, yet he cannot avoid the conviction that the Secretary of State will agree that an indulgence like the one shown toward the individuals last named, and which the district attorney proposes to observe toward the culpable participants in the expedition of the Upton, tends to preserve and encourage the state of things in New York relative to expeditions against Cuba, which, as the undersigned believes, is deplored by this Government no less than by that of Spain. With regard to the principal delinquents on board of the Upton, long known as violators of the law, it certainly seems as if they had been stimulated and encouraged by the indulgence hitherto shown them by a benevolent government. In the judgment of the undersigned, observations like those which have just been made with respect to individuals, are applicable to the determination of the district attorney not to proceed against the Upton. The circumstance of there being new owners, who purchased it with full knowledge of the prosecution which threatened it, should certainly not be sufficient to set aside the culpability of the vessel, which was engaged in conveying a filibustering expedition against a nation friendly to the United States, causing the loss of many lives, and the destruction of many interests and much property. It is evident that the agents of the insurrection in Cuba, who have fixed the base of their operations in New York, need transport-vessels for the conveyance of military expeditions. If these vessels are purchased by the guilty parties and become the property of the conspirators, every consideration of justice requires that they should suffer the loss of their property, and that they should be so far prevented from engaging in future enterprises of this kind. And if there are masters of vessels who, knowing the purpose to which their property is destined, (as happened in the case of the Perit,) load them in order to break the laws established for the maintenance of the duties of international neutrality, they should, in the judgment of the undersigned, be made to feel the legal consequences of their conduct in the improper employment of their property. This Government has shown itself indulgent toward the Perit, which conveyed Jordan's first expedition; toward the Catharine Whiting, the H. M. Cool, the Jonathan Chase, steamers which aided in the Ryan expedition, and toward the Hornet, which was detained, first at Philadelphia, afterward at Wilmington, North Carolina, and for the third time in New York, in October, 1870.

Not one of these vessels has been brought to trial, although all have been detained, with the exception of the Perit, the respective district attorneys under whose jurisdiction they came consenting that they should be set at liberty.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to reiterate to the honorable Secretary of State the assurances of his highest consideration.

MAURICIO LÓPEZ ROBERTS.

No. 379.

Mr. Fish to Mr. Lopez Roberts.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, December 28, 1870.

The undersigned, Secretary of State of the United States of America, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the two notes which Mr. Lopez Roberts, the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of Spain, did him the honor to address to him on the 17th instant. One of these notes incloses copies of a correspondence between the Spanish consul at New York and the district attorney of the United States for the southern district of New York, in relation to the steamer Hornet.

In transmitting this correspondence Mr. Lopez Roberts avails himself of the opportunity to make certain comments upon the conduct of some of the officers of the United States towards that steamer. If the undersigned correctly apprehends the purpose of that note of Mr. Lopez Roberts, its complaints relate to acts said to have been done, or omitted to be done, at two distinct periods. Those first complained of are charged as happening about the time when the correspondence took place between the Spanish consul and the district attorney. The remaining charges relate to matters that took place prior to that correspondence, and which have no connection with it. With regard to the first complaint, it would appear, from the correspondence transmitted by Mr. Lopez Roberts, that the Spanish consul at New York, on the 8th instant, informed the district attorney for the southern district of New York that, in compliance with a supposed intimation or suggestion from the Secretary of State, he called his attention to the steamer Hornet, that that steamer had been formerly employed in illegal expeditions against Cuba; that she had been libeled for this at Wilmington; that on the 11th day of June last, bonds were given for her discharge, and she was released; that she was then brought to the port of New York; that the Spanish consul again made complaint against her, and she was again seized and libeled on the 6th day of October last; that, application being made for her release, a hearing was had before the court, in which the Spanish consul took part; that, as the result of that judicial hearing, she was again released; that the consul, at the date of his letter, had information, on which he relied with perfect confidence, that the steamer was being fitted out in the port of New York for the purpose of proceeding to sea, and there taking on board military expeditions from Nassau and Key West, and conducting them to the coast of Cuba; that he thought his note to a local prosecuting officer as "sufficient to call for the exercise of the ample preventive power of this Government against the departure;" and that he left in the hands of that officer the responsibility of permitting the vessel to proceed.

The district attorney appears to have replied to this note, on the same day, that there was no proof or evidence in it which would authorize him to seize the Hornet, or to take any steps beyond those which he had already taken; that he had caused a rigid scrutiny to be exercised in order to prevent the Hornet from taking on board anything indicating hostile intentions; that he had been advised that it was the purpose of that vessel to clear for Nassau; that he could not act legally on mere surmise; but that, if proper evidence were furnished, he would take any steps necessary to prevent violations of the laws of the United States.

It is further charged in Mr. Lopez Roberts's note that the steamer Hornet on the same day put to sea, without such steps "having been taken to prevent her departure as should have been dictated by the circumstances and criminal antecedents of the aforesaid vessel."

The undersigned has the honor, in reply to this portion of the note of Mr. Lopez Roberts, to say that it appears from this correspondence that the Hornet, having been seized on the complaint of the Spanish consul only two months before the date of the correspondence, and a hearing in which the Spanish consul took part having resulted in the discharge of the vessel, no subsequent proof, or anything in the nature of legal evidence other than a repetition of that which had already been passed upon by the court, and been decided to be insufficient for the detention of the vessel, had been furnished by the consul, or by any other Spanish official; that, nevertheless, the district attorney offered to again take steps to detain the Hornet, if proof were furnished which would warrant him in so doing, which proof was not furnished.

The undersigned takes the liberty to call the attention of Mr. Lopez Roberts to the fact that a district attorney of the United States is an officer whose duties are regulated by law, and who, in the absence of executive warrant, has no right to detain the vessels of American citizens without legal process, founded not upon surmises, or upon the antecedent character of a vessel, or upon the belief or conviction of a consul, but upon proof submitted according to the forms required by law. Although it appears to the undersigned that in this case the district attorney complied with his duty, and would not have been justified — taking steps for the seizure of the Hornet in December, on the unsupported representations of the consul, after the failure of that officer to furnish the requisite proof to authorize her continued detention, yet, as Mr. Lopez Roberts seems to think that there may have been a dereliction of duty, the undersigned will transmit to the head of the Department of Justice, to whom the district attorney for the southern district of New York is subordinate, a copy of Mr. Lopez Roberts's complaint, and of the correspondence inclosed in his note.

The undersigned, in taking leave of this branch of the subject, invites the attention of Mr. Lopez Roberts to the inaccuracy of the Spanish consul at New York, when he states that "the Secretary of State of the United States has informed his excellency the minister of Spain that all complaints or information in respect to violations of the neutrality laws of this Government, to the prejudice of the lawful authority of Spain, shall be presented to you, (the district attorney,) as the prosecuting officer of the United States." It is undoubtedly true that the undersigned did request Mr. Lopez Roberts, for convenience in the judicial proceedings which might be begun, as well as to secure promptness of action in the courts when necessary, to say to the consuls of Spain that they would be authorized to lay before the prosecuting officers of the United States, without previous transmission to the undersigned through the Spanish legation at Washington, any legal proof of a violation of its laws that might be in their possession. The undersigned was thus able to show to the government of Spain that the United States would omit nothing that could be reasonably deemed essential to the performance of their duties toward Spain. But it was not the purpose of the undersigned to surrender to these subordinates the respective right and duty of making and receiving all complaints in respect to any alleged violation of the neutrality laws of this country, to the prejudice of the lawful authority of Spain. Such a proceeding would not have accorded with the dignity of this Government, or with the respect which it entertains for its ancient ally and friend. It is also reasonable to conclude from the transmission of this note to the undersigned, that Mr. Lopez Roberts regards the subject in the same light, and that when he inclosed in his note a copy of the consul's letter, he failed to consider with his usual care the latitude of its signification.

The remainder of the note, to which the undersigned is now replying, is devoted to a criticism upon the conduct of the Government of the United States with reference to the previous career of the Hornet. The second note of Mr. Lopez Roberts, of the same date, is devoted to the examination of the conduct of this Government toward certain other vessels and persons charged with past violations of the neutrality laws of the United States connected with previous alleged expeditions against the island of Cuba. The undersigned proposes to treat these subjects together.

Mr. Lopez Roberts claims that he has shown by satisfactory proof that the vessels known as the Perit, the Catherine Whiting, the H. M. Cool, the Jonathan Chase, the George B. Upton, and the Hornet, have been engaged in aiding the insurrection in Cuba, in such a way as to violate the laws of the United States known as the "neutrality laws." He also says that in his judgment the owners of all vessels who, "knowing the purpose for which their property is destined, load them in order to break the laws established for the maintenance of the duties of international neutrality, should be made to feel the legal consequences of their conduct in the improper employment of their property." He further gives the names of sundry persons who, in the city of New York and elsewhere in the territory of the United States, are said to have aided and abetted in alleged violations of the laws of the United States in one or more of these expeditions. With regard to most of these persons, he sets forth with some detail a variety of acts, which were said to have been committed prior to the 12th day of October last.

It would also appear, from the statement of Mr. Lopez Roberts, that some efforts have been made by Spanish officials to induce the district attorney for the southern district of New York to proceed against some of these vessels or persons, and that he has decided that, in some of the cases, no proceedings can be had, for technical reasons that are stated in Mr. Lopez Roberts's note, and that, as to the individuals named, no proceedings can be maintained, because it is supposed by him that under the operation of the proclamation of the President of the United States, dated October 12, 1870, all offenses against international or municipal law referred to in the proclamation were pardoned or condoned.

He also complains, in the case of the Hornet, that the proceedings which were begun against that vessel at Wilmington were not prosecuted to final judgment and execution; and he adds that, "if the Federal Government had given the necessary orders for it to be continued in the courts of justice, it is not to be doubted that, at the present moment, the steamer Hornet would not be about to commence new and criminal adventures."

He complains of the restitution of the Hornet as "an incomprehensible act of neglect." He says that while he "is far from wishing to make any suggestion which could be interpreted as an interference in the administration of the laws of this country in that which relates to past offenses against neutrality, yet he cannot avoid the conviction that the Secretary of State will agree that such an indulgence * * * tends to preserve and encourage the state of things in New York relative to expeditions against Cuba."

It would be a sufficient answer for the undersigned, in reply to these portions of Mr. Lopez Roberts's notes, to say that his very proper disclaimer of a purpose to interfere in the administration of the laws of this country in that which relates to past offenses against neutrality, renders all these statements irrelevant. So long as the rights in the domestic tribunals of the United States which are secured to the subjects of Spain by treaty are not invaded, and so long as the officials of the United States manifest the readiness which they have ever shown to prevent attempted violations of the laws enacted to enforce their international obligations, a criticism upon the conduct of the courts of the United States in the treatment of persons charged with past offenses could not but be regarded as a step beyond the recognized bounds of diplomatic correspondence. It may not, however, be improper, while accepting the disclaimer of Mr. Lopez Roberts, to indicate to him the leading motives which prompted the benevolent act of the President and the merciful policy of this Government.

A fierce and sanguinary conflict had been raging for two years in the island of Cuba when the President's proclamation of October 12 was issued. That this conflict originated in a sense of wrongs sustained through a long series of years of misgovernment prior to the outbreak of the late revolution on the Peninsula, would probably not be denied by the eminent men who were at the head of that revolution. On the contrary, it is understood that they have been free in the expression of their regret that the Cubans would not trust the remedy of their undoubted grievances to the hands of the liberals of Spain.

In the prosecution of this contest several decrees were made by the Spanish authorities which interfered with, or threatened to interfere with, the rights of citizens of the United States. The United States took occasion in advance to express their dissatisfaction with such decrees, and to point out how they might conflict with the rights of their citizens.

In the progress of events the sympathies of large portions of the people of the United States naturally became interested in the struggle to throw off a political connection which had entailed upon Cuba an onerous system of taxation, and which had deprived it of its autonomy. This natural feeling was increased and vivified, when it became known that the insurgents were further contending for a cause for which the American people had themselves suffered so much—the abolition of African slavery.

The Government of the United States felt constrained by its international duties not to permit itself to be controlled by this popular sympathy. The authorities of Spain denied that the insurrection possessed that civil and political organization, and that probability of success, which would require the other national powers to accord to it the right to carry on a recognized war, and this Government admitted that such was the case, and has continued so to regard it up to the present time.

In the course of the struggle, as had been foreseen, the rights of citizens of the United States were affected by the steps taken by the Spanish authorities to crush the insurrection. It being found inconvenient to refer all such cases to Madrid, Mr. Lopez Roberts was, upon the request of this Government, authorized to settle by agreement with the captain general of Cuba, without consulting the Spanish government, questions arising with this Government or its citizens, from the circumstances through which the island of Cuba was passing, except in cases of disagreement with the superior authority, or in a case of such gravity that, in the judgment of Mr. Lopez Roberts, it might require previous consultation with the government.

Under the operation of this regulation, various representations were from time to time made to Mr. Lopez Roberts by the undersigned, and questions were thus amicably adjusted, until the power was withdrawn by the government at Madrid, "in view," as the undersigned was afterward officially informed, "of the favorable situation in which the island of Cuba then was."

It was understood here, both from representations made to the American minister at Madrid, and from the views repeatedly expressed by the Spanish minister at Washington, that the "favorable situation" referred to was the supposed extinction of an organized armed resistance to Spanish authority in Cuba.

The President did not and would not suppose that the government of Spain would lessen the means of protection to the persons and properties of citizens of the United States in Cuba, which it had extended during the insurrection at the request of this Government, unless it was convinced that the insurrection, which made it necessary, had virtually ceased. He could not and would not assume that a government which had maintained such friendly relations with this Government would voluntarily do so unfriendly an act as to withdraw, without notice, the powers conferred upon Mr. Lopez Roberts at its request, unless it was convinced that the necessity for them had ceased in consequence of the suppression of the insurrection. He was pleased to believe that, in the opinion of the Spanish government, the danger from the insurrection was over; that the time for milder measures had come, and that the blessings of peace were to follow. It did not appear to him that the restraints upon the commerce of the United States and upon the free movements of their citizens—measures which had been taken because the maintenance of the obligations of the United States as one of the family of nations appeared to require them—should be longer imposed. It did not seem to this Government that good could come from continuing preventive, much less punitive proceedings against individuals or vessels, when the cause which prompted the alleged illegal acts was supposed to have disappeared. It was believed to be in harmony with the humane policy which has characterized this Government, that a suspension of the rigid prosecutions of offenses (partaking of a political character) growing out of a sympathy with a political struggle in a neighboring island, might well take place. It was hoped that the benevolent example of the United States in this respect might, perhaps, be reflected in the policy of Spain toward Cuba. It was believed that the reforms which had been so often promised to the representative of the United States at Madrid were about to be granted; that the blot of slavery would disappear; that the right of colonial self-government would be given to the island; that the burdensome system of taxation would be abolished, and that, peace being restored, all the desired reforms being granted, and amnesty and pardon being given, the Government of the United States would be relieved from the disagreeable duties which it had performed for about two years.

Mr. Lopez Roberts will find in these considerations an evidence of the generous purposes and desires of the Government of the United States toward his government and toward the island of Cuba, and its logical action in reliance upon the promises and the representations of the Spanish government, and of its esteemed representative to this Government. He will permit the undersigned also to say (in reply to his suggestion that these persons have been stimulated and encouraged by the indulgence hitherto shown them by a benevolent government) that it seems to the undersigned that they have found their encouragement and the stimulus, not in the humane course of this Government, but in the love of liberty and in that sympathy with communities struggling against oppression, and for freedom, which is the portion of all generous natures; and that such stimulus and encouragement will fail them when Spain shall imitate the benign policy of the United States.

Mr. Lopez Roberts also does the undersigned the honor to quote with approval, from a dispatch from the undersigned to Mr. Motley, the following passages:

We hold that the international duty of the Queen's government in this respect is above and independent of the municipal law of England. It was a sovereign duty attaching to Great Britain as a sovereign power. The municipal law was but a means of repressing or punishing individual wrong-doers; the law of nations was the true and proper rule of duty for the government.

But the Government of the United States has never been able to see the force of this alleged difficulty. The common law of England is the common law of the United States. In both countries, and certainly in England, revenue seizures are made, and ships are prevented from going to sea on much less cause of suspicion than attached to the suspected ships of the confederates.

The undersigned receives with great satisfaction this official admission of Spain to the doctrine that in time of war it is as well the right as the duty of the non-combatant powers to maintain a neutral position—a doctrine of which the United States were the earliest, and have remained the most consistent, advocates. In the first stage of their national history, they suffered from the unlawful attempts of other belligerent powers to force them from the neutral attitude which they had the right to maintain. In a later and more trying period, they were injured by the neglect of other powers to preserve their neutrality when they themselves were in a state of war. It is a satisfaction to feel that the position which they have maintained when they were at peace, and claimed when they were at war, is gaining ground on the continent of Europe.

The intelligence and acumen of Mr. Lopez Roberts cannot have failed to notice that these doctrines were applied to a condition when a state of war was recognized by the neutral; that the whole of the context of the argument from which Mr. Lopez Roberts has done the undersigned the honor to excerpt the passages which are quoted above, relate to a recognized condition of war, and that the grievances complained of by the United States in the dispatch from which the quotations are made were the acts of a government which had formally recognized a state of war between the United States and their armed opponents.

To make the doctrine of the passages which have been quoted applicable to the relations of Spain and Cuba, the former must acknowledge a state of war between herself and the inhabitants of Cuba which other nations may recognize.

The undersigned has not heretofore understood that the government of Spain had yet recognized, or was yet willing that the other powers should recognize a state of war as existing in the island of Cuba, but the application which his excellency the minister of Spain endeavors to make of the position in which the United States acknowledged to have found themselves after that several powers, including Spain, had accorded the rights of belligerents to their revolted citizens, induces the undersigned to inquire whether Spain now regards her position toward the insurgents of Cuba the same as that which the United States occupied toward their insurgent citizens at the time of the occurrence of the acts complained of in the dispatch from which Mr. Lopez Roberts has quoted.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to Mr. Lopez Roberts the assurance of his very high consideration.

WASHINGTON, May 5, 1871. (Received May 5.)

The undersigned, minister of Spain, has the honor to acknowledge to the honorable Secretary of State the receipt of his note of the 3d instant, in which he is pleased to state that William T. Otto has been appointed arbitrator, and the Hon. Caleb Cushing counsel on the part of the United States, in accordance with the bases agreed upon in Madrid, on the 12th of February last, between his excellency Don Christino Martos, minister of state of His Majesty the King, and General Sickles, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of this Republic in Spain, for the settlement of claims of American citizens in consequence of the insurrection in the island of Cuba.

The undersigned informs Mr. Hamilton Fish, that by virtue of the powers conferred upon him by the 1st article of said bases, he has appointed as arbitrator on the part of Spain Mr. Luis de Potestad, 1st secretary of this legation, and Mr. J. Mandeville Carlisle as counsel.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to reiterate to the honorable Secretary of State the assurances of his highest consideration.

SIR: The accompanying slips from the New York Herald of 24th ultimo and 2d instant purport to be telegrams transmitted from this place. I have made inquiry, and have ascertained from an authoritative source that the said telegrams have not been sent from here.

In connection with the statements contained in the slips, I beg to transmit a memorandum of a conversation with an intelligent gentleman, a British subject, whom I consider entirely credible, who has lately visited the eastern and central departments, from which it would appear that the insurrection is still strong, and that there is as little probability of its being promptly suppressed as there has been at any time during the past two years.

Cuba—Herald special report from Havana—Capture and surrender of all the promised leaders of the insurrection—A handful of marauders in hiding—A proclamation to announce the end of the insurrection—Telegram to the New York Herald.

The Herald correspondent at the Cuban capital has forwarded us the following special dispatch:

HAVANA, September 24, 1871.

Letters from Puerto Principe announce that the eastern part of the island, which included the whole seat of the insurrection, has been completely pacified, and that the captain general will shortly return to Havana.

All the principal leaders of the insurrection, with their forces, have either surrendered or been captured, and there exists now only a handful of marauders, who are hiding, and, as it appears, would also surrender, but for the fear of being prosecuted by the local authorities for the atrocities committed upon the lives and property of the inhabitants.

A proclamation by the captain general, declaring the insurrection at an end, is about to be issued.

PEACE IN CUBA.

Herald special report from Havana—The telegraphic line between Puerto Principe and Havana re-established—The pacification of Cuba complete—Telegram to the New York Herald.

The Herald correspondent at the Cuban capital has forwarded us the following special dispatch:

HAVANA, October 1, 1871.

The telegraphic line between Havana and Puerto Principe, which passes through the district of Camaguey, the stronghold of the late insurrection, has been completely re-established and is now in working order.

The line had been cut by the insurgents at the beginning of the struggle, and kept interrupted ever since, by their possession of the intervening large territory of the Camaguey.

The want of telegraphic communication with Havana hampered the operations of the Spanish war authorities, and the insurrection had to be subdued before the line could be held and repaired.

With the re-establishment of the telegraph between Havana and Puerto Principe, the pacification of the island is complete.

[Inclosure No. 2.]

HAVANA CONSULATE, October 13, 1871.

Memorandum.—A gentleman who has recently visited the eastern and central departments of the island reports the following:

That he was at Guantanamo a week ago, when an alarm was raised that the insurgents were approaching the place. The governor ordered the inhabitants into the block-houses, and prepared for defense. The insurgents appeared on the outskirts of the town, but did not attack it, contenting themselves with selecting and driving off all the best cattle in the vicinity.

That the insurgents have full control of all the country around Guantanamo, and within the radius of a league from Santiago de Cuba. These places receive nearly all their provisions and supplies from the western department.

That in a recent attack of the insurgents upon Yara, they completely sacked the place, carrying off in their carts all the goods and provisions of the place, as well as the commissary stores; they afterward burned the place, not leaving a single building. The resistance they met with was very trifling.

That the loyal inhabitants in those departments are exceedingly despondent and dissatisfied; they are convinced that without large re-enforcements from Spain, and more active co-operation on the part of the western department, the task of suppressing the insurrection is a hopeless one.

The slaves of the eastern department are being removed hither in large numbers some to be sold and others to be hired. As they are all more or less tainted with insurrectionary ideas, their influence upon the same class in this department is to be feared.

That near Puerto Principe there was quite a sharp engagement, a few days since, between the government forces and insurgents, in which the former were defeated.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Stockholm, March 3, 1871. (Received March 23.)

SIR: I have the honor to inclose a translation of the report by Count Lewenhaupt, the Swedish and Norwegian chargé d'affaires in Washington, on emigration, made to his government on the 17th November last; also a printed copy of the same, in the Swedish language.

The report has been communicated to the Diet and to the Storting. It has been extensively published in the newspapers of Norway, but as yet only extracts from it have been published in the Swedish journals.

The spirit of the report appears to me to be excellent. Taken together, I think Americans could not regret its extensive circulation in Sweden and Norway. Count Lewenhaupt states that a majority of emigrants from these kingdoms prosper in the United States. He has, however, as might be expected in treating of so extensive a topic, fallen into a few errors. He states that it happens "very" often that the wages due from railroad companies to emigrant workmen are not paid. That homestead land is not now to be acquired within ten Swedish miles (sixty English miles) of the railroad, whereas the fact is that there is a plenty of land subject to homestead entry, in several States, within one Swedish mile of the railroad. Also, that a capital of 600 riksdaler ($160) is essential in order to begin a homestead settlement. That sum, or more, would of course be advantageous; but inasmuch as a settler, especially if a single man, can be absent from his homestead as long as six months at a time in order to earn wages, many a man can get along very well whose capital at the start is only his hands and his health. He also states that the Swedish and Norwegian immigrants are indifferent what ticket they vote; that they would vote the democratic ticket as soon as the republican, if they could thereby better advance one of their countrymen in political position. My observation in the north-west leads me to quite the contrary opinion. These adopted citizens take a real interest in politics, and are ardently attached to the anti-slavery side.

On receiving information from Mr. Consul Gade that the revision of the report, as published in the newspapers of Norway, made it appear that the people of the United States were opposed to immigration (arising, as I suppose, from an incorrect rendering of the Swedish word "Rikena" as States instead of Kingdoms, where it occurs near the top of the third page of the printed copy,) I yesterday addressed a note to the minister for foreign affairs, requesting him to have the matter placed in its proper light before the Norwegian public. I inclose a copy of my communication, and shall be glad to learn that my action is approved by the Department.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatches No. 56, inclusive.

I am, &c.,

C. C. ANDREWS.

Report of the Swedish Norwegian chargé d'affaires in Washington, concerning the emigration from the United Kingdom to the United States of America.

As emigration forms the chief point of contact between the United Kingdom and the United States of America, and a great part of the legation's business proceeds in commissions which are sent in from the home-staying relatives of the emigrants herewith have the honor to present some information respecting emigration in general, and also to account for the circumstance that the commissions committed to the care of the legation cannot be performed with greater dispatch.

The greatest part of the emigrants arrive at New York via England, by English steamboats. A small number of about five thousand arrived, however, during the year, by American steamboats via Copenhagen. A direct transfer of emigrants by steamboats from the United Kingdom to America does not take place, the reason of which is, as far as Sweden is concerned, that the Swedish law does not permit a vessel to carry so great a number of passengers as is allowed in some other countries. The emigrants complain, however, more of the bad fare on board than the narrow space.

On their arrival in New York, the emigrant steamers disembark their passengers at a cape which shoots forward in the harbor, called "Castle Garden." They are there received by the "commissioners of emigration," or the committee appointed by the city of New York to superintend emigration. Very ample means are at the disposal of this committee, since all emigrant vessels arriving at New York must pay a duty of 7 riksdaler 50 ore, ($2.) for every emigrant. The means thus collected, which annually amount to more than 2,000,000 riksdaler, are applied partly to the support and enlargement of the emigrant home, situated on an island called Ward's Island, at the mouth of New York, and partly to cover the expenses of the committee at Castle Garden.

the harboring and forwarding of the emigrants. All emigrants arriving at New York have a right, in case of need, to free board and lodging at Ward's Island during the first five years; the subsistence afforded them there is of course of about the same quality that is bestowed in the poor-houses, because the emigrant home else would become overcrowded. According to what is stated in the last annual report of the committee, it occurs, nevertheless, that emigrants apply for admittance at Ward's Island during the winter, in order not to be obliged to spend their summer earnings, which they place in some savings bank. During the year 1869, more than two hundred and sixty thousand emigrants arrived at New York, and of these, fourteen thousand lodged for shorter or longer time in the emigrant home. The whole number of the emigrants harbored there, was, on an average, one thousand three hundred and eighty-four. The most part sojourn there only for a short time, until they may recover from some occasional illness, or receive answers to letters from their relatives in the interior of the country, or else in waiting for employment. Some there are, however, who, in consequence of mental disorder, incurable sickness, and inability to provide for themselves, continue to live in the emigrant home during five years, and afterward are admitted for life-time in the common poor-house, though the greatest part of such emigrants are, by the care of the committee, sent back to their native country. The last year no Swedish or Norwegian emigrants were to be found in the common poor-house in New York.

In 1869, twenty-five thousand and fifty-five Swedish and five thousand nine hundred and three Norwegian emigrants arrived at New York. The cause of the comparatively low number of Norwegians was probably due to the circumstance that the Norwegian emigration had mainly taken place via Quebec. Of these Swedish and Norwegian emigrants, six hundred and sixty-three Swedes and fifty-eight Norwegians were taken up in the emigrant home, of whom three hundred and ninety-nine Swedes and twenty-two Norwegians were admitted in the hospital. Thus it is found that the number of Swedes and Norwegians received at the emigrant home, compared with the whole number of arrived emigrants, was as follows: Swedes above 2 per cent., and Norwegians not fully 1 per cent. The ground for this is probably to be found in the circumstance that the number of Norwegian emigrants already settled in America is considerably greater than that of Swedes, whereas the Norwegian element of emigration has of late years perceptibly decreased, and those Norwegians who are now arriving in America consequently find a greater number of relatives and friends there.

On their arrival at Castle Garden, the emigrants are received by a Danish commissioner, engaged in the service of the committee, who with great readiness affords all necessary information. In the Castle Garden the emigrants can exchange their money, and receive there a memorandum, stating as well the amount which was brought in, as the amount they got in exchange. There they are also supplied with railroad-tickets to all places in the United States, and conveyance for themselves and their luggage to the railroad station, without coming in contact with a mass of loose people that lounge about the Castle Garden at the arrival of every emigrant vessel. If the emigrants have arrived without any settled aim, they may apply to the work-office in Castle Garden, and, while they are waiting for employment, either betake themselves to Ward's Island, or to those other hotels which are recommended by the committee, and whose owners are allowed entrance in Castle Garden, on condition of placing their hotels in some measure under the superintendence of the committee. It is sometimes very difficult, however, to get employment; and those emigrants are consequently in a far better plight who have some settled purpose in view, and know any person upon whose assistance they may depend during the first period.

To engage a special agent in New York, in order to assist Swedish and Norwegian emigrants is needless, and would be, moreover, out of the question, since the committee would not allow such one admittance in Castle Garden, and the agent accordingly would not even have opportunity to see the greater number of the emigrants. The motive for refusing entrance in Castle Garden to the agent, is partly owing to the opinion prevalent throughout America that emigration is detrimental to the United Kingdoms, and that the government, therefore, seeks to counteract it, and partly the impossibility to avoid collision between such an agent and that employed by the committee, unless the superintendence over the whole Swedish and Norwegian emigration were delivered over to the Swedish-Norwegian agent—an arrangement with which the committee of course, is little disposed to comply. A Swedish-Norwegian agent would, therefore, only be able to assist such emigrants as wished to remain in New York, and accordingly venture to betake themselves out of the pale of Castle Garden. The serviceableness of such an agent is, besides, far from being obvious. If an emigrant does not succeed in getting employment at the work-office in Castle Garden, there is no reason for supposing that the aid of the agent in this respect would be of avail, and if an emigrant needed money, he could, of course, expect no assistance of the agent, because in such a case the demand would be so immense, that no means would suffice. A credulous emigrant would nevertheless be liable of being cheated by the runners, because the agent could not always and incessantly follow him.

From the Castle Garden almost all Swedish and Norwegian emigrants set out for the West, where they have friends and relatives, and arrive generally at Chicago without accidents, though the newspapers are now and then stating how some credulous emigrant has been deprived of money and luggage.

In Chicago there is, however, no establishment corresponding to the Castle Garden, and the emigrants are there greatly exposed to being defrauded by unprincipled Swedes and Norwegians who have not succeeded in procuring themselves any other more advantageous occupation than that of cheating their countrymen. The emigrants who remain in Chicago are allured by runners to hotels, where they are obliged to pay two or three times the prices agreed upon, and as their means are ordinarily very scanty, they are very often brought under the necessity to give their trunks in pawn. There is, to be sure, an emigrant-house in Chicago, which is supported by voluntary contributions of the Swedish population, but as the greatest part of the Swedes in Chicago live in straightened circumstances, the means of the emigrant-house are insufficient for the great emigration; and the hardships which the emigrants meet with in the emigrant home in Chicago are undoubtedly greater than those they left behind in their native country. Such emigrants as have tickets for direct conveyance to the West, and accordingly only pass through Chicago, are nevertheless very often plundered there. A great number, perhaps the half part of the emigrants, have bought the tickets on credit, or else received them from their already emigrated relatives, who, instead of sending the traveling expenses, prefer to send tickets, partly because the money intended for the voyage has sometimes been employed for other purposes, partly because the emigrant companies give respite with the pay for the tickets when the buyer is well known. The whole cash of the emigrant at his arrival in Chicago consists, therefore, very often of two or three dollars, and of this pittance he is deprived in Chicago. According to perfectly agreeing statements made by emigrants who passed through Chicago last summer on different days, this takes place in the following manner: At his arrival in Chicago the trains are changed, and the fresh train starts from another station than that where the arrival took place. A Swedish and Norwegian runner now presents himself, and informs the emigrants that their tickets certainly entitles them to depart with the fresh train, but that the transport of the trunks from one station to another is not performed by the emigrant company which has sold the tickets, but by a separate company, viz, the express company; and in proportion to the size and weight of the trunks, one, two, or three dollars are demanded of them. The emigrant protests, but his fear of not getting his trunk along with the train causes him finally to pay. It occurred last summer that a party of emigrants, consisting of a wedded couple, two wives, whose husbands were settled in Minnesota, and five children, were in this manner stripped of all their money. The consequence was that the whole party must go without subsistence during their journey from Chicago to St. Paul, in Minnesota, which took about four and twenty hours. At their arrival in St. Paul, the ticket was no more valid, but it was found that the place in question was five Swedish miles (thirty English) distant from St. Paul. Now it was certainly possible to make the trip in two hours at $2 a person, but as the party was quite destitute of money, one of the husbands was obliged to set out on foot to search out the relatives, and afterward, during the following day, return with money to St. Paul. The women and children must meanwhile remain in St. Paul, with the prospect of going without food for twenty-four hours longer, whereas, if they had not been cheated in Chicago, the whole party would have been able to arrive at the place of destination without any trouble.

There is no doubt that this sort of cheating is carried on at a large scale, and as emigration is so extensive, it is of course very lucrative, but there is no possibility to prevent it in Chicago. The only means to check it would be to request the concerned emigrant agent in Sweden and Norway to note down separately on the ticket or contract that the company takes upon itself the transport of the luggage in Chicago. The emigrant company which forwarded the above-mentioned emigrant party did, upon inquiry, declare that it takes care of this transport without any pay, but it seems probable that this duty is not always performed. According to statements made by other emigrants, it appears that emigrants arriving via Quebec are, at the border, liable to the same kind of imposition, although the notices received in this respect have not been so complete as to afford matter for a closer inquiry. Custom-house officers, or runners who pretend to be such, ask the emigrant for a duty of one, two, or three dollars in proportion to the weight and size of the trunks, independently of their contents, which commonly consist of clothes, implements, &c. Such effects and generally personal appurtenances are, however, according to the now valid law, of which an abstract is subjoined, exempted from duty, and the emigrant needed, consequently, only to refuse when a similar extortion was attempted.

The question whether the prospects of the emigrant, after he has arrived at a settlement in the West, are so promising that the emigration generally may be thought advisable, is, of course, a matter well known to the settler. All settlers do unhesitatingly answer it, and this answer without exception is the same, viz: the question whether a person ought to emigrate or not, depends exclusively on his personal cir-circumstances and his capacity to shift for himself; some ought to emigrate, others do best to remain at home. This answer is, indeed, also the only one that can be given. A question of quite another kind is, whether the greatest number of emigrants settled in the West succeed in attaining a better condition than that which they left, or might have expected to have met in their native country. To a person who has frequented the settlements there can be no doubt in this respect. The greatest number succeed very often to work themselves up to a position considerably better than if they had remained at home, and most of the emigrants declare themselves contented with their lot. This fact is undoubtedly due to the circumstance that these emigrants are a young, vigorous, and orderly people. It is an exception to find an emigrant who has carried money with him, and it is a prevalent opinion among the settlers that a person who possesses a farm, and is in easy circumstances, ought not to emigrate in hope of becoming rich here. To make one's fortune in the West is required a thrifty energy to work the soil, and to buy betimes a piece of land where the railroad has not reached, and the land, therefore, is cheap. The land being once bought, its value increases with incredible rapidity in proportion as the railroad advances and the population becomes larger. Whereas, if the emigrant does not possess health and strength, and his expenses for the support of his family will not allow him to make savings for purchase of land, he cannot generally expect to arrive at a condition exempted from cares, and still less can he hope to attain easy circumstances.

The most thriving settlements are situated in Illinois, and were established twenty-five years ago. From the nearest railroad station the distance is commonly not above one or two Swedish miles. At the station there is a little town, and the traveler gets easily a carriage, but ordinarily without a driver. The road is, however, easy to find; there are no by-paths, but only one road, which leads directly to the settlement, that is situated at a skirt of a wood. The settlement consists of a great many fine farms, surrounded by fertile fields of maize and wheat. Ordinarily there is a Lutheran church, and there are instances of church buildings which have cost as much as 180,000 Swedish riksdalers. The houses are made of joist-work, with whitewashed board linings, and have commonly four windows in the lower story, but only two in the upper one, which last thus only stretches over the half of the house. The buildings remind us of the small villas in the environs of Stockholm. Besides the dwelling-house, one sees commonly the little log-house where the emigrant lodged during the first years. The total absence of out-houses strikes immediately the eyes. Stables and cow-houses are unnecessary in consequence of the mild winter; cattle and horses are therefore kept under sheds, covered with straw, but open at the sides. Barns are not required, because the crop is thrashed with a machine on the grain fields. It is not unusual that a rich farmer, who at his arrival some years ago begun with pawning his trunk, is now the owner of a neat, well-arranged farm of about 360 acres, the greatest part of which is open ground, seven cattle, nine horses, besides valuable farming implements and machines. As the price of the ground in Illinois is now 150 riksdalers per acre, and as an ox or horse costs 300 to 450, a colt 180 to 225, a cow 150 riksdalers, such a farm may at the present time be estimated from 60,000 to 70,000 riksdalers. Particulars respecting the manner in which a poor emigrant may succeed in becoming a rich farmer all agree. A lately arrived emigrant may get employment at a farm with a monthly pay of 60 riksdalers, for eight to ten months, with board and lodging, and though he may shift for himself during the winter months, yet he is able generally to save 300 to 400 riksdalers a year. A man's day-work during the harvest time is often paid with 4 riksdalers, 50 ore. Railroad-workers receive 5 riksdalers, 25 ore a day. This is, however, hard work, and it happens, moreover, very often that the wages are not paid by the railroad company.

After the emigrant has succeeded in saving about 1,200 riksdalers he buys two horses, wagon and plow, and may then earn monthly 150 riksdalers, but must then provide for himself.

Twenty years ago land could be obtained in Illinois for $7\frac{1}{2}$ riksdalers, and about ten years ago for 15 riksdalers; and as a single acre sown with wheat might yield an income of between 42 to 84 riksdalers, it was of course easy to buy land. The land being once purchased, it rose in value every year, in proportion as the railroad progressed, and the supply of laboring people became greater. An emigrant without means can at present not hope to buy land in Illinois, but is obliged, in order to enjoy the same favorable circumstances, to betake himself to the western tracts of Minnesota and Kansas. One ought not, however, to imagine that all inhabitants in a settlement are well off. Close by the rich farmer one meets a poor emigrant who possesses only 5 acres, and continues to dwell in the little log-house, although both arrived at the same time at the same place. In the rich farmer's log-house is harbored a latterly arrived emigrant family, consisting of a wife and four children, all in rags. The household furniture is made up of a bed, a chair, a cradle, and the great chest. Being asked, the wife relates that the family has been settled there a year; that the husband has been sick, but that he has now again got employment as a carpenter, in the nearest town, with a daily pay of 4 riksdalers, 50 ore, of which he, however, for his daily subsisttance expends 1 riksdaler, 50 ore; that she and her husband possessed a farm, but that it was bought on credit, and that the income did not suffice to pay taxes and duties; that the "pastor," and master, and mistress, had dissuaded them from emigrating, but their relations had encouraged them; that they possessed not a single ore ($\frac{1}{2}$ cent) when they arrived at the settlement; that they had not been obliged to starve outright, in consequence of the charity of some wealthy farmers, but that she, whose parents were independent peasants, had never found herself in so straitened circumstances as during the last year; that a daughter of fifteen years of age, and a son of twelve years of age, were already gone out as servants; that as soon as the husband had succeeded to save some money, the whole family would go to Kansas, but did not intend to return to Sweden; first, because it is not worth the while to think of what is impossible, and then, when we see how well off is Pär Olsson, we also may hope that things may turn out just as well for us! At some distance thence there lives a tailor, who is possessed of a little house and a few acres of land, an old horse, and two cows. Since his arrival at the settlement, twenty years ago, he has incessantly worked on very hard; but not being a farmer, he has not met with the good fortune of his neighbors, and though he annually saves 300 riksdalers, yet he says that the future looks dark, because his strength is lessened and the family numerous.

In Minnesota one meets with Swedes and Norwegians on all railroad trains. Some go to Kansas to look for land, while others, on the contrary, are going from Kansas to Minnesota for the same purpose. The greatest part of them are young laborers returning toward the east and the more wealthy States, where wages are somewhat higher, in order to earn needful money for purchase of land. They have ordinarily been two or three years in America, and in consequence of the great many different persons with whom they have been in contact, these years have had a considerable influence on their experience of the world and their mental energy.

Along the railroad, which extends toward the west from St. Paul, one meets a great number of lately arrived emigrants, because, as the railroad ends and the older settlements cease, the emigrants must at the beginning remain here to become somewhat acquainted with the new circumstances before they finally go to settle on tracts that are comparatively little populated. As the soil is not so yielding, the climate harder, the settlements younger, and the railroad but recently finished, the well-being is less there than in Illinois. The houses are not so neatly built, and many settlers still live in the log-houses. Some settlers, who have fixed in miserable woodland tracts, live in very narrow circumstances, and even in extreme indigence, though they bought their land sixteen years ago. Here one sees, however, also extensive prairies, and the wealthy farmer driving his reaping-machine harnessed with four horses. At one railroad station, which was opened a few years ago, there is already a little town that, with its small wooden houses, presents a very fine view on the even prairie. Near by the station there stands a large grain store-house. This, as well as some very large shops, belongs to American merchants dwelling in the larger towns, but almost all the other houses are possessed by Swedes. The hotel, where board may be obtained for 15 riksdalers 75 ore a week, belongs to an American, who deals besides with agricultural implements, but its management is intrusted to a Swede, formerly a corporal, who has already learned the English sufficiently to be understood, though at his arrival at the station a year ago the whole of his English vocabulary consisted of the single word "work." His monthly pay is 105 riksdalers and board. Beside the hotel, there is a little house with only one room. This house belongs to a Swedish tailor, who arrived a year ago with wife and children; he had borrowed the expenses needed for the passage from another emigrant, but has not been able to earn enough for paying back his debt. At the passage over the lake of Michigan, while the emigrants sat closely crammed up on the narrow deck, an intoxicated emigrant thrust another on the knee of the tailor's wife, who was pregnant. The consequence was a premature child-birth on board the vessel. At his arrival in Milwaukee, he was obliged, therefore, to remain at a hotel, and as his means shrunk away in paying the doctor's fee and the bill of the hotel, he must pawn the trunk in order to come further. In the course of the year he had, however, succeeded to build the little house, which, along with the furniture, had cost 600 riksdalers, but the land he had not been able to buy. As this land, which was saleable last year for only 150 riksdalers, had meanwhile increased to a value of 600 riksdalers, he was now in the untoward plight to remove the house. He and his wife repented bitterly that they emigrated, and have firmly resolved to return to Sweden as soon as possible. As he, for some time, had not met with any work in his trade, he had applied to a farmer for work, but his chest was too feeble to endure the hard labor in the fields. His nearest neighbor was another Swedish tailor, who had also arrived there a year ago, with his family. This latter had, however, given up his trade, and as he was possessed of a little stock of money, he had opened a tavern and bought some cows, the supporting of which cost nothing at all, because they found abundant pasture on the prairie before the house. In the middle of the square stands an emigrant house, which belongs to the town; the emigrants may there get shelter over their heads for some short time. It was now occupied by a Swedish emigrant family, which was placed in a most distressing plight. The husband, who had been a skillful joiner, had not succeeded in getting employment in his trade, but had been obliged to seek work of a carpenter. In the course of the year he had, however, been so successful as to earn about 300 riksdalers, or the needful money for the passage of his family, upon which he had immediately bought tickets for the wife and the children, because it seemed so tedious! On the arrival of his family, he was accordingly without means, and as he was at the same time disabled to work in consequence of a deep sore in his foot, caused by treading on a large nail, he was obliged to take recourse to the emigrant home with his family. The wife, a young woman of engaging appearance, still wearing the national dress peculiar to her birth-place, told that she could weave and sew, but no work was to be found, adding, "that it should be, indeed, so impossible to get work in America, I had never thought." As she had two small children, and the husband was sick, and besides not strong, work on a farm was quite out of question.

As there is still good stock of land belonging to the State, and according to existing law every emigrant can obtain 160 acres for the moderate price of 42 riksdalers, it appears very strange that all do not take advantage of this opportunity to become land-owners. The truth, however, is that the emigrant in this case must settle down on the land, which cannot be done without necessary means for purchase of implements, cattle, and something to subsist on during the first year. The capital which a settler thus needs can be calculated to at least 600 riksdalers. These tracts are certainly only ten Swedish miles distant from the railroad, but the roads are bad, and the only vehicle is a wagon drawn by oxen. The nearest neighbors of the settlers are the Indians. These live, however, on a friendly footing with the settlers, and it happens very often that an Indian presents himself with venison-steak, in order to have it exchanged for a cup of coffee. During the first year the settlers live a very hard life, and if the tract is woodless he must lodge in a hut dug in the ground. Many prefer, therefore, to buy railroad land, which may be had at 15 riksdalers per acre, at a distance of one Swedish mile from the railroad, and in the neighborhood of some settlement which already possesses a church and congregation.

Swedish and Norwegian maid-servants are very much sought for, and obtain ordinarily service without trouble in the towns, with a monthly pay of 24 to 36 riksdalers. It is, however, indispensably necessary for them to know some person, who may afford them needful shelter the first days, until they may obtain some service.

It is impossible to make a journey in the west and return without being fully persuaded that the chief and almost exclusive motive for emigration is the hope of arriving at better and more easy circumstances, and there is little doubt that the greatest number succeed in realizing this hope. As regards the assertion, often put forth in the newspapers, that emigration is occasioned by the emigrant's love of liberty, which does not allow him to endure the political oppression, or as it is preferably termed in the American journals, "the slavery of his native country," we think this to be entirely unfounded, as far as the political system of the country is concerned. The Swedish and Norwegian settler in the West procures generally the rights and privileges of an American citizen, and as the republican party is preponderating, his votes are generally given, in accordance with the prevailing opinion in the district where he lives, to some republican candidate, of whose political views he has only a very imperfect idea. He takes little part in the political conflicts, and commits willingly the arrangements of the concerns of the community to the native American, because the settler still is apt to consider the Lutheran congregation as the community. If the number of the settlers becomes so great that they may reasonably claim to have a countryman chosen to some public office, only in such a case they evince some particular interest in exercising their rights of election, but even then their political way of thinking is so little determined that they will vote with the democratic party if the object in view would thereby be more surely attained. The settler is aware of no direct advantage in his right of casting a voting-ticket for a person that he has never seen, and who generally is an American; but he perceives and appreciates, on the other hand, another circumstance quite novel to him, which materially conduces to his every day well-being, and this is the general and thorough social equality prevailing there; here we are all peasants; there are no lords and gentlemen among us; and no one need pull off one's cap! This sense of equality, which gives rise to the American custom of addressing all persons with "sir," has, on the contrary, as regards the Swedish and Norwegian settlers, produced a quite opposite effect. All titles are cast off, and all address each other, at their first meeting, with "du," (you.)

The settler who directly is transplanted from his native country to the west, fancies, of course, that this social likeness is dependent on the republican form of government, but it is, in truth, only a necessary consequence of the fact that all persons in the west possess the same education, the same habits of life, and the same chances of having the necessities of life supplied, on condition—which commonly is the case—that they are possessed of a pair of sinewy arms. In Chicago the social equality is already less, and in the other States there is, in a social regard, a great dissimilarity, although the causes in operation are not the same as in Europe. One thing, however, which they unanimously admit of being better managed in their native country is justice! To judge of letters which, from time to time, are arriving from emigrants who have emigrated to States where there are no Swedish settlements, these emigrants appear to be in a very sad plight, owing to their want of knowledge in the language and other peculiar circumstances, especially when the American employer refuses to fulfill the terms of a contract. If, as sometimes takes place, the emigrant mentions his need and complains of his grievances to the nearest consul, this last can do nothing more than to direct the emigrant to the proper American authority, unless it may happen that both parties are living at the place, in which case the vice-consul may attempt what can be effected by friendly mediation. The business of the vice-consuls who are appointed in the west consists mainly in assisting the legation with concerns in the way of inheritances which are committed to its care. Besides a small income for attestations and certificates, a vice-consul can expect no other compensation than the allowance which is granted to him in cases when inheritances are actually obtained; and, as the assistance of the legation is mainly solicited with respect to the difficulties which often are connected with the obtaining of an inheritance, the direct income of a vice-consul is far from being proportionate to the pains taken. That there are persons, however, who are found willing to accept such offices, may be explained from the fact that the vice-consul at the same time ordinarily is a commissioner and emigrant agent, and that he, moreover, in consideration of his employment in the service of the government, generally enjoys the confidence of the emigrants, and, consequently, may find opportunities to extend his private sphere of business. The circulation of money which is brought about between Sweden and Norway by emigration, amounts annually to a sum many times greater than the whole value of the export and import of goods put together, and the means which, in the way of assistance, are sent from emigrants to their relatives in Sweden and Norway come up to very considerable sums. The creditable firm of Messrs. F. Winslow & Co., Danish bankers at Chicago, No. 2 South Clark street, is very much solicited by emigrants; and it is known that they have sometimes forwarded monthly transmissions of 120,000 riksdalers to Sweden alone for several succeeding months. It is probable that the greatest part of these means was designed to be used in Sweden and not for traveling expenses, because the emigrants, as has been previously stated, prefer to buy the tickets in America.

When the legation is requested to procure an inheritance, the respective heirs usually suppose that the minister, in consequence of his official position, will afford better aid than a private agent. This is, however, most frequently not the case; and the only advantage is, that the heirs are insured against the risk of being obliged to open a lawsuit against their own agent. Here there are no administrative authorities to whom recourse can be taken, in order to obtain information respecting the possessors of the inheritance, who are living in the far-off west; the minister can, therefore, do nothing more than to write to the vice-consul, and this last must commit the cause to some known person residing in the same locality where the deceased had been settled. If no vice-consul is to be found in the neighborhood, the minister must write directly to some advocate, and then it often happens that the letter of the minister rests unanswered. It occurs frequently that the heirs cannot state anything more respecting the inheritance than that they have received letters from a certain emigrant, whose name is stated, and who has offered himself to procure the inheritance, but that they do not venture to give him authority. The only thing which then can be done by the vice-consul is to write to or inquire for this emigrant, and as his motives in writing to the heirs were owing to his hope to earn something by procuring the inheritance, he of course shows himself dissatisfied with the mistrust of the heirs, and is little inclined to afford necessary information. When, finally, the inheritance is discovered, it is found to be in the hands of some person who has already become accustomed to consider it as his property. A request must then be made at the proper authority about the appointment of a "public administrator," or procurator, and the settling of the inventory of the succession takes, ordinarily, two years. Ultimately, it happens very often that the administrator, in his turn, raises difficulties, and as it always is possible that the court of justice, in case of a lawsuit, may declare that the administrator has proved that the expenses for the adjustment of the inheritance, which commonly are very heavy, and other outstanding debts, have drained off the whole of the resources, the minister ventures not to incur the risk of paying, himself, the lawsuit expenses, and as the heirs themselves neither are willing nor able to guarantee the expenses, sometimes all hope of obtaining the inheritance must be given up.

The language spoken in the settlements is, strangely enough, very little mixed up with English words, and even the younger generation, which is born in America, speak their mother tongue without the least trace of English accent. Children and young people generally acquire very rapidly the English, but persons of a more advanced age seldom attain any readiness in the language, and there are instances of persons who now speak the English worse than some years ago, when emigration was less extensive. One meets often with persons in the settlements who have been two or three years in America without knowing more English than the word "yes," which always is used instead of "ja," which word is entirely banished from the Scandinavian languages. At one of the Swedish churches in Chicago is found a school where the whole instruction is given in the Swedish language, but in the so-termed Sunday-school, which is frequented by the generation growing up in America, and therefore has stood in a closer contact with the Americans, the Swedish pastor must convey the instruction in English.

The Swedish and Norwegian emigrants settle, each nation for itself, but they appear, at least in the country, to live in perfect harmony. The inhabitants in a settlement are accordingly all of the same nationality, and even from the same provinces. That branching out of emigration which goes on in the West is a natural consequence of existing conditions there. Emigration cannot fix on one place, but must proceed with every year toward the west, and the reason why the lately arrived emigrants do not remain in the older settlements, is the same which impelled them to emigrate from their native country, viz, the hope of a more easy living.

The Scandinavian population in the west, of which of course a great part is born in America, is calculated to amount to about 500,000, whereof 300,000 are Norwegians, 175,000 Swedes, and 25,000 Danes.

It is believed that the different nationalities will remain unaltered so long as emigration continues on the same large scale, and by this means the languages and the relations with the native countries are kept up; but it is likely that the Scandinavian nationalities thereafter will gradually wear out, and that they will not get so firm a footing in America as the German nationality. The main ground of this lies in the fact that the Germans are considerably more numerous. They are computed at four to five millions, and as they began to emigrate at a time when there were no railroads, the first emigrants remained, generation after generation, at the same place, in consequence whereof whole districts are peopled with Germans. This population is also in several cities, and especially in New York, which city, in regard to the number of German inhabitants, is one-third in order next after Vienna and Berlin—so numerous that it can live perfectly independent for itself. European emigration, it is supposed, will continue for many years to the same extent as hitherto, but prospects are becoming less and less alluring for every year, in consequence of want of wood toward the west, the greater distance, and increased traveling expenses.

Of late years an incessantly increasing number of Swedish and Norwegian emigrants have departed to the Southern States. Respecting the prospects of the emigrants there, I have not obtained any near information; but even in case that full information might be had in this respect, and it were perfectly ascertained that those emigrants who have emigrated there have more chance of success, yet I am firmly convinced that the publishing of this information would not have the least influence on their choice of place for settlement, because they always emigrate in pursuance of letters from previously emigrated relatives, or oral statements of emigrant agents, on the words of whom they place implicit faith.

The Government of the United States has this year published statistical tables concerning wages and living expenses in the different States, and as both the English and American journals are agreed that these tables will be of great use to the emigrants in their choice of places of settlement, I herewith have the honor to subjoin a copy, along with an abstract made by me respecting the States of Illinois, Minnesota, Kansas, and Texas. I am persuaded, however, that it is impossible to draw just conclusions respecting the preferableness of one State to another, because the tables do not contain any information about a matter of the greatest importance to the Swedish and Norwegian emigrants, viz, the means of obtaining land, and the chances for the increase in value of the land.

The State of Maine brought in last summer some Swedish emigrant families, and though the land, which was situated in the northern part of Maine, and belonged to the State, was sold at the low rate of 1 riksdalers 50 ore per acre, or 240 riksdalers for 160 acres, with a term of three years allowed for payment, each family obtained moreover, as a gift, 100 acres, together with necessary dwelling-houses, with the view and in the hope that emigration, in consequence of letters from these emigrants to their relatives in Sweden, should take the direction to Maine. This hope appears already to be partly realized, as the number of emigrants is stated to be one hundred. It looks likely, however, that the increase in value of the land in these distant tracts will not take place with the same rapidity as in the West, along the great transit railroads. The West is possessed, moreover, of the peculiar and great advantage that the emigrant at the beginning can remain in an older settlement, and meanwhile get somewhat acquainted and familiarized with the new circumstances before he comes to a determination with regard to the purchase of land.

WASHINGTON, November 17, 1870.

C. LEWENHAUPT.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Stockholm, March 2, 1871.

SIR: About a week ago I had the honor to mention to the acting chief secretary of the Foreign Office that I had been informed that Count Lewenhaupt's report on emigration, of November last, as published in the newspapers of Norway, stated that "it is the general opinion in America that emigration is prejudicial to the United States, and that, consequently, the Government wishes to oppose it," &c.; but on receiving from the acting chief secretary a printed copy of the report in Swedish, and finding it contained no such remark, I was led to believe the error had been made by some one of the newspapers in Norway, and that it would soon be corrected there.

Since then, however, I have received reliable information that the version of the report, as above quoted, has not only been published in the newspapers throughout Norway, but that it is the same as officially communicated to the Storting.

I certainly need not assure your excellency that both the people and the Government of the United States estimate very highly the emigration from Sweden and Norway. The statement above referred to, published as it has been throughout Norway, has done them, I fear, no little injustice in Norwegian opinion; and assuming that it is an incorrect version of what Count Lewenhaupt has actually reported, I hasten to request that you will have the kindness, as far as is in your power, to place the matter before the Norwegian public in its proper light.

I have, &c.,

C. C. ANDREWS.

His Excellency Count WACLTMEISTER, Minister of State and Foreign Affairs.

No. 382.

Mr. Fish to Mr. Andrews.

No. 63.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, March 13, 1871.

SIR: The Department is surprised to learn from a dispatch of the 4th ultimo from Mr. Gerhard Gade, consul of the United States at Christiania, in Norway, that Count Lewenhaupt, late chargé d'affaires of Sweden and Norway here, had, in an official report to his government of the 24th of November last, stated that public opinion in this country was unfavorable to immigration, and therefore that the Government desired to discourage it. Mr. Gade represents that the report referred to has been extensively published in the Swedish and Norwegian newspapers.

In view of the acknowledged intelligence of Count Lewenhaupt and his supposed good-will toward the United States, it is unaccountable why he should have embodied so unfounded a statement in an official report. So far from being true that public sentiment in this country is adverse to immigration from abroad, and that the Government is disposed to discourage it, the reverse is, and always has been, the fact. From the foundation of this Government, it has been obvious to every reflecting person that the great want of the country was labor. The policy of the Government, therefore, has from the beginning been so shaped as to offer tempting inducements to immigrants from foreign countries; such as good lands at nominal prices, and municipal privileges on a footing with the natives of the soil, in many quarters immediately on landing, and in others upon a short probation as to residence. It may have been that in process of time new-comers from some countries may have been preferred to those from others, but it is at least questionable if any have been more heartily welcome than those from Sweden and Norway. It is not necessary to explain the reason for this.

As the misapprehensions of Count Lewenhaupt, from their official character and extensive publication, may, if uncontradicted, tend to discourage such of his countrymen from seeking a home here as otherwise might have been so disposed, it is desirable that they should be corrected, and, if practicable, as publicly as they have been proclaimed. You will, in any event, make an informal representation on the subject to the Swedish minister of foreign affairs, and will endeavor in every proper way to cause erroneous impressions to be removed.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Stockholm, March 18, 1871. (Received April 6.)

SIR: Referring to my No. 93, of the 3d instant, in which I had the honor to call your attention to the publication in the Norwegian newspapers of an error, caused by translating in the Foreign Office in Count Lewenhaupt's report on emigration, whereby it was made to read that the people of the United States were opposed to emigration, and to my No. 94 of the 4th instant, inclosing a translation of the minister for foreign affairs' note to me, promising to take the necessary measures to have the error repaired, I now beg to say that I last evening received a communication from Mr. Consul Gade, at Christiania, advising me how this correction has been made. He states that the Christiania newspapers of the 10th instant contain the following paragraph:

We have been requested to state that an error in writing, which alters the meaning, has slipped into the report from the legation in Washington, relating to the emigration from the United Kingdoms to America, which we have lately mentioned in this newspaper. On page 3, 10th line from above, is written "the United States" instead of "the United Kingdoms."

It will be seen that this correction is merely according to the letter, and fails entirely to remove the erroneous impression produced by the mistake. Though it will doubtless appear to you, as it does to me, unsatisfactory, I regret that I cannot suggest any further probable remedy to be had from the Foreign Office.

As affording some means for removing the unfavorable impression the error must have made in Norway, I think I may venture to recommend that you give an abstract of the correspondence on the matter to the press in the United States, so that adopted Norwegian citizens there can properly explain it in their correspondence with their countrymen at home.

No. 384.

Mr. Andrews to Mr. Fish.

No. 100.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Stockholm, March 20, 1871. (Received April 12.)

SIR: I beg to submit some observations on the subject of emigration, and to refer also to remarks thereon in my Nos. 45 and 51. The condition in which the war has left many people in France and Germany, and especially those in the districts of Alsace and Lorraine, and the fact that certain powers, among them Sweden, are increasing the military burdens of the people, favor the conclusion that the present year may be a favorable one for the United States to make some extra exertions to induce immigration. If the United States should receive emigrants from the following countries, for instance, in about the same proportion to their respective populations as they receive from Sweden, they would receive annually from Finland 15,000 in place of none now; Esthonia, Livonia, and Coneland, (Baltic provinces of Russia,) 15,000 in place of none now; Belgium, 25,000 in place of 1,000; Holland, 25,000 in place of 1,300 now; Austria, 160,000 in place of 4,000 now; France, 180,000 in place of 5,000 now. I have the impression that emigration from these countries would not fall much short of these figures, if the people therein were as well informed about the United States as are the people of Sweden. Mr. James Howard, member of parliament, in his "Continental Farming and Peasantry," in which he described what he personally saw in 1869, says of the farm laborers of Belgium, "what surprised me much was that notwithstanding their wretched condition, they had no idea of emigration; indeed many did not know what was meant by the term." (See page 29.) Though the peasantry in the other countries I have named may not be in the condition that is here indicated, I feel sure there is an almost universal ignorance among them of the opportunities of acquiring land and citizenship in the United States. Even in Sweden, from whence there has been so large emigration of late years, the people are not yet generally informed of the benefits of the homestead law. A few years ago I believe the French government refused to allow documents to be circulated in France designed to encourage emigration to the United States. But perhaps there would be no difficulty in that respect now. The Swedish language is extensively spoken in Finland and the German language in the Baltic provinces; and it would seem easy to diffuse the requisite information in those quarters, in case it would be permitted by the Russian government. I, for one, should be glad to see the experiment tried. If proper efforts were made, I believe the annual emigration from Europe to the United States could be doubled. With compulsory education and the ballot-box, which has aptly been called the "real American college," our institutions will be liable to no detriment from the greatest immigration that can possibly happen, while the material interests of our country will be promoted. In his circular No. 19, of August 8, 1862, addressed to diplomatic and consular officers, the Secretary of State (Mr. Seward) stated:

It may, therefore, be confidently asserted that, even now, nowhere else can the industrious laboring man and artisan expect so liberal a recompense for his services as in the United States. You are authorized and directed to make these truths known in any quarter and in any way which may lead to the migration of such persons to this country.

Again, in his circular No. 32, of February 8, 1863, on the homestead law, addressed to the same officers, he says:

It is believed that in no country in the civilized world are such opportunities afforded as in the United States, to active, industrious, and intelligent men, for the acquisition of abundant means of support, and comfortable homesteads for themselves and their families. These facts you are instructed to make known in such manner as may be considered most expedient and proper, within the district of your residence.

If the Department is of the opinion that anything can be done by the legation in diffusing information of the character contained in these circulars, I will be very glad to receive instructions as to the way it deems advisable to proceed. I have supposed, however, that, in consequence of the sensitiveness of all classes in these kingdoms on the subject, any direct efforts on the part of a diplomatic representative of the United States to encourage emigration would be viewed with displeasure by this government. The most effective and economical plan, it appears to me, would be to operate through the native emigration agents, who canvass for and contract with emigrants for their passage. There are eight of these in Sweden, and all located at Gothenburg. They severally give bond to the government for their faithful dealings in the sum of about 60,000 riksdalers, ($16,000.) Let such an agent publish in newspapers of the largest circulation a notice like this, for example:

FREE HOMES.—The United States of North America donate homesteads of 160 acres of fertile land, convenient to railroads, to heads of families, male or female, or to single persons upward of twenty-one years of age, on payment of $14, and on condition of cultivating a portion of the land, according to their means, for five years. The foreigner, in acquiring a homestead, becomes the equal of the native-born citizen, legally and politically. The inducements are great, not only for the poor, but for persons with capital. The expense of passage from ——— to these lands is $—. A pamphlet and map containing particulars as to homestead benefits will be sent post-free by the subscriber to any one applying therefor.

The agent being supplied with the proper pamphlet and map, could thus circulate the information among those who really desired it. The short notice, such as I have given above, better, perhaps, if even briefer, kept as a standing advertisement in the newspapers, and occasionally appearing in the editorial columns, would awaken the necessary attention. It would not be essential to employ a regular agent in distributing information in such manner, but the service could be rendered by any trusty unofficial person. I am informed that an agent in Gothenburg, operating for the new Swedish settlement on the Aroostook, in Maine, receives a hundred letters weekly, inquiring about the prospects for emigrants there. Information calculated to promote emigration will have increased influence by being official. It should be practical and brief. I would recommend that a pamphlet be issued by the General Land Office, not exceeding thirty octavo pages, which shall explain the way of acquiring homesteads, and the economy of their cultivation and management; that shall explain how people without capital can acquire them, and also the inducements for people with capital to acquire them. It is a fact, I believe, that a settler who needs to work out for wages in order to get the necessary means to improve his homestead, can be absent therefrom a considerable part of the first five years of occupancy, and still hold his homestead. Such practical facts are the kind that should be circulated. Also, facts showing the amount of labor or money necessary to be expended in order to comply with the homestead law, the kind of crops the soil will produce, their value, the proximity of railroads to the land, the cost of subsistence, rate of wages, the season for planting and for harvesting, the rate of taxes, the privileges, both political and civil, the settler acquires, &c.

The local land officers are in daily intercourse with settlers from all parts of their respective districts. The General Land Office, by supplying the local officers with blanks containing the proper questions and readings, could, with no other expense than the cost of the blanks, obtain the requisite practical facts from the local officers. It could then prepare a pamphlet embracing information as to homesteads in the different sections and climates of the country, and which would meet the wants of a very large class of emigrants. If possible, a moderate-sized map should accompany such a document. If a pamphlet, such as I have indicated, were prepared in a careful manner by a competent person, having some actual knowledge of frontier life, and a heartfelt interest in the subject-matter, it could be circulated in Europe (in the language of the country where circulated) to the very greatest advantage. Having given this subject earnest attention for a long time, and being deeply impressed with the importance of some measure such as I have just above indicated, I beg leave to ask that you will bring it to the notice of the President, so that, if he deems it advisable, he may give directions to the proper department to have it carried into effect. I would here emphatically state that there has not yet been made any thorough and systematic effort to circulate in Sweden and Norway information calculated to promote emigration.

State boards of emigration in a few instances have published pamphlets in Swedish and Norwegian, but their circulation has been limited and transient. Several States make large appropriations to encourage emigration, and maintain agents in New York, Quebec, Chicago, and perhaps other cities to attract emigrants. But it would seem to be a more economical method to impress the minds of emigrants before their departure from their native country, as the better class of them generally make up their minds as to their particular destination before embarking. Several hundred copies of the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office for 1867, in Swedish, were received here a year ago, and delivered to the United States consular officers for distribution. The most of them, I believe, remain on hand, though the newspapers and public libraries had been supplied with them, and regular emigration agents had all they wished. It being a volume of 178 octavo pages, and the matter general, it is not of direct advantage. But in connection with the document I have indicated, it will serve as an excellent groundwork of information.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Stockholm, June 10, 1871. (Received July 5.)

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith a report which I have prepared on the finances of Sweden, including an explanation of the various kinds of taxes and a statement of the public debt.

I am, &c.,

C. C. ANDREWS.

Inclosure.

Report of the finances of Sweden.

Report to the Department of State, by C. C. Andrews, minister resident of the United States at Stockholm, on the finances of Sweden.

I. CAPITAL RECEIPTS.

Under this head is included first "Allmänna bevilning," (general aid or contribution.) which also comprises the income tax. The statute, though general, is annually enacted by the Diet, and separately promulgated, as are all the new laws by the King. A translation of this law, with explanatory comments, is annexed, marked A. Annual receipts from the "Allmän bevilning" in riksdalers, (3.75 riksdalers=$1,) riksdalers	3, 000, 000 00

Other resources, including profits on shares in the States Bank, which has a paid-in capital of 25,000,000 riksdalers; also including certain stamp duties, &c., &c.; say	2, 244, 839 85
From State loan	5, 000, 000 00
Total riksdalers	10, 244, 839 85

The above funds are administered by the public debt office, or "Riks" gälds-Kontoret, which also has the administration of the whole public debt. Its principal officers are a board of commissioners or deputies, who are annually elected by the Diet. It is therefore an institution under the peculiar charge of the Diet. The Swedish finances being administered by two independent offices, are, on that account, less readily understood.

II. ORDINARY RECEIPTS.

The several items under this head are explained in the annexed paper, B. These funds, together with the extraordinary receipts, are administered in the states office, "Riks Kontoret." Total receipts (ordinary) as estimated for 1872, 16,845,000 riksdalers.

III. EXTRAORDINARY RECEIPTS.

	Riksdalers.
The Diet of 1871, estimated for 1872, custom receipts	15, 000, 000 00
Post receipts	2, 230, 000 00
Paper stamp fees	1, 350, 000 00
Distillation of brandy (brännvinstill verk nighsofgrift) increased 10 öre per kanna by Diet of 1871, and now 80 öre per kanna	10, 800, 000 00
Total	46, 225, 000 00
To which add funds in "Riks" gälds-Kontoret	10, 244, 839 85
Total receipts	56, 469, 839 85
(At 3.75 riksdalers)	$15, 058, 623 33

IV. DISBURSEMENTS.

For ordinary expenses for 1872, the Diet has appropriated for—

	Riksdalers.
Royal household	1, 417, 000 00
Department of justice	2, 532, 500 00
Foreign affairs	603, 800 00
War department	9, 994, 500 00
Navy department	4, 068, 500 00
Civil, (interior)	7, 704, 100 00
Finance	7, 329, 700 00
Ecclesiastical, including education	5, 664, 700 00
Pensions and retired list	1, 530, 200 00
	40, 845 000 00

For extraordinary expenses 1872, the Diet appropriated for—

Department of justice	100, 000 00
War Department	4, 113, 639 85
Navy Department	920, 000 00
Civil, (for railways)	4, 450, 700 00
Finance	143, 100 00
Church and school, (ecclesiastical)	439, 400 00
Pensions and retired list	428, 000 00
Total	10, 524, 839 85
Total	51, 469, 839 85
To which add interest on public debt	5, 000, 000 00
Grand total	56, 469, 839 85
	$15, 058, 623 00

V. PUBLIC DEBT.

Amount, 119,352,686.67 riksdalers, ($31,827,115.) A statement of the debt of Sweden is annexed, and marked C. The Diet of 1871 authorized the issue of 9,000,000 riksdalers of bonds of the forty-million loan in 1871 and 1872. A peculiar feature about this debt is, that it has been contracted almost wholly for railroads, which the loans have built, and are, for the most part, the property of the state. It is unnecessary to say that the securities of Sweden stand well in the market. The population of Sweden, December 31, 1869, was 4,158,757.

VI. GENERAL REMARKS.

No inconsiderable amount of the taxation in Sweden is for local purposes, such as the support of schools for the lower classes and the care of the poor. The receipts from the exclusively poor tax in Stockholm, for example, for the year 1867, were 481,644.49 riksdalers. The number of persons exempted from payment of taxes is as follows: Soldiers of the regular army, 3,924; on account of poverty, men, 147,335; women, 252,018; together, 399,403; on account of under or over age, males, 815,176; females, 807,201.

While it will be remarked how large a sum is appropriated for military purposes by a country whose relations with all other states are amicable, and which it would seem could by no reasonable possibility become involved in war, it is to be borne in mind that a still further tax is imposed on the people for the maintenance of the national or Indelta army, numbering about 30,000. This expenditure for the most part does not appear in the budget; the soldiers being directly supported by the agricultural population on the proportion of one soldier to fifteen farms. The Indelta soldiers perform military duty during the most of May and June each year, which, of course, is when the time of the agriculturist is precious. The abolition of the institution is a matter which is considerably agitated.

There are seldom any defalcations by collectors or holders of the public funds. The revenue officers, though paid small salaries, hold during good behavior, and, perhaps on that account, are less tempted to misconduct. (For some information as to stamp duties, fees, &c., see report of ex-Consul Thomas, p. 358, Commercial Relations, 1864; as to the Indelta, ex-Minister Bartlett's No. 24, Diplomatic Correspondence, 1865, 2,104.)

A.

The bevillning, or general tax law of Sweden, annually enacted by the Diet.

[Translation from the Swedish, with explanatory remarks.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Stockholm, June 7, 1871.

Collection of Swedish statutes, 1853, No. 65. (To be read from the chair.)

His Royal Majesty's gracious notification concerning the common tax (bevillning) voted by the ordinary diet of the year 1868. ("Bevillning" originally as supplementary tax or aid to cover a deficit in the ordinary resource of the state.)

Dated at the palace, Stockholm, September 8, 1868.

We, Charles, by the grace of God, King of Sweden, Norway, the Goths, and the Vandals, to all to whom these presents shall come send greeting :

Whereas the Diet at its last session, after having examined the wants of the state, has undertaken a general tax for the year 1869 of 2,600,000 riksdaler rix mynt; and whereas by a petition in writing, bearing date the 15th of May last, the Diet has stated the alterations adopted by the Diet for its part in the existing statute of general taxes and in the instructions regarding the manner of assessing such taxes, and has prayed that we might be pleased for the government of every one to publish the said statute which, as altered by the Diet, is of the following tenor and contents, viz :

Tax of the Swedish Diet for the year 1869, and the years ensuing, up to the end of the year, in the course whereof another statute of taxes will have been established by the Diet.

ARTICLE I.—Personal protection tax.

§ 1. Every individual entered in the lists of taxable persons, (mantals lüngd,) and chargeable according to existing laws with poll-money, is liable to pay a tax for individual protection, as follows : a man, 40 öre ; a woman, 20 öre.

ARTICLE II.—(A).—Tax on real property.

§ 2. For every real estate situated in the kingdom, except those belonging to the government, the owner shall pay a tax proportionate to the assessed value thereof.

The respective tenant is liable to pay tax: (a.) For crown lands and parcels of such lands held by heritable tenure. (b.) For lands, parcels of lands, and messuages or separate buildings belonging to the government, and which either are allotted to public officers for their residence or as part of their income, or else held on lease for life.

This tax is raised.

1st. On landed property at the rate of three öre ($\frac{3}{100}$ of a cent) for every even sum of hundred riksdalers, \$26 48 of the assessed value.

2d. For real property of any other description, at the rate of five öre for every even sum of hundred riksdalers of the assessed value. From this tax the following are exempted: communities, (parishes,) academies, (universities,) scientific associations, public schools, and charitable institutions, for buildings belonging to them and to corporations of military officers, and erected on regiment camps, and used during the time of the yearly encampments, and also churches and oratories belonging to private individuals, still upon the understanding that such buildings do not yield any revenue to their owners by way of lease or otherwise: in the contrary case those buildings shall be assessed according to the respective amount of revenue, and shall be chargeable with tax at the respective rates stipulated above. Further, proprietors of canals, railways, and other highways are exempt from tax for the land occupied by the canal or the way, and also for their works and structures, (they are not exempt from income tax.)

Frilseriänta (or quitrent) land is also considered as a real estate of the kind mentioned in section 2 of this paragraph.

§ 3. Every real estate shall be estimated at the actual value thereof, ascertained by means of purchase agreements, leases, amount of rents, valuations made with a view to mortgaging such estate, or insuring the same against fire, together with other statements given or informations obtained relatively to the nature and the revenue of each separate estate; in which respect the enactments contained in the instructions issued concerning the mode of assessing taxes are to be strictly complied with.

The capital value of a quitrent is to be estimated at twenty times the sum to which the same rent amounted according to the government rates of the year next preceding, unless the rent, pursuant to § 14 in the royal statute of May 11, 1855, is payable at average rates, ("marhegångspris" rates, fixing for every year the cash price of rents reserved in kind,) which in such event shall form the basis in calculating the amount of the quitrent. Still, it is understood that the principal value of quitrent is always to be calculated in even amounts of riksdalers, and accordingly any excess of öre shall not be counted, unless it exceeds 50 öre, in which latter case the same is counted for one full riksdaler.

§ 4. In estimating real estates, separate values are to be assessed: (a.) In towns, for the building ground, the buildings thereon, and the land, if any, applied to agriculture; (b.) In the country, for every separate estate, ("heman,") or any parcel of such estate with separate ownership, and every tenement separated forever or for certain periods from the manor to which it originally appertained, and also for such buildings as are not used for purposes connected with agriculture, or as are erected on country-seats or other smaller places of a like description, so as to form the essential value of such country-seats or places.

§ 5. The tax chargeable on any real estate is to be assessed and paid at the place where the estate is situated, and account therefor to be rendered at the same place by the collector.

B.—Tax on income from capital or labor.

§ 6. On any income from capital, as well as labor, a tax shall be paid at the rate of one per cent. of the net proceeds of the income.

As income of capital are considered interest of money lent out, or vested in bonds bearing interest, or deposited with banks or banking establishments or with individuals, also interest and such profit as cannot be included in the denomination income from labor. As income of labor are considered any income accruing from trade, profession, service, or office, as profit by mining, with all works, trades, and establishments belonging thereto; by corn and saw mills, factories, machine-manufactories, distilleries, and other works for making or improving merchandise and commodities; by banking, commercial and ship-owners' business, navigation, and any craft or trade not relative to agriculture; by canals, railroads, and other highways opened to public traffic; the profit earned from the exercise of any science, art, or handiwork over and above the expenses connected therewith; wages, appointments, salaries, and allowances, fees, or any other benefit from public service or private employment, and pensions, yearly gratuities, life-annuities, and reserved uses in real property, ("undantages-förmåner.")

Officers or functionaries belonging to the diplomatic legation of Sweden and Norway in foreign countries, or else employed in the foreign department, are chargeable with income tax in Sweden for such part of their salaries as is equal to the contribution of the Swedish government to the same salaries.

The lessees of such real estates of the government as are exempted from tax, in pursuance of § 2, are liable to pay tax for the income earned by them from the said leases.

§ 9. Basis for calculation of income.—1st. As regards the income from capital or labor whereon tax is levied, no deduction is allowed for the maintenance of the taxable individual and of his family, nor for any expenses falling under that head.

2d. In the income for which tax is payable by individuals enjoying salaries, wages, fees, allowances, &c., &c., shall not be included: income of salaried officers from places or lands appointed for their residence, and for which places or lands the tenant has already been charged with land-tax; nor that part of the pay of officers in the national army which forms the revenue from such places and lands of the last-mentioned description as are let out on lease through the respective board of management, and for which land-tax is paid; nor any amount granted for defraying special expenses connected with the performance of public offices or commissions, such as traveling expenses, fees for attendance at any other place than the usual place of residence of the functionary or other party attending, fees or allowance for ordered military service out or away from the respective station, pay for active service in time of war, fees on allowance to members of the Diet, or auditors when acting at other places than their habitual place of residence, the "provost tithes" of the clergy, ("prostelunaor," out of the tithe-corn one tub of corn is generally deducted in every parish for the benefit of the respective ecclesiastical provost, originally as a remuneration for trouble in collecting the tithes, and the indemnity paid to certain military officers in the national army for want of dwelling-houses at their official seats of residence.

Deduction is likewise allowed for the following expenses, to wit: the payments incumbent on functionaries, in their official capacity, to pension-funds or funds for the support of widows, children, or others, wages or other remuneration to substitutes or assistants, the duties (perpetual) imposed on the clergy under the denominations of "Gården" and "Taxen," ("Gården," contribution toward defraying expenses of war "Taxen," imposts payable by clergymen for immunity from the duty of lodging soldiers in their houses,) payments for interest and amortization to the fund for reimbursement of costs incurred on parsonages in the province of Scania, in constructing buildings beyond the extent enacted by law, (in the said province parsons are bound to build houses on their parsonages or to redeem those already existing, but they are entitled to reimbursement therefor from their successors, and in order to facilitate such reimbursement, in most instances causing a heavy outlay of capital, a special fund has been established for the purpose of advancing the necessary money;) the deductions made from the salaries of provincial governors and military officers to cover payments for interest and amortization to the sinking-fund for abolishing agreements respecting succession in office, ("achordsamortering," formerly public functionaries, generally paid, before entering in office, to the predecessors or to their heirs, certain sums of money as fixed by agreement;) and traveling expenses in the performance of official duties if indemnity therefor, has not been specially fixed.

3. Incomes by mining, manufacture, commercial and shipping business, and any craft, trade, or profession, as well as extraordinary or not fixed incomes of public functionaries, are assessed for the current year, and are generally to be computed according to the circumstances during the year next preceding.

Wages totally or partially consisting of the produce of crown rents, ("indeltälöner,") or otherwise payable in grain or in kind, shall be computed in cash according to the last government rates of the respective places.

In computing the net income from capital or work, the commissioners will for the rest have to comply with the enactments and special provisions in such respect, contained in the above-named instructions regarding the manner of assessing taxes.

§ 8. Exceptions from the provisions contained in the sixth section.—Income from capital or work is not charged with tax, if the total yearly incomes of the ratable individual be less than 400 riksdalers, and should they not exceed 1,800 riksdalers, an amount of 300 riksdalers of the incomes by capital or work shall be exempted from tax.

Whenever a husband and his wife carry on separate trades or business, the before-mentioned immunity or modification shall be computable according to the aggregate amount of their incomes.

The following are further exempted from income tax:

(a.) The state, churches, academies, or scientific associations, the iron office, while the profits of this institution are applied to public benefit, ("jener-kontoret," an establishment for the encouragement and the support of the iron trade,) the provincial agricultural societies, public schools, and establishments for instruction, stipend funds, (for the support of poor students, young artists, &c.), pensioning funds, infirmaries and poor-houses, as well as other charitable institutions; savings-banks, towns, and communities; however, for wages, appointments, pensions, &c., paid out of the funds of the establishments and institutions enumerated above, income tax is to be levied on the individuals enjoying the same, at the rates fixed with respect to other persons enjoying wages or remunerations of like description. Further income tax shall also be charged on the net proceeds, which, during vacancies of ecclesiastical officers, devolve, by virtue of existing regulations, to funds under the management of the consistories of this kingdom, and, also, on advowsons, ("pateonj ecclesiarum," in Scania, Halland, and Bohuslän, who are entitled to obtain corn from this due to the crown or to the church, and likewise on such title belonging to churches in the said provinces as is not applied toward defraying salaries, or other ordinary expenditures, and on the cathedrals of the kingdom, for their revenue in corn or ground-rents, after deduction having been made only for such specially appointed ordinary salaries for which the individuals receiving the salaries are chargeable with tax, as provided before by the sixth section of the present article.

(b.) Members of the royal family, for the revenue appointed by the state and for income from capital.

(c.) The officers or functionaries holding employments in the Swedish and Norwegian legations abroad, or else belonging to the foreign department, for such part of their salaries as is equal to the contribution of the Norwegian government to the same salaries, and also the persons belonging to the legations and consulates of foreign powers in Sweden, together with their servants, unless they are Swedish subjects, or carry on mercantile business or other trade in this country.

(d.) Foreigners, staying in Sweden solely as travelers, and who do not carry on any trade in this country, nor are engaged in the service of the state, of a community, or of a Swedish subject.

§ 9. Income tax for capital or labor is assessed at the places mentioned below, viz, on banking companies at the place or places, one or more, where their business is principally carried on, and in default of such fixed places, where the board of directors have their seat.

On manufactures, merchants, or other tradesmen, where the manufactory is situated, or the business or trade is principally carried on; still, merchants in towns comprising more than one parish are, as regards their business in such towns, liable to pay tax in the parish where they are entered in the register of taxable individuals.

On owners of shares in vessels at the place where the managing owner is taxable, or in default of such managing owner in the port to which the vessel belongs.

On persons living abroad who are pensioned by the Swedish government or by a public establishment, at the place where the pension is paid; on any other individual liable to pay tax at the place where he or she is registered as a taxable individual.

§ 10. For income assessed at another place than that where the respective person is registered in the list of taxable individuals, as well as for the income of any company, no immunity or reduction according to § 8 is granted.

ARTICLE III.—(A).—Tax chargeable on freehold estate.

§ 11. Besides the land tax payable on real property according to the assessed value thereof, as provided by the second article, the following duty shall continually, as heretofore, be raised on frank fees, ["frälse egendern," freeholds "demeniam plenum," landed estates are so called when the property in the soil "deminium funds" as well as the use or rent thereof "deminium fructus," is jointly vested in a private owner, and not in the Crown; they enjoy certain immunities in consideration, among others, of the knight or horse service, "rusttjenst," incumbent on the estates. However, as such immunities were found too great, especially when the said service was not performed, a separate tax was stipulated in the year 1719, and has been but slightly altered since that year,] viz, thirty öre for every "rusttjenst mark," according to, filed and correct knight-service-roll, and to the land-roll of the province where the estate is situated ["rusttjenst mark," the value expressed in the old coin marks, and fixed at very low rates of a few specified articles, given among others, as rent by the tenant, "rusttjenst persedlae."]

One-half of the said duty or tax ceases whenever the service is actually performed, and no such duty is raised on mansion lands and messuages, ("säterier" och "ladergårdern,") nor on freeholds belonging to the Danvichs hospital, ["säteri," lord's seat or manor place; land where the lord of the manor resided within his fee, still the most privileged kind of landed property. "Ladugård," literally signifying farm-yard and buildings, is a pauk message annexed to the mansion land for the benefit of the same, and it enjoys like immunities. "Danviks Hospital," a charitable institution near Stockholm, possessing a number of pauk farms at several places.] Franktenements, the rent whereof is not reserved in such specified articles ("rusttjenst persedlar") as formed the basis in fixing the number of troopers to be furnished, or which are not entered in the knight service-roll, are, in assessing the said duty, assimilated to the nearest adjoining freeholds of a comparable nature; but the following duties are raised on franktenements situated out of the parish of the manor place, viz: On those in Scania five riksdaler, thirty-one öre, and in Bleking five riksdaler, and in Halland and Bohus-län four riksdaler, eighty-four öre, all for every entire reduced "mantal," and proportionally for parcels of such estate.

The frank farms situated within the boundaries of or in the same parish as a manor place pay only the half of the duty fixed for such estates when situate out of the parish, and they enjoy, in case troopers are furnished, the same deduction as that stipulated above.

For small estates of freehold tenure in Seania, Halland, Bleching, and Bohuslän, which are entered in the land-roll, fifty-three öre are payable for every tub of "hard corn" of the ground-rent fixed thereon. "Hemman," home of a man, a landed estate forming by itself an independent possession. "Lägenhet," an appurtenance of such an estate from which it has been separated. "Mantal," "number of men," signifies a piece of land sufficient to afford the means of subsistence to a farmer's family, and a surplus necessary for paying ground-rent and other taxes. A "hemman" consists of one or more mantal, or fractions thereof. "Hartkorn" is a Danish term, signifying almost the same as the Swedish "mantal."

(B.)—Tax on post and pilot estates.

§ 12. For post and pilot estates [crown lands held under the obligation to convey post and to furnish pilots] which are exempted from the duty of providing foot-soldiers or sailors for the navy and from carriage for the wants of the Crown, a special tax is payable at the rate of three riksdaler for every entire "mantal," and at a proportional rate for the smaller estates, which tax, however, does not apply to the estates exempted only from the said carriage.

§ 13. For the right of cutting wood in such commons belonging to the Crown as are toward a certain duty allotted to the use of iron-works, smelting-houses, or mines, a tax of twenty-five öre is raised on each cord or stack of wood, ["stafrum," 27 cubic feet,] or on the corresponding quantity of eighteen tubs of charcoal; and this tax is levied, whether the said right of cutting wood is made use of or not, on the quantity of wood or charcoal for which the said duty [3 to 6 öre for the above-named quantities of wood or charcoal] is payable in each year, according to privileges or decisions.

§ 14. For the right of taking charcoal in district or parish commons, whenever the respective district or parish does not obtain payment therefor equal to the said tax, together with the duty which, according to the regulation of the year 1752, is paid for the use of Crown forests and commons, the tax shall be increased so as to render the (total) payment equal to what is paid for the use of the Crown forests.

(D.)—Tax on banking companies entitled to issue bank notes.

§ 15. Every private bank entitled to issue bank notes pays, besides the tax stipulated by the second article, a duty of two riksdaler for every sum of thousand riksdaler of the highest amount in bank notes which circulated at the same time during the year next preceding; and, in order to afford due information for the proper assessment of this duty, the board of directors to any such bank are bound, in the beginning of every year, to deliver a statement showing the said amount of bank notes, which statement shall be verified by the commission appointed by the respective provincial government.

§ 16. Any foreigner who travels about in the country, and who, on his own behalf or, as agent for others, offers for sale or contracts for the sale of foreign commodities, is bound, on his arrival in this kingdom, to deliver to the nearest collector of Crown taxes in the respective town a declaration in writing stating how long he intends to remain here, and on the same occasion he shall pay 100 riksdaler for the right of carrying on such business during a period not exceeding three months. If he desires to exercise the same right after the expiration of the before-mentioned period, he is further bound to pay in advance a monthly tax of 40 riksdaler, payable either at once for a longer period, or at least for one month at each time, but in every case for full months, unto the collector of Crown taxes in a town situate within the county (län) where he stays at the time of payment. Receipts for such payment are delivered on printed forms, which, on demand, are sent in by the national-debt office (Riksgäldskontoret) to the county or provincial governments, to be held by them at the disposal of the collectors of Crown taxes residing in the towns. The said printed forms, issued part for 100 riksdaler and part for 40 riksdaler each, shall contain a memorandum referring to the enactments of existing regulations with regard to such kind of trade.

Should it be found that a foreigner offers for sale, or sells, foreign goods without having previously paid the fixed tax, he becomes liable to pay a fine of 500 riksdaler, besides the tax. Infringements of these provisions shall be submitted to trial before the police court, if there exists any at the place, or else before a common court, and the imposed fines are to be divided in equal shares between the accuser and the poor.

The collectors will have to pay the tax money so raised under the head "Tax paid by foreign merchants and traveling clerks" to the provincial treasury in the same manner as other funds collected for the account of the State; and returns of the blank receipts obtained and employed shall at the end of every year be sent in to the provincial government which will have to examine the same and to attest the correctness thereof; whereupon the returns are to be sent in to the national-debt office before the end of the month of January in the year then next ensuing, in order to be compared with the returns of the provincial treasuries and finally delivered to the royal board of the exchequer, where they are referred to in examining the accounts.

Respecting the blank receipts sent from the national-debt office to the provincial government, and which shall remain in the custody of the provincial treasuries until they are handed to the collectors, proper returns shall likewise be sent in to the said office before the end of the month of January in every year.

The provisions contained in the present paragraph relative to the special tax payable by foreign merchants and foreign traveling agents, do not apply to Norwegian subjects trading in Norwegian produces.

(E.)—Tax payable by foreigners for concerts and dramatic or other performances.

§ 17. Any foreign man or woman, who, with the permission of the proper authority on his or her own account and for money, gives a concert or other musical, theatrical, or equestrian performance, or exhibits rope-dancing, juggling, cosmoramas, panoramas, or other optical and artificial works, cabinets of wax figures, and of natural curiosities, or zoological collections, and so forth, shall pay for every separate concert, or for every day when plays or other performances are given at Stockholm or Gothenburg, 3 riksdaler, and elsewhere in the kingdom, 1 riksdaler 50 öre. Before the permission is granted every such player, stage-manager, artist, or exhibitor is bound to prove either that the fixed tax for the respective period or occasion has been fully paid, or that approved security therefor has been lodged with the proper collector; and in the latter case the tax due for every month shall be fully paid before the expiration of the same month. At the time when such payment is made, the party liable to make payment shall hand to the collector a certificate issued in a town or city by the proper public accuser, and in a borough or in the country by the Crown bailiff, showing the number of concerts given or of the days of performance or exhibition, which certificates ought to accompany the account for the taxes paid to be rendered by the collector. Moreover, the collector's receipt for the tax paid for the last performance given in the kingdom shall, before a new permission is granted, be produced by every such foreigner when arriving at another place with the same intention.

For the purpose of controlling the due payment of the tax in question, it is incumbent on the public officers mentioned above, at the end of every six months to state in writing to the proper provincial or county government how many performances of the said description have been given there during such period, or if no such performance has taken place likewise to give notice thereof; and further the collectors are bound, before the end of the month of January in the following year, to send in to the proper local government an account for the taxes of the said kind paid in the course of the preceding year; which accounts and returns shall accompany the Crown tax accounts when sent in to the board of the exchequer.

(G.)—Tax on gifts, wills, entails, inheritances and treasure-trove.

§ 18. 1.—For gift of real estate with absolute title property in the estate a tax of 1 per cent. is paid.

2. For wills of real or personal estate, or of capital or claims, with entire property in the estate or capital, a tax of one per cent. is payable.

3. For entailed estates (Fide Kommiss) is paid, by every one who succeeds to or takes possession of such entailed estate or capital, one per cent. of the common (bevilling) tax.

4. From payment of the taxes provided in the foregoing three sections, are exempted: (a) Surviving husband or wife; (b) Relation in direct ascending or descending line, and brothers and sisters or their descendants; (c) Any other more distant heir for his legal hereditary share, and also for any amount given over and above the said share, provided that such excess does not reach the principal sum of 1,000 riksdaler; (d) Churches, universities, scientific associations, public schools, and other public establishments for instruction, funds for paying stipends or pensions, infirmaries or poor-houses, and other institutions of a philanthropic character; also (e) every one whenever the value of the estate or capital does not amount to 1,000 riksdaler.

5. For inheritance of real or personal estate which does not go to relatives in a direct ascending or descending line, brothers and sisters or their descendants, but to remote heirs there is payable 1 per cent. on the common (bevilning) tax where the inheritance amounts to 1,000 riksdaler.

§ 19. On payment of taxes for gifts, wills, entails or inheritances, the value of real estate is computed at the rate fixed at the last assessment of common tax, and the personal estate is estimated according to inventory, arbitration, or decision of the court of justice.

Whenever an entail falls to a person who by virtue of section 3 in § 18 is liable to pay tax for the same, the new donee or holder is bound within twelve months from taking possession of the entail, either to pay the fixed tax to the proper collector, or if a law-suit has been commenced respecting the right of entail, to give a good and approved security for the payment of the tax not later than one year from the decision of the law suit, by a judgment valid in law; in failure whereof the defaulter is subject to a fine of 10 per cent. of the amount of the tax to the benefit of the accuser.

With respect to the enforcement of the due computation and payment of, and account for, all taxes for gifts, wills, and inheritances the provisions embodied in a separate statute are to be complied with.

§ 20. For found property a tax shall be paid at the rate of 1 per cent. of the value if amounting to 1,000 riksdaler. However, such found articles as have an historic or antiquarian interest are exempted therefrom.

(H.)—Tax for playing-cards.

§ 21. Besides the common tax provided for the net proceeds of the business of any manufacture, playing-cards are subject to stamp duty, as enacted by a special statute.

(I.)—Tax on newspapers and periodicals.

§ 22. The stamp duty provided by a separate statute for newspapers and other periodicals is likewise payable without deduction from the common tax to which publishers and editors are subjected by virtue of the present statute.

(K.)—Tax for grants of honorary official titles and dignities.

§ 23. [This section contains provisions of but little interest and importance concerning a yearly tax payable by the holders of honorary titles and dignities. This tax amounts to 10 and in some instances 6 per cent. of the stamp to be put on the letters-patent and other deeds conferring the same titles and dignities; minimum tax 4 riksdaler 50 öre.]

§ 24. The special tax on banks provided by the present article is charged and paid in the town where the bank or its head office is established. The tax on legacies or inheritances is paid either at the last place of assessment of the individual leaving the property bequeathed or inherited, or at the place where an approved security or bail for the payment of the tax has been put in.

The tax on entailed property is raised at the place where the same property exists or at any other place where such bail for the tax has been delivered.

Therefore * * * we have judged proper to ratify and confirm the foregoing statute of taxes.

The palace of Stockholm, September 8, 1868.

B.

ITEMS OF THE ORDINARY RECEIPTS.

1. "Ordinarie ränta."—The ordinary tax which from the earliest times was imposed on land in Sweden, under the name of "grund ränta," or "jordeboks ränta," on the theory that the title to all the soil was in the sovereign.

The system had its first organization during the reign of Gustavus (1) Vasa, 1521–1560, when the taxes on landed estates were entered in the land-books or rolls under the head of "ränta." The tax was payable in kind till the law of May 11, 1855, made it payable principally in money. For over a century it has been denominated "ordinarie ränta." The amount of tax of this nature which each estate had to pay was in most cases fixed centuries ago by local boards of five officers each, consisting of the steward or collector of taxes, judicial clerk, the surveyor, and two sworn peasants. A county was divided, as still is the case, into from four to six districts, each of which had a board of these officers (Fögderi) for such purpose. They determined the annual average amount of produce of each estate, which amount remained fixed. The value of the produce is annually determined according to the average value for the ten years preceding. The annual tax therefore varies according to the rise or fall in the value of produce.

Estates which were the seats of the nobility were entirely exempt from this tax on the ground that the proprietor was bound to render personal military service. These latter estates were denominated "ypperligst frälse," (select frälse or freeholds,) and according to a report of a committee of the Diet in 1864, the taxable value of them all was in 1862, 212,274,828 riksdaler.

The "allmant frälse," (common frälse,) which according to said report were of the value of 374,496,774 riksdaler, are privileged estates which pay a small "ordinarie ränta;" while the unprivileged originally peasant lands on which the burden has principally fallen, were valued at 1,203,872,945 riksdaler. As a trifling equivalent for exemption from "ordinarie ränta," the frälse estates were, since the year 1719, required to pay a military tax called "rusttjänst bevilling," the whole amount of which is 70,000 riksdaler per annum.

The report of the committee above referred to cites numerous examples of the inequality of the "ordinarie ränta" tax, a few of which are as follows:

County, or län.	Taxable value of estate in 1862 in riksdaler.	Amount of ränta tax charged upon the farm in riksdaler.	County, or län.	Taxable value of estate in 1862 in riksdaler.	Amount of ränta tax charged upon the farm in riksdaler.
Upsala	8,000	427.07	Cällnar	15,300	102.25
	8,000	102.36	Jönköping	98,000	129.70
	28,000	590.91		7,200	134.81
Stockholm	16,000	427.22	Christianstad	50,000	42.08
	39,000	83.93		10,000	2.40
Södermanlands	10,000	358.07	Malmö	113,000	29.99
	14,000	22.96		37,700	6.64
Cällnar	96,000	160.19

These examples serve to show the artificial and inequitable nature of the system. Its reform or abolition constitutes one of the prominent political questions of the day in Sweden. Annual receipts from the tax, 4,800,000 riksdaler.

2. "Tiondensemial," (tithe of grain,) or "kronostionde," (crown tithe.)—It appears from the old laws that the tithe contribution was first enacted at the Diet of Skenenge in 1864. The priest generally took one-third of the tithe, and the other two-thirds were divided between the church, the bishop, and the poor. This comprised the so-called field tithe. But besides this there went to the priest the whole of the rate tithe, also the tithe of shoal and net fish, of birds and "grey pelts;" also a yearly "mat-skatt" subsistence on certain church days, of every peasant landholder. After the year 1539 the tithe was paid into the state's treasury and designated as the crown tithe. In 1600 it was enacted that the priest should take his third of the tithe to his own barn and have it thrashed himself, but that the other two-thirds should be thrashed by the peasant. In 1739 this tax was considerably reduced and became a tithe only in name. Since 1855 it has been payable in money instead of in kind, and is an absolute charge on estates whether crops are raised or not. It is fixed in the same manner as the "ränta" and is similar to that in respect to its arbitrary and unequal nature. Annual receipts from, 1,600,000 riksdaler.

3. "Ärendemedel af kungagårdar och andra krondlägenheter."—Tenancy means from the King's farms and other crown lands.—These farms and lands, though called the King's, are in no sense his individual property. The rent is paid annually into the state treasury under leases granted at auction, for a term of years, to the highest bidder. The principal part of the rent is paid in grain. Total receipts annually 416,000 riksdaler.

4. "Silfvertionde," (tithe of silver.)—In 1649 one-tenth of the product was paid to the government; but by the law of 1831 it was reduced to one-thirtieth. Annual amount received, 15,000 riksdaler.

5. "Kopparränta," (tax on copper.)—In 1649 one-tenth of manufacture paid to the government. June 21, 1831, reduced to one-thirtieth. Annual amount derived, 75,000 riksdaler.

6. "Svafvelbruks tionde," (tithe of sulphur.)—The statutes of 1649 and 1723 provided that a tenth of the manufacture of sulphur should be paid to the Crown. The act of June 21, 1831, reduced the tax to one-thirtieth of the manufacture. The amount derived annually is 3,000 riksdaler.

7. Tionde tackjern, (pig-iron tithe).—Annual receipts 40,000. The value of the product of pig-iron in Sweden in the year 1869 was 17,183,305.70 riksdaler, so it can be seen the tax is nominal and exceptional. An act of the Diet of 1871 discontinues it after the year 1872.

8. Mantals pennengar, (number of men or poll-money).—A personal tax which originated in 1605, when, for the outfit of soldiers, the government imposed on peasants, their wives, and every person on the premises from sixteen to sixty years of age, one öre each per month. In 1609 the Diet imposed on the unnooble classes a marriage tax of six marks for every marriage. In 1625, to help sustain the wars of Gustavus Adolphus, a tax was laid on grain which was carried to mills to be ground, viz: for 1 tunna (1 bushels) oats, 2 öre; 1 tunna of barley or malt, 3 öre; 1 tunna of peas, 6 öre; 1 tunna of rye, 8 öre; 1 tunna of wheat, 12 öre, &c. It was in some instances resisted, and a miller in Upsala was beheaded. The tax was evaded by the use of hand-mills at home, whereupon the Diet, in 1627, imposed a personal tax of 1 mark on every person of the peasantry, or farming class, over twelve years of age. The "mantals pennengar" tax of 12 to 16 öre began to be enforced in certain districts, including Finland, in 1634, and in 1635 amounted to 167,476 riksdaler. The mill or toll tax yielded in 1632, 87,251 riksdaler. It was then discontinued and the "mantals pennengar" tax increased to three marks (half a riksdaler) for every person. It so continued until 1652, when the ages of those liable to pay it were fixed at over sixteen and under sixty-three. In 1741 the ages were fixed at seventeen to sixty-three years, and again in 1857 fixed at eighteen to sixty years. The nobility were originally exempted from its payment, but paid it from 1622 to 1640, when they were again exempted, and so continued until 1810. The tax at present amounts to 630,000 riksdaler, ($168,000.) It is paid by men with 40 öre, women 20 öre.

9. Botes medel.—Proceeds of fines, annual amount, 170,000 riksdaler.

10. "Kavalleri-Regementenas häst vakaus spannmål."—Certain indelta or national militia regiments which do not provide horses but pay money instead. Tax on the farms which support the indelta soldiers. Annual receipts, 300,000 riksdaler.

11. Till fältiga rote vakans afgifter.—Payment for accidental soldier vacancy or deficiency. Tax on farms which should furnish a soldier. Amount, 7,500 riksdaler.

12. Vakans afgifter af ni roterad joid.—Farms that were not included in the original list of those that should furnish a soldier, (indelta), and which now pay money instead. The tax originally was 3 riksdaler banco for each man. Annual receipts, 100,000 riksdaler.

13. "Rote vakans afgifter af utsoekne fälse heman i Halland."—Commutation of the furnishing a soldier by former privileged farms in Halland County. The tax was imposed in 1847. The tax is two-thirds of the cost of maintaining a man. Annual receipts, 24,000 riksdaler.

14. Rote vakans afgifter af bergs layer.—Payment of soldier deficiency in the mining districts. Receipts, 18,000 riksdaler.

15. Toss passercollans afgifter.—Tax for transportation on land-owners (who furnish indelta mounted men) in lieu of actual transportation. Receipts, 26,000 riksdaler.

16. Batmansvakans afgifter.—Tax for exemption in supplying seamen. Seamen for the navy are furnished on the same principle as the indelta in the army. Owners of land adjoining the sea, also some towns, have to furnish seamen. In the country the men are actually furnished, and are provided with a "torp" (small homestead.) This tax in money is paid by real-property holders in towns. Annual receipts, 70,000 riksdaler.

17. Kontroll stäm pelmedel.—Fees for stamping gold and silver manufactures. Every article of silver or gold manufactured in Sweden must be stamped by a government officer. Amount of the fees annually, 12,000 riksdaler.

18. Fyr och båk medel.—Marine light and beacon fees. Fees paid by shippers. A vessel coming from abroad, whether domestic or foreign, pays 50 öre per läst. Annual receipts, 600,000 riksdaler.

19. Telegr af medel.—Receipts from telegraphs. There are eight thousand miles of telegraph lines in Sweden belonging to the state. The tariff for ten words any distance over the lines is 1 riksdaler, (28 cents.) Receipts, 800,000 riksdaler, which cover all expenses.

20. Jern vägstrafik medel.—Receipts from the staterailways annually, 7,000,000 riksdaler.

21. Skogs medel.—Receipts from forests. The Swedish forests are carefully preserved. They are granted for a term not exceeding fifty years, at $5 per acre, but no trees are allowed to be cut which are less than ten inches in diameter. Receipts, 400,000 riksdaler.

22. Öberrations medel.—Payments on auditors' reports for items erroneously booked in public accounts. Amount, 2,000 riksdaler.

23. Extra medel och uppbörder.—Extra means and collections. Amount, 70,000 riksdaler.

24. Intusse medel.—Interest. Amount, 5,000 riksdaler.

No. 116.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Stockholm, July 24, 1871. (Received August 18.)

SIR: Having in my No. 100, of March 20, submitted to the Department some remarks on the diffusion by the General Land Office of information as to the means of acquiring and methods of cultivating homesteads on the public lands with a view to promote immigration, I now take the liberty to offer a few suggestions respecting the best means for increasing immigration from Europe to the older States, and more particularly to the Southwestern and Southern States.

The plan, in brief, which I recommend is the preparation by State authority of a pamphlet setting forth the resources and opportunities in the State for immigrants, and its circulation in those countries from whence immigrants are desired.

1. The preparation of the pamphlet, its size, contents, &c., in my judgment should be published by authority of the State interested so as to have full official weight, which latter goes far in Europe. The very best, most experienced, and most practical talent should be employed in its preparation. It should be candid and brief, say not over forty pages in length. The more pains taken with it the briefer it can be made. Voluminous documents are not read by the masses; and, besides, postage in Europe on printed matter is high. For example, the postage here in Sweden on the recently issued special report on immigration by the chief of the Bureau of Statistics—a document of 258 octavo pages—is 20 cents in gold.

It must not be too general. The sensible man intending so grave a step as abandoning his native country, crossing an ocean with his family and seeking a home in a strange land, desires facts; and mere “glittering generalities” will rather tend to excite his distrust than inspire his confidence. For a concise general description of a State, the sketch of North Carolina on page 176 of the report above referred to will almost answer as a model.

In the general description of the State the number of the population should be given, its area, elevation, geological characteristics, &c. To say it has a healthy or a salubrious climate is rather to state a conclusion than a fact. Let the facts be stated so that the reader can form a conclusion for himself. For instance, the writer should give the statistics of health and mortality of the principal geographical districts and the average temperature.

As to land, what proportion arable, cultivated, and uncultivated; what proportion swamp; what too hilly or rocky for field culture; what proportion timber, and the various kinds and usual size of each kind; the kind of rocks and springs.

As to the streams, whether sluggish or rapid, color of water, the kind of fish that inhabit them; to what extent the banks are high, to what extent low and subject to overflow.

Under the head of agriculture I would state the nature, quality, depth, and color of the soil; number of days in the year without frost; the principal crops raised; average yield per acre; quantity of seed required per acre; usual season of planting and of harvest; time required for the crop to mature; kind of cultivation; to what extent by manual labor, to what extent by machinery; average cost of production per acre; value of the crops in the market; usual place of market; a list and the cost of the live stock usually required for cultivation of an average-sized farm, (giving size of the farms;) a list and the cost of implements and tools (including chains and harness) necessary on such a farm. Localities where gardens or small farms can be cultivated with profit without the use of horses, mules, or oxen.

Under the head of dairy or stock-raising should be stated the number of tons of hay cut per acre, and value per ton; number of tons usually fed per head to stock during the season or winter; the usual kind of grass; the breed of cattle in use; the expense and profit of raising stock; statistics of butter and cheese making. That a stranger may get an idea of the appearance of the country, mention might be made of the manner in which dwellings and farm-houses are built, of the highways and fences, the vehicles most in use, &c. Of course those localities should be specified and more particularly described where land is obtainable by immigrants, and the terms given on which it can be obtained; also, where there is a demand for labor; the kinds and wages; usual number of working-hours per day; the cost of subsistence and living.

Suitable notice should be given of any special industry in the State, its capacity for development, &c.; whether any particular branch of agriculture, fruit-raising, the dairy, stock-raising, manufactures, lumbering, mining, fisheries, &c. The means of transportation by water, by railroad; also, freight charges. Statistics of taxation, and the financial condition and prospects of the State. Statistics of education. A familiar account of county and local government. The time in which a foreigner acquires political rights; his prospects socially and civilly; what property exempt from attachment and execution; rights of women, single and married. Such are the heads of some of the matter which I should think the pamphlet ought to contain. Inducements should, of course, be held out as much to men of capital as to those without capital. It would be desirable that a neat map of the State should accompany it; one which, while showing the topography and the political boundaries, should by colors show the present and future capabilities of the soil. I cannot but repeat, that such a pamphlet ought to be prepared only by a master-hand; by one who combines the careful industry of the statistician with the ample knowledge and views of the statesman. When once done it will answer, with a few easy additions from time to time, for many years.

2. Its circulation.—The most economical and thorough way to circulate it abroad is, in my opinion, for the State to employ some trustworthy person in the country or countries whence it is desired to procure immigrants. Let him keep, in a few newspapers of largest circulation among the industrial classes, a brief advertisement setting forth the prominent inducements for immigrants to the State in question, and that, on request being sent to him, he will mail, free of expense, to any person, a pamphlet published by authority containing full particulars.

The expense of employing a person who will devote his whole time to the business need not exceed $1,000 in any country in Europe, which would be more economical than sending an agent from the State. The expense of translating and printing the document would be inconsiderable. The cost of advertising and of postage could readily be estimated. The selection of a suitable person to circulate the pamphlet could be effected through the assistance of a diplomatic or consular officer of our Government, who could also, if it were desired, occasionally observe if the work was being faithfully performed.

Fruits of such an enterprise I should hardly suppose could be expected the first or even second year unless immigration from the field of operations had, to some extent, already taken place. The second year persons might be expected to be seen looking about the State, in order to report to colonies of people who had sent them out from Europe for that purpose. The stream of immigration once having turned toward the State, it would not be difficult to keep it up.

The sympathy and kindness shown to immigrants on their arrival, by the native population, will go as far towards making them contented as the physical advantages which the State affords. After immigration should have got well under way it would probably be advisable to establish a sort of home, at a suitable place in the State, where the poorer class could rest for a few days and get directions as to the locality to which they should proceed. Under proper management, the mere cost of subsisting immigrants at such a home need not exceed 20 cents a day per person, which is about the average cost of subsisting soldiers in the United States Army at the principal military stations.

Immigrants having been secured to the State, there remains something to be done to retain them and to increase their usefulness. It is not to be denied that large numbers of the peasantry of Europe who emigrate to our country carry with them excessive ignorance and traditionary superstition, and that they too often settle down in the unskillful routine which was habitual in their native land.

In our own country we see and long have seen a tendency to emigrate from State to State. Among too many this is caused by poverty and a spirit of discontent.

Professor Johnston, the Scotch agriculturalist and chemist, a candid and capable observer, who made a tour through the United States a few years ago, tells us that the system of agriculture as then practiced in the United States was one of exhaustion of the soil; that it was "far behind that of the best parts of England and Scotland;" that "with our then knowledge and methods we should, year by year, become less and less able to export wheat."

The dairy editor of the Rural New Yorker, in an address last year before the American Dairymen's Association, said it was a source of infinite disadvantage that farmers, as a class, are not educated in a correct system of farm accounts; and that not one in twenty could tell the actual cost of any farm product. It is unnecessary, however, to go into such matters here. It is enough to know that, in the great work of development in our country, many improvements remain to be adopted. The essential conditions of success, as well in agriculture as other occupations, are skill, industry, and prudence. How shall these three qualifications be made habitual in the greatest number? This is a question of practical statesmanship, the solution of which largely devolves on State governments, and is of special interest to those which invite immigrants. I cannot refrain from expressing the opinion that one of the steps toward development, which ought not to be delayed, is the establishment in each State of compulsory education. It will be a help in the development of our physical resources and in the development of a sound national spirit.

Your obedient servant,

C. C. ANDREWS.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Stockholm, November 16, 1871. (Received December 8.)

SIR: Referring to the No. 88 of September 25, of the Acting Secretary, authorizing the making of a translation of the constitutions of Sweden and Norway, I now have the honor to transmit herewith copies of such translations. That of Sweden embraces the act on the form of government, on representation, or the election and powers of the Diet, on the order of succession to the crown, and on the liberty of the press.

With the constitution of Norway is attached the act of union of the two kingdoms.

The translations have been made by competent persons. I have myself read and compared them with the original, in Swedish and Norwegian, and believe I can vouch for their correctness.

I also transmit a printed copy of each constitution in the original language. Both constitutions contain more ample guarantees of liberty than would perhaps be expected. The King, as a general thing, cannot remove from office without cause. The provisions for impeachment of high officials, the scrutiny of accounts by the legislature, as well as many other features, are striking.

I am, &c.,

C. C. ANDREWS.

[Inclosure 1.—Translation.]

THE CONSTITUTION OF SWEDEN.

- I. The form of government, (Sections 1 to 114.)
- II. Representation or election, and powers of the Diet, (Sections 1 to 82.)
- III. Order of succession to the crown, (Sections 1 to 9.)
- IV. On the liberty of the press, (Sections 1 to 5.)

THE CONSTITUTION OF SWEDEN.

THE LAW ON THE FORM OF GOVERNMENT.

Adopted by the estates of the kingdom and sanctioned by the King, June 6, 1809, at Stockholm; with the changes made therein by the King and the estates of the kingdom up to the Diet of 1865-'66, inclusive.

We, Charles, by the grace of God King of Sweden, of the Goths and Vandals, &c., &c., &c., heir of Norway, Duke of Schleswig-Holstein, of Stormarie and of Ditmarsen, Count of Oldenburg, and of Delmanhorst, &c., &c., make known: That having charged, with an unlimited and unreserved confidence, the estates of the kingdom to establish a new law on the form of government, which ought forever to secure the happiness and independence of the common country, we fulfill a duty dear to our heart and desired by us, in promulgating hereby this fundamental law, which, after mature deliberation, has been resolved upon and adopted unanimously by the estates of the kingdom now assembled, and has been delivered to us to-day in the hall of the throne, at the same time that, by a free and unanimous consent, these estates are come to offer us the crown and government of Sweden.

In yielding ourselves to their desire with the liveliest emotion, and a profound interest for the destinies of a nation which has given to us this never-to-be-forgotten proof of confidence and devotion, we have conceived a hope the surer in the success of our constant efforts to prepare the future happiness of the country, as, by the new law on the form of government, the reciprocal rights and duties, both for us and for our subjects, have been so clearly determined, that all, in maintaining the character sacred and the liberty of action of the royal power, assure to the Swedish people an equal liberty. Consequently, we do hereby accept, sanction, and confirm this law on the form of government, approved by the estates of the kingdom, such as follows, word for word:

We, the undersigned, the estates of the kingdom of Sweden, counts, bishops, barons, orders of the nobility, of the clergy, of the burghers and peasants, now assembled in general Diet, in our name and in that of our absent fellow-citizens, make known that we, deputies of the Swedish nation, being returned in consequence of the change of government, newly established and unanimously approved by us, in the right of providing through ourselves the future amelioration of the condition of the country, the adoption of a new constitution, are convened and have resolved, in abrogating the different fundamental laws more or less in force up to this day, viz: the law on the form of government of August 21, 1772; the act of union and of security of the 21st of February and of the 3d of April, 1789; the law on representation, of January 21, 1801, as well as all the other acts, laws, regulations, statutes, and decrees of the same nature, which have been comprised under the name of fundamental laws; of establishing for the kingdom of Sweden, and the subordinate countries, the following law on the form of government, which, to commence from this day, shall be in force as the principal fundamental law of the kingdom; reserving to us equally the right to establish other fundamental laws enumerated in section 85 of the present law on the form of government, before the closing of this Diet, and in the manner prescribed in the said section.

SECTION 1. The kingdom of Sweden shall be governed by a King; and shall be hereditary kingdom, according to the order of succession established by the law on the succession to the throne.

SECTION 2. The King must always profess the pure evangelical doctrine, such as is established and explained by the unalterable Confession of Augsburg, and the decision of the synod of Upsala, of the year 1593.

ARTICLE 3. The King's Majesty shall be sacred and respected; his actions shall be subjected to no censure.

SECTION 4. The King has the right alone to govern the kingdom, in the manner prescribed by the present law on the form of government; he shall have, nevertheless, in cases indicated herein, recourse to the assistance, and shall take the advice of the council of state. To act in this council, the King shall choose and appoint members, lightened, experienced, upright, and generally esteemed, Swedes by birth, and professing the pure evangelical doctrine.

SECTION 5. The council of state shall be composed of ten members, who shall assist at the discussion of all affairs therein treated; a father and son, or two brothers, cannot be, at the same time, members of the council of state.

SECTION 6. Seven members of the council of state shall be chiefs of departments, viz:

The minister of state and of justice, for the department of justice; the minister of state and of foreign affairs, for the department of foreign affairs; a chief and counselor of state, reporter for the department of war, who shall be, at the same time, counselor of the King, for the affairs of military command concerning the army; a chief and counselor for the department of marine, who shall be, at the same time, counselor of the King, for the affairs of military command relating to the fleet; one for the civil (interior) department; one for the department of finance; one for the department of the church and of public instruction. The distribution of affairs between the departments shall be fixed by the King in a special regulation. Of the three counselors of state, with portfolios, two at least must have filled civil offices.

SECTION 7. All affairs relative to the government, with the exception of those mentioned in sections 11 and 15, must be reported before the King in the council of state and there be decided.

SECTION 8. In affairs which must be considered in the council of state, the King shall take his decision only in the presence of at least three counselors of state, besides the official reporter. All the members of the council of state, when not legally prevented, must be present in affairs of importance and of real weight, which, next to the order of the day which shall be sent to them in advance, are treated in the council of state and report themselves to the general administration of the kingdom. Such are regulations and projects relative to the establishment of new general ordinances; on the abrogation or the modification of those already in force; on the introduction of a new organization in the various branches of the administration, and others of the same nature.

SECTION 9. A protocol shall be formed of all affairs carried before the King in the council of state. The members of the council, for the time being, must absolutely express and declare their opinion, to be inserted in the protocol, and they are responsible for their counsels, as it is further stated in sections 106, 107; nevertheless, it is reserved to the King alone to decide. If ever, contrary to all expectation, it should happen that the decision of the King should be evidently contrary to the fundamental law of the kingdom, or to the code in force, the members of the council of state are required to make vigorous remonstrances against the decision. The one who shall not have consigned to the protocol an opposite opinion is as responsible for the decision as if he had counseled the King to take it.

SECTION 10. Before affairs are carried to the King, in the council of state, the reporter must prepare them, demanding of competent authorities the necessary assistance.

SECTION 11. The King shall prepare and direct, as he shall judge most convenient, ministerial affairs, by which is understood those which concern the relations of the kingdom with foreign powers. It belongs to the minister of state and of foreign affairs to make a report of them to the King, in the presence of another member of the council of state. If the minister of state is absent, the report shall be presented by that one of the members of the council whom the King shall call in this case. When the King shall have heard the counsels of these functionaries, for which they are responsible, and which shall be inserted in the protocol, he shall render his decision in their presence; the protocol to be formed before, by the one to whom it shall have been specially committed. Of these, what the King shall judge useful, shall be communicated to the council of state, so that the council may also have some knowledge of this branch of the administration.

SECTION 12. The King has the right to conclude treaties and alliances with foreign powers, after having, conformably to the preceding section, heard upon these affairs the minister of state and of foreign affairs, and another member of the council of state, whom the King shall name on this occasion.

SECTION 13. If the King wishes to declare war or make peace, he shall assemble, in extra council of state, all the members of the council, make known to them the reasons and circumstances which ought to be taken into consideration on this occasion, and demand their advice, which they shall each give separately, to be consigned to the protocol, under the responsibility determined in section 107. That done, the King shall have the power to form and execute the decision which he shall judge most useful to the kingdom.

SECTION 14. The King has the command-in-chief of the forces of the kingdom by land and sea.

SECTION 15. The affairs of military command, by which are understood those that the King immediately directs in the quality of commander-in-chief of the land and naval forces, when the King himself governs the kingdom, shall be decided by him in the presence of the one, of the chiefs of the military departments in the department to which the affair belongs. At the time of the preparation of these affairs, it is the duty of this one to express his opinion on the enterprises of the King, and, if it does not agree with the decision of the King, to commit his objections and his counsels to a protocol, of which the King shall certify the exactitude by placing thereto his high signature. If the said official finds that these enterprises are of a dangerous tendency, or that they are based on uncertain or insufficient means of execution, he shall recommend further to the King to reassemble for this purpose a council of war, composed of two or more superior officers at the time being; the King, nevertheless, unrestrained by this recommendation, and when it is accepted by the opinion of the council of war committed to the protocol, will make that regard which seems good to him.

SECTION 16. The King must maintain and favor justice and truth, prevent and defend against violence and injustice, neither wrong nor permit wrong to any one in his life, honor, personal liberty or interests, who is not legally convicted and condemned. The King shall not interpose between the individual and the court of justice.

SECTION 17. The royal prerogative of high jurisdiction shall be confided to men versed in jurisprudence, named by the King, the number of whom shall not be less than twelve nor more than eighteen; these must have given proofs of knowledge, experience, and probity in the exercise of these offices. They shall bear the titles of councilors of justice, and shall constitute the supreme tribunal of the King. Their number must not exceed twelve, unless the King and Diet decide in the law prescribed in section 87, paragraph 1, that the supreme tribunal ought to be divided into sections; in this case the number of councilors of justice, in the limits fixed above, as well as the distribution of affairs between the sections, shall be regulated in the same manner.

SECTION 18. It belongs, also, to this supreme tribunal to pronounce, in the name of the King, on the demand made by a party, who has let pass the time of appeal from a judgment, or on the exercise in justice, of a right that the law confers upon him, in order to be relieved from the forfeiture of delay.

SECTION 19. If tribunals and officials address to the King a demand in explanation of the true meaning of the law, in cases which are in the province of the judges, it shall belong equally to the supreme tribunal to give the explanation thus demanded.

SECTION 20. Affairs which, after having been judged by military tribunals, are submitted to the examination of the King, shall be, in time of peace, carried before the supreme tribunal, and decided by it. Two military officers of superior rank, chosen by the King and appointed for this purpose, and who shall be unexceptionable and responsible like the other judges, and shall enjoy no special favor, must take part in the deliberations on these affairs in the supreme tribunal as well as at the judgment; but the number of judges cannot exceed eight. In time of war, such cases shall be proceeded with according to the articles of war.

SECTION 21. The King has two voices in affairs, to the relation and decision of which he deems it proper to assist in the supreme tribunal. Every question on the interpretation of the law shall be reported to the King, and his voices shall be counted, even while he shall have taken no part in the deliberations of the supreme tribunal.

SECTION 22. In the supreme tribunal, affairs of the least importance must be examined and decided by five members, and even by four, if the four agree on the decision. In affairs of greater importance, the number of seven members, at least, is necessary in order that a judgment can be rendered. More than eight members at a time can never take part in the examination of a suit.

SECTION 23. All the decisions of the supreme tribunal shall be rendered in the name of the King, and provided with his high signature, or with his seal.

SECTION 24. Judicial affairs shall be prepared in the King's "inferior justice revision" for report to, and decision of, the supreme tribunal.

SECTION 25. The King has the right, in criminal cases, to pardon, to commute the sentence of death, and to restore honor as well as goods confiscated. Nevertheless, the supreme tribunal shall be heard on such matters, and the King shall take its decision in council of state. It shall be optional afterward with the guilty party to accept the pardon granted by the King, or submit to the punishment to which he shall have been condemned.

SECTION 26. When judicial affairs are reported in the council of state, there shall be present, besides the minister of state, two members of the supreme tribunal, who shall be obliged to commit their opinion to the protocol, as prescribed in section 9.

SECTION 27. The King shall chose for his attorney general a man versed in jurisprudence, capable and impartial, and who shall have been employed in judicial duties. In his capacity of attorney general of the King, it belongs to him, principally, to exercise, either himself, or by the intermediate fiscal attorneys subordinate to him, or the public ministry, in cases which concern the public safety and the rights of the state, as well as of exercising, in the name of the King, watchfulness over the administration of justice, and in this capacity, of prosecuting judges and officials for offenses committed by them.

SECTION 28. The King has the right to name and constitute in the council of state men born Swedes to all the offices and employments, inferior and superior, in the kingdom, when they are of the list of those for whom commissions have been signed by the King; nevertheless, those to whom it belongs, according to the custom observed up to this time, of proposing candidates, ought before to have transmitted to the King a list of presentation. The King can, notwithstanding, after having heard competent authorities on their proposition, call and name foreigners of distinguished merit, and professing the pure evangelical doctrine, to the employments of professors of universities—the employment of minister of theology excepted—to the chair of professor, and to other employments of all the other institutions for sciences, trades, or fine arts, as well as the profession of medicine. The King can, at the same time, employ foreigners of rare talents in military offices, those of commandants of fortresses excepted. In all nominations, the King shall have regard only to the merit and talents of candidates and not to their birth. There shall be named to the civil offices in the kingdom, as to those of judges, only persons professing the pure evangelical faith; nevertheless, shall be excepted the offices of professor and others in the institutions for the trades and fine arts, and those of medicine, to which even persons who do not profess the pure evangelical faith can be named. The chief of each department must report and expedite everything which concerns nominations, vacancies, and dismissals for the offices in the administrations which belong to his department.

2. By naturalization, the King has the right of granting the privileges of naturalization to foreigners, in the order and with the conditions which are prescribed by a special law established in the manner stipulated in section 87, paragraph 1. The foreigners thus naturalized shall enjoy the same rights and privileges as if he was born a Swede, although he cannot be named member of the council of state.

SECTION 29. The archbishop and bishops shall be elected in the manner practiced up to this time, and the King shall name for these places one of the three candidates proposed.

SECTION 30. The King shall name the royal curates, according to the custom observed up to the present time. As to the said consistorial curates, the parishes shall be sustained in their right of election.

SECTION 31. In the cities, the inhabitants called to take part at the election of members to the Diet shall have the right to propose for the places of burgomaster three competent men, of whom the King shall choose one. The proceedings shall be the same for the places of councilors and secretary of the magistrate, in the city of Stockholm.

SECTION 32. Envoys near foreign powers, as well as the personnel of the legations, shall be appointed by the King in the presence of the minister of state and of foreign affairs, and another member of the council of state, whom the King shall designate.

SECTION 33. When employments, for which candidates have been proposed, must be filled by the king, the members of the council of state shall express their opinion on the talents and merit of the aspirants. They have, at the same time, the right to make humble representations against the nominations of the King to other services and offices.

SECTION 34. The ministers of state are clothed with the highest dignity of the kingdom; the councilors of state rank next. The ministers of state or the councilors of state cannot, at the same time, perform other duties, nor draw emoluments from them. The councilors of justice cannot, at the same time, be invested with other duties nor exercise them.

SECTION 35. The members of the council of state, the presidents and chiefs of colleges, or other administrations established in their place, the attorney general of the King, the chiefs of the administration of customs and of posts, the secretaries-in-chief to the departments of state, the grand governor, and the master of the police of the capital, the governors of the provinces, field marshals, generals and admirals of every rank, general aids-de-camp, first aids-de-camp, aids-de-camp of the staffs of armies, commandants of fortresses, colonels of regiments, second chiefs of regiments of horse and foot guards and corps for the escort of the King, as well as the chiefs of all other corps and military battalions, having each a separate organization, the chiefs of artillery, fortifications, engineering, and hydrography, ministers, envoys, and commercial agents near foreign powers, as well as the officials of the minister of foreign affairs and the personnel of the legations, have posts of confidence, of which the King can deprive them when he judges it useful for the service of the state. The King shall, nevertheless, communicate these resolutions to the council of state, whose members are allowed to make humble representations on this subject, if they believe they have sufficient reasons for so doing.

SECTION 36. Those who occupy judicial offices, as well superior as inferior, also all other officials and employes not mentioned in the preceding section, cannot, except by means of scrutiny and judgment, be removed by the King or promised other offices, unless on their own demand.

SECTION 37. The King has the right to confer nobility on persons who, by their fidelity, courage, virtue, learning, and zealous services, shall have particularly merited favor from the King and kingdom. The King can also, in reward for great and eminent services, raise the nobles to the rank of baron and barons to that of count. The nobility and the titles of baron and count, granted henceforth, can descend only to that one who shall have been a noble, or shall have received the title, and after his death, in direct descent to the eldest of his male descendants of the eldest branch, and at the extinction of this branch, to the male descendant of the following eldest branch, the nearest to the head of the family, and so on. If by inheritance, nobility passes to some one who is himself already a noble, or who has become so by another more immediate inheritance, his nobility shall cease with him, unless it is not of superior rank, in which case the nobility of the head of the family shall pass to the nearest branch; if that no longer exists, the line shall be extinct. If any one has been deprived of his nobility, it shall pass to the one who, according to the principles herein established, is the next successor.

The regulating of the order of nobility which the King and the nobility decide upon together, prescribe the manner of the assembling of the nobility, to decide upon its common affairs.

SECTION 38. All acts and orders emanating from the King, excepting those relative to affairs of military command, must, to be valid, be provided with the signature of the King, and countersigned by a competent reporter, who shall be responsible for their conformity to the protocol. The chiefs of departments send to whom they belong all instructions and observations relative to the execution of resolutions taken. If the reporter finds any resolution of the King contrary to the law on the form of government, he shall make representations on this subject in the council of state. If the King, notwithstanding, insists that this resolution shall be taken, the reporter shall have the right and duty of refusing the countersign, and he must, in consequence, give up his office, which he cannot take again before the Diet have examined and approved of his conduct. Meanwhile he shall be sustained in the enjoyment of his salary, and other revenues attached to the office.

SECTION 39. If the king wishes to undertake a journey outside of Sweden and Norway, he must communicate his design to the council of state in pleno, and take its advice on this subject, as stated in section 9. If, afterward, the King decides upon this journey, and puts it into execution, he cannot occupy himself with the government of the kingdom, neither exercise the royal power so long as he remains outside the kingdoms. During the absence of the King, the affairs of state shall be governed, in his name, by the prince, heir-presumptive to the throne, if he has attained the age prescribed in section 41. He shall govern in the quality of regent, with all the power and all the royal authority, according to the present law on the form of government; nevertheless, he cannot grant letters of nobility, neither titles of count or baron, nor confer decorations; at the same time, all vacant posts of trust can be filled only provisionally by those whom the regent shall appoint. If there is no prince having the right of succession to the throne, or if the heir-presumptive have not attained the age of majority established in section 41, or if, by sickness or absence from Sweden and Norway, he is prevented from taking the reins of government, the council of state shall govern with the same power as the regent.

In section 91 shall be stipulated what shall be done in case the King remains out of the kingdom more than twelve months.

SECTION 40. If the King becomes so ill as not to be able to direct the affairs of the government, proceedings shall be as prescribed in the preceding section.

SECTION 41. The King shall be of full age at eighteen years. He shall be at the same time heir-presumptive to the throne. If the King decease before the heir to the throne has attained that age, the council of state shall govern in the name of the King, according to section 39, until the Diet shall be assembled, and tutors appointed by it shall have taken the reins of government; the council of state must conform itself absolutely to the present law on the form of government.

SECTION 42. If the misfortune occurs, that all the dynasty to which the right of succession to the kingdom is reserved is extinct, in the male line, the council of state shall govern, equally with the powers established in section 39, until the Diet shall be able to assemble and elect a new dynasty, and the King elected may take the reins of government.

In all cases where, according to the present section, and the three which precede, the government is exercised by the council of state, all its members must be present and vote in the council.

SECTION 43. If the King goes to war, or makes a journey at a distance from the kingdom, or into Norway, he shall appoint three members of the council of state, under the presidency of that one of the princes of his family, or of one of the members of the council of state, whom he shall choose, to administer the government in affairs which he shall assign to them. Concerning the affairs which the King, in this case, shall decide himself, they shall be proceeded with as prescribed in section 8.

What has been stipulated as regards the King shall be equally applicable to the regent when he administers the government of the kingdom.

SECTION 44. No prince of the royal family, prince royal, prince hereditary, or other, can marry without the knowledge and authorization of the King. Marriage made without this authorization incurs privation of all right of succession to the throne, as well for the one who has contracted it as for his children and descendants.

SECTION 45. Neither the prince royal, princes hereditary, nor other princes of the royal house, shall have endowments or civil office. The title of duke or prince of a duchy or principality can, however, be conferred upon them without authority over the provinces whose name they bear.

SECTION 46. The country shall remain divided into governments, directed by the existing provincial administrations. There shall be, hereafter, no governor general in the kingdom.

SECTION 47. The hof-rätter, or highest inferior tribunal, and all the other tribunals of the kingdom, shall judge, according to the law and regulations having the force of law; the administrative colleges of the kingdom, provincial administrations, and all corps of administration, as well as superior and inferior officials, must fulfill their duties and manage affairs of their province, and aid each other in their execution, as well as in everything which the service of the King exacts from them, all becoming responsible to the King, in the order prescribed by the law, for what shall be neglected by them or treated in an illegal manner.

SECTION 48. The court of the King is under his particular direction, and on this account he shall have the right to take such measures as shall seem to him good. For all the offices of his court, the King shall appoint and remove whoever shall please him.

SECTION 49. The Diet represents the Swedish people. The rights and duties which, according to the laws in force, belong to the general estates of the kingdom, shall revert henceforth to the Diet. It is divided into two chambers, whose members are elected in the order prescribed by the law on representation. The chambers have, in all questions, the same competency and the same authority.

For ordinary sessions, the Diet must assemble, in virtue of the present fundamental law, on the fifteenth of January of each year, or the day following if this date falls on a holiday; nevertheless, the King can, in the interval of the ordinary sessions, convocate an extra session.

In extra session can be treated only affairs for which the Diet has been convoked, or those, beside, which have been submitted by the King, as also all which relates necessarily to the said affairs.

SECTION 50. The Diet shall assemble in the capital of the kingdom, except in cases where the approach of an enemy, plague, or other preventives of the same weight, shall render it impossible or dangerous for its liberty and its safety. In these cases the King, after having consulted with the delegated directors of the bank and the office of the public debt, must designate and announce officially another place of meeting for the Diet.

SECTION 51. In cases where the Diet shall be convoked by the King, the regent, or the council of state, the time of meeting shall be fixed after the twentieth and before the thirtieth day, to commence from the one on which the meeting shall have been published in the churches of the capital.

SECTION 52. The presidents and vice-presidents of the chamber shall be appointed by the King.

SECTION 53. The ordinary Diet shall form, for the preparation of affairs, the following committees: a committee of the constitution, to make and receive propositions, relative to modifications to be introduced in the fundamental laws, and to give its advice on them to the Diet, as well as to examine the protocols of the council of state; a committee of finance, to examine and set forth, in a report to the Diet, the condition, administration, and necessities of the treasury, and of the office of the public debt; a committee of taxes, to treat the questions relative to them; a committee of the bank, to control the administration and condition of the bank, and to give instructions relative to its administration; and a committee of legislation, to commit to writing the projects of the amelioration of the civil, criminal, and ecclesiastical laws, which are sent to it by the chambers. In extra sessions there shall be formed only the number of committees necessary for the preparation of affairs which are submitted to them.

SECTION 54. If the King demands of the Diet special delegates to confer with him on affairs which he judges a duty to be kept secret, these delegates shall be elected by the chambers; nevertheless, they shall not have the power to take decisions, but only give to the King their advice on the affairs which he shall have communicated to them. If the King exacts it, they must swear secrecy.

SECTION 55. The Diet, the chambers, neither any committee of the Diet, can discuss or decide any affair in the presence of the King.

SECTION 56. The law on representation indicates in what manner the propositions of the King shall be treated and decided, as well as the motions made by the deputies in the chambers.

SECTION 57. The right immemorial of the Swedish people to tax themselves is managed by the Diet alone.

The communal laws, which are established by the King and the Diet in common, prescribe in what manner the communes can tax themselves for their particular needs.

SECTION 58. At each ordinary Diet, the King shall cause to be presented a view of the financial condition of the state in all its parts, receipts and expenses, credits and debts. If, in consequence of treaties concluded with foreign powers, certain sums become payable to the kingdom, there shall be an account of it rendered in the same manner.

SECTION 59. The King shall submit to the Diet at the same time as the view of the condition and financial needs of the state, a project relative to the manner of providing for taxes, under the necessities of the state demand outside of ordinary receipts.

SECTION 60. Under the denomination of taxes are comprised the custom-house duties, excise and postal duties, stamp duties on domestic brandy, and all personal taxes which each Diet would impose. Any duty payable to the state, of whatever nature and denomination it may be—the custom-house duties on the importation and exportation of grain excepted—can be increased without the consent of the Diet. The King can no longer farm out the receipts of the state, neither establish monopolies, either for his profit or the state's, neither for individuals nor corporations.

SECTION 61. All imposts voted by the Diet under the titles mentioned in the preceding section shall be received till the end of the year, in the course of which the Diet shall have again fixed the taxes.

SECTION 62. When the financial needs of the state shall have been verified by the Diet, it shall depend upon it to vote a contribution which shall be proportioned to it, as well as to fix the different sums, which on this contribution shall be assigned to the various services, and to enter these sums on the budget under general determined titles.

SECTION 63. Besides, there shall be created, for unforeseen cases, two separate and sufficient funds, which shall be furnished by the office of the public debt, (riksgäld-konteret.) The first shall be transferable, if the King, after having heard the advice of all the council of state, judges it is indispensably necessary to make an appeal for it, for the defense of the kingdom, or any other object of major importance; the second can be employed by the King, in case of war, after having heard the members of the council of state in pleno, and convoked the Diet. The assignment for this sum, sealed by the Diet, cannot be opened, neither the sum paid by the delegated directors of the office of the public debt, before the meeting of the Diet shall have been duly published in the churches of the capital.

SECTION 64. The ordinary resources and receipts of the kingdom, as well as the sums which, conformably to what has been written above, are appropriated by the Diet, on account of the state, under the denominations of extraordinary contributions or imposts, shall be at the disposition of the King, in order to provide for the needs which have been recognized by the Diet, and conformably to the expenses incurred by the state.

SECTION 65. The said revenues cannot be employed otherwise than has been prescribed; the members of the council of state being responsible for any misappropriation of it, without committing to the protocol their observations, and alleging what the Diet shall have ordered in such a matter.

SECTION 66. The office of the public debt shall remain under the direction, control, and administration of the Diet; and while it guarantees the payment of the debt, administered by the office, the Diet, after having duly examined the condition and financial necessities of the office, shall furnish by a special contribution the necessary means for the payment of the debt, principal and interest, so that the credit of the country may be duly maintained and guarded.

SECTION 67. The King's deputy in the office of the public debt shall assist at meetings of the delegated directors only when these shall have expressed the desire to confer with him.

SECTION 68. Sums belonging to, or appropriated to the service of the public debt, can be removed on no other pretext or condition whatever, neither employed for other purposes, than those determined by the Diet. All orders tending to that shall be null.

SECTION 69. When propositions of the committee of finance are submitted to the Diet, concerning either the regulation of the expenses of the state, or of the amount of taxes proportioned to them, whether expenses or receipts of the office of the public debt, or bases for fixing the direction and administration of this office, the proceedings shall be according to the prescriptions of the law on representation relative to the manner of proceeding as regards the propositions of the said committee. If the chambers take different resolutions, which cannot be harmonized, the chambers shall vote separately on the resolutions already taken by each of them; and the opinion which has the greatest number in counting the votes of the two chambers, shall have the force of the resolution of the Diet.

SECTION 70. When, in questions concerning the direction and administration, the receipts and expenses of the bank of the kingdom, the chambers take different resolutions, they shall vote separately, as is said in the preceding section.

SECTION 71. The proceedings shall be the same, if the chambers do not agree concerning the bases of a tax, the manner of applying them, or the distribution of the tax for payment.

SECTION 72. The bank of the kingdom shall remain under the guarantee and control of the Diet in such a manner that it can be administered by the delegated directors named by the chambers, without the intervention of any one, and according to the regulations, statutes, and instructions given, or to be given, by the Diet. The Diet alone has the right to put in circulation, through the bank, notes which must be recognized as the money of the kingdom. These notes shall be paid, according to their tenor, by the bank, at sight and in coin.

SECTION 73. No new impost, recruiting of soldiers, or demand for money or effects, can henceforth be ordered, made, neither exacted, except with the wishes and consent of the Diet, and in the order prescribed above.

SECTION 74. If a war breaks out, the King can exact no other contributions of a nature for making war, than subsistence, which a country can be required to contribute for the support of troops during their march, when the various localities where this march takes place are not in a state to furnish the necessary supplies. Those who are affected by this contribution shall, however, be reimbursed forthwith in money by the state, at a price above half the price of the subsistence. This contribution can be exacted neither for troops cantoned in a locality, neither those which execute a movement in time of war, the troops in this case being before provisioned from the storehouses or depots established for this purpose.

SECTION 75. The annual market price shall be decided by deputies elected in the order specially prescribed by the Diet. What these deputies shall have decided in this regard shall serve as a rule, unless a modification shall have been demanded and accorded in the desired form.

SECTION 76. The King cannot, without the consent of the Diet, make loans neither in nor out of the country, neither charge the state with new debts.

SECTION 77. The domains and farms of the state, as well as their dependencies and appurtenances, forests, parks, warrens, and meadows of the state, meadows used for the support of the King's equipage, salmon fisheries, and other fisheries of the state, as well as all its other property, can neither be sold nor mortgaged, nor by donation or otherwise transferred by the King, without the consent of the Diet. These properties shall be administered according to the bases determined by the Diet, notwithstanding persons and communities who now, conformably to the ordinances in force up to this day, are in the possession of such property or have the profits of it, shall enjoy, on this account, the rights which legally belong to them. In the same manner cleared or arable lands in the forests of the state can, in the usual manner, and according to the actual ordinances, or those to come, be sold, on condition that the purchaser continues to pay rents to the state.

SECTION 78. No part of the kingdom can be transferred from it by sale, mortgage donation, or similar means.

SECTION 79. No modification of the standard of coin or of weights, whether to increase or reduce them, can be made in the money of the kingdom, without the consent of the Diet. The right of the King to coin money is not thereby impaired.

SECTION 80. The obligation to maintain troops of cavalry and infantry, as well as marines, by "rotering" and "indelning," shall continue in country and city, according to established contracts and "indelning system," of which the principal bases shall remain intact, until the King and Diet, together, judge it necessary to make modifications therein. No new "rotering" can be made, neither the one existing be increased, unless the King and Diet agree to it.

SECTION 81. The present law on the form of government, and the other fundamental laws of the kingdom, can be modified or abrogated only by a resolution of the King and two ordinary Diets. The resolutions of the Diet in regard to propositions of the King concerning the fundamental laws, shall be made known to him in the manner prescribed by the law on representation. If by a resolution of the Diet a motion made by it relative to the fundamental laws has been approved, this resolution shall be submitted to the King, who must, before the closing of the Diet, take the advice of all the members of the council of state on this subject, and make known to the Diet, in the hall of the throne, his assent, or the reasons why the resolutions shall not be sanctioned.

SECTION 82. That which, conformably to the order established, shall have been decided upon by the Diet, with regard to introducing modifications into the fundamental laws, and shall have been approved by the King, or that which shall have been proposed by the King and accepted by the Diet, shall have the force of fundamental law.

SECTION 83. No other interpretation of the fundamental laws can be valid, for the future, than the one which shall have been adopted in the manner prescribed to modify these same laws.

SECTION 84. In each particular case the fundamental laws shall be applied according to their literal sense.

SECTION 85. As fundamental laws, shall be considered the present law on the form of government, as well as the laws on representation, on the order of succession to the throne, and on the liberty of the press, which are decided upon by the King and Diet, in common, conformably to the principles established in the present law on the form of government.

SECTION 86. By the liberty of the press is understood the right of all Swedes to publish writings without previous obstacles, on the part of public authority, of being prosecuted for their contents, only before competent tribunals, and of being punished for the said writings, only inasmuch as the tenor of them is evidently contrary to formal, established law; to guarantee the public tranquillity, without placing obstacles in the way of the propagation of knowledge. All the acts and protocols, no matter what affair concerning, excepting the protocols of the council of state, and those brought before the King in ministerial affairs, and those of military command, can unconditionally be published through the press. The protocols and acts of the bank, and of the office of the public debt, concerning affairs which must be kept secret, cannot be published.

SECTION 87. The Diet, in concert with the King, has the power to establish laws, civil and criminal, as well as to modify and abrogate such laws already established. The King cannot, without the consent of the Diet, neither the Diet without that of the King, make new laws, neither abrogate old ones. Motions on this subject can be made in the chambers, and the Diet shall decide them, after having taken the advice of the committee on legislation.

If the Diet pronounces itself in favor of a new law, or of the modification or abrogation of an old law, the project relative to it shall be submitted to the King, who shall take the advice of the council of state and the supreme tribunal, and, after having formed his resolution, shall make known to the Diet his consent to the demand made by it, or the reasons for his refusal to agree to it. If the King is prevented from forming or making known his resolution before the closing of the Diet, he shall be free to approve the project, such as is conceived, word for word, and to proclaim it, before the opening of the following Diet. If this has not taken place, the project is rejected; and in this case the King shall make known to the Diet in the next session the reasons which prevented the approbation of the project. If the King judges proper to present to the Diet a project of law, he shall demand on this subject the advice of the council of state and of the supreme tribunal, and shall communicate his proposition, as well as this advice, to the Diet, which shall proceed afterward in the order prescribed by the law on representation.

2. The Diet, in concert with the King, shall have equally the power to establish, modify, or abrogate ecclesiastical laws; nevertheless, in these cases, the assent of the general synod is also necessary. The advice of the council of state and of the supreme tribunal shall be taken on projects relative to these laws, as is said in paragraph 1, and shall be sent to the Diet at the same time with the proposition of the King, if the initiative comes from him. If a project of law of this nature has not been promulgated as a law before the opening of the Diet which follows the one which has presented or approved of the project, it shall be accounted rejected; and in this case the King shall make known to the Diet the reasons why the project could not be accepted.

SECTION 88. As regards the interpretations of civil, criminal, and ecclesiastical laws, the proceedings shall be the same as for a new law of this nature. The interpretations of the true meaning of the law which the King, through the supreme tribunal, and in the interval of the Diets, shall have given in reply to the demands which have been made, can be disapproved by the Diet following; and even those relative to the ecclesiastical laws can be disapproved by the first general synod which shall be held after the said interpretation shall have been given. The construction thus disapproved shall be no longer valid, and can neither be observed nor cited by the tribunals.

SECTION 89. Motions in the chambers can be made having for an object the modifying, interpreting, or abolishing of laws and ordinances touching the general economy of the kingdom, as well as proposing new laws on this subject, or making motions relative to the principles on which public institutions of every sort can be organized. Nevertheless, in these matters, the resolutions which the Diet can adopt shall be limited to making representations to the King and expressing wishes to him; to which, the council of state being heard, he shall have regard, as he finds it useful to the kingdom. If the King wishes to charge the Diet with deciding in concert with him a question relating to the general administration of the kingdom, the proceedings shall be according to the stipulations of section 87, paragraph 1, relative to the projects of law.

SECTION 90. Questions relative to the nominations and removal of public officials; to decisions, resolutions, and decrees of executive and judicial powers; to the interests of individuals or corporations; to the execution of a law or regulation; or to the organization of an institution, can be submitted to the deliberations and examinations of the Diet, of its chambers or committees, only in cases and in the manner prescribed by the fundamental laws, interpreted according to their literal sense.

SECTION 91. In case mentioned in section 39, where the King, after having undertaken a journey, shall remain more than twelve months outside of the kingdom, the regent, or the council of state, if it governs, shall convoke the Diet by official notification, and shall cause the convocation to be published in the churches of the capital within fifteen days after the above-mentioned time, and in the other parts of the kingdom as soon as can be done. If the King, after having been informed of it, does not return to the kingdom, the Diet shall take such resolutions on the subject of the government of the kingdom as it shall deem best.

SECTION 92. The proceedings shall be the same if the King is ill to such an extent that, for more than twelve months, he may not occupy himself with the affairs of the government.

SECTION 93. In case of the King's decease, and if the successor to the throne is still a minor, the council of state shall convoke the Diet. This convocation shall be published within fifteen days after the King's decease, in the churches of the capital, and in the other parts of the kingdom. The Diet, without being bound by any testament of the late King touching the government, shall have the right to designate one, three, or five guardians to administer the government in his name, and conformably to the present fundamental law, until the majority of the King.

SECTION 94. If the misfortune arrives that the dynasty, to which the right of succession to the throne is reserved, becomes extinct in the male line, the council of state shall convoke the Diet within the time after the death of the King fixed in the preceding section. The Diet shall then elect a new dynasty, preserving the present law on the form of government.

SECTION 95. If, contrary to expectation, the regent or the council of state, in cases mentioned in sections 91, 93, and 94, shall neglect to convoke the Diet immediately, it shall be the absolute duty of the tribunal of the highest inferior court of the kingdom to give notice of it through official publications, in order that the Diet may assemble to sustain and defend its rights and those of the kingdom. This Diet shall assemble the thirtieth day, at the latest, after the one on which the regent or the council of state ought to have published the convocation in the churches of the capital.

SECTION 96. Each ordinary Diet shall designate a man known as being versed in jurisprudence and for his perfect honor, who, in the capacity of attorney general of the Diet, and according to instructions given by it, shall be charged with inspecting the application of the laws, by the judges and officials, and to prosecute, according to legal forms before competent tribunals, those who, in the exercise of their duties, shall have by favor, partiality, or other motive, committed illegalities, or neglected properly to perform their duties. Nevertheless, he shall be subjected in all respects to the same responsibility and shall be held to the same duties that the code in force prescribes with regard to public accusers.

SECTION 97. This attorney general of the Diet, who, as long as he fulfills his duties, is in all respects the equal of the King's attorney general, shall be elected in the manner prescribed by the law on representation; there shall be at the same time a person elected, possessing the qualities required of the said official, to succeed this one, in case he shall decease before the following ordinary Diet shall have proceeded to a new election, and to replace him if he becomes seriously ill, or shall be otherwise legally incapacitated.

SECTION 98. In cases where, while the Diet is assembled, the attorney general of the Diet shall resign his office, or die, the Diet shall immediately put in his place the person who shall have been designated for his successor. If during the session the successor designated for the attorney general of the Diet resigns his office, or if he enters on the duties of attorney general for the Diet, or if he dies, the proceedings shall be as above for the election of another person fulfilling the desired conditions. If one of the aforesaid cases presents itself in the interval of the sessions, the right of the Diet as regards this shall be exercised by the deputies of the bank and the office of the public debt.

SECTION 99. The attorney general of the Diet can, when he shall judge it necessary, be present at the deliberations and decisions of the supreme tribunal, of the inferior justice revision of the tribunals of the second instance, of administrative colleges or administrations established in their place, and of all inferior tribunals; nevertheless, without having the right to express his opinion, he shall have equally the right to take knowledge of the protocols and other acts of all tribunals, administrative colleges, and other public administrations. In general, all officials of the King are required to lend assistance in the execution of the orders of the attorney general of the Diet, and the fiscal attorneys must assist him, on his demand, in the prosecution.

SECTION 100. The attorney general of the Diet must present to each ordinary Diet a report on the manner in which he has fulfilled his office; to expose therein the situation of the judicial administration of the kingdom; to point out the faults existing in the laws and ordinances, and propose ameliorations therein.

SECTION 101. If, contrary to expectations, it should happen that all the members of the supreme tribunal, or that one or several of these members have, through interest, bad faith, or negligence, judged against right and reason to the extent that, contrary to the just interpretation of the law, as well as the evidence of facts, an individual shall have been deprived of, or been exposed to the loss of, life, personal liberty, honor, and fortune, the attorney general of the Diet shall be required and the attorney general of the King shall have the right to prosecute the wrong-doer before the tribunal indicated below, and to inflict upon him the sentence imposed by the laws of the kingdom.

SECTION 102. This tribunal, called court of the kingdom, shall be composed, in such a case, of the president of the tribunal of the second instance, (Svea Hofrätt,) at Stockholm, who shall occupy the chair; presidents of all the administrative colleges, the oldest four members of the council of state; the commander-in-chief of the troops constituting the garrison of the capital; the principal commandant present of the squadron of the fleet stationed in the port of the capital; the oldest two members of the tribunal of the second instance at Stockholm, and the oldest member of each of the administrative colleges of the kingdom. If the attorney general of the King or of the Diet believes it a duty to prosecute before the court of the kingdom, all the members, or one in particular of the supreme tribunal, he shall demand of the president of the tribunal of the second instance, at Stockholm, in his capacity as president of the court of the kingdom, to issue a legal citation to the one or ones who ought to be prosecuted. The president of the tribunal of the second instance shall afterward take measures for the convocation of the court of the kingdom, and must cause the citation to be served and the matter to be prosecuted further according to legal forms. If, contrary to expectation, he shall neglect to take these measures, or if one of the other officials designated above shall refuse to take part in the court of the kingdom, he shall incur the punishment established by law against the one who neglects voluntarily the official duties incumbent upon him.

If one or several of the members of the court of the kingdom are lawfully prevented or excusable by the law, the court shall be competent, nevertheless, on condition of being composed of twelve persons.

If the president of the tribunal of the second instance, at Stockholm, is lawfully prevented or excusable, the oldest president on duty will take his place. The trial finished and judgment rendered according to law, the court must publicly declare it. No one can have the power of annulling the arrest made by the court. The right to grant pardon, nevertheless, is reserved to the King, but this pardon can, nevertheless, not extend to the restoring of the condemned to the service of the state.

SECTION 103. The ordinary Diet shall appoint every three years, in the manner prescribed by the law on representation, a commission authorized to judge if the members of the supreme tribunal merit to retain their important offices, or if certain ones among them, unless it can be proved they have committed faults or crimes—cases which are provided for in the preceding section—must, nevertheless, be considered as undeserving the right to exercise royal justice. If this commission, after having voted in the order prescribed by the law on representation, decides that one or several of the members of the supreme tribunal shall be declared deprived of the confidence of the Diet, knowledge of it shall be given to the King, who must remove the member or members in question from office. Nevertheless, the King shall grant an annual pension, which shall be the half of the salary.

SECTION 104. The Diet cannot enter into any detailed examination of the decisions of the supreme tribunal, neither any general deliberation take place on this subject in the commission.

SECTION 105. At each ordinary Diet, the committee on the constitution shall have the right to require the protocols of the council of state, with the exception of those which concern ministerial affairs and those of military command, which can be exacted only as far as they relate to affairs generally known and indicated by the committee.

SECTION 106. If the committee finds that it appears from these protocols that a member of the council of state, or a reporter to this deputy, or the official who has counseled the King in an affair of military command, has evidently acted contrary to the fundamental law, or contrary to the code in force, or that he has consented to an infraction of these laws, or neglected to make representations against such an infraction, or that he has caused and favored it, in concealing designedly some knowledge; or that the reporter has neglected, in cases anticipated in section 38 of the present law on the form of government, to refuse his countersign to the resolution of the King, the committee on the constitution must cause the guilty one to be prosecuted by the attorney general of the Diet before the court of the kingdom, or retain in these cases the oldest four members of the supreme tribunal, in place of the members of the council of state. The remainder shall be proceeded with according to sections 101 and 102, relative to the actions brought against the supreme tribunal. If the members of the council of state, or the counselors of the King for affairs of military command, are found guilty in the manner indicated above, the court of the kingdom shall judge them according to the code in force and the special regulation which the King and the Diet shall establish to fix the responsibility in such a case.

SECTION 107. If the committee of the constitution finds that all the members of the council of state, or that one or several of these members, in giving their advice on measures for the public good, have not regarded the true interests of the kingdom, or that a reporter has not fulfilled the duties of his post of trust with impartiality, zeal, ability, and activity, the committee shall have the right to communicate it to the Diet, which, if it judges that the interest of the kingdom demands it, can, in writing, announce its wish to the King that he will deprive this person or persons, against whom observations have been made, of the places which they occupy in the council of state. Questions of this nature can be moved in the chambers of the Diet, and be submitted to them by other committees than the one of the constitution; but they cannot be decided by the Diet before the said committee has been heard. In deliberations of the Diet on this subject, the resolutions of the King in affairs concerning the rights and interests of individuals or corporations cannot even be mentioned, still less submitted to the examination of the Diet. The benefit of the final discharge must be considered as obtained to everything that the Diet, after examination, has approved or left without observation; and no new examination, of any responsibility whatever, can be made by a following Diet, concerning affairs thus examined. Nevertheless, notwithstanding the examination made by committees or deputies of the Diet for the administration of the receipts of the state, it is the duty of the authorized officials to exercise the special revision which belongs to them by virtue of their office.

SECTION 108. The ordinary Diet shall designate, every three years, as is prescribed by the law on representation, six persons distinguished for their knowledge and learning, to watch over the liberty of the press, jointly with the attorney general of the Diet, who shall be their president. This committee, of whom two, besides the attorney general of the Diet, must be jurisconsults, shall have the following authority: In case an author or printer himself sends to them a writing before the printing, demanding their advice on the question to know whether, according to the law on the liberty of the press, he would be liable to be prosecuted for its contents, the attorney general of the Diet, and at least three of the committee, one a jurisconsult, shall be authorized to give, in writing, the advice demanded. If they declare that the work can be printed, the author and printer shall be free from all responsibility, which shall fall upon the committee.

SECTION 109. The ordinary Diet can, unless on its own demand, be dissolved only at the expiration of four months after its meeting, unless the King, as stated in the law on representation, orders new elections, either for both chambers, or one of them. In this case the Diet, in preserving its character of ordinary Diet, shall assemble in the three months which follow the dissolution, at the time fixed by the King, and it can be dissolved by the King only at the expiration of four months after the commencement of its new session. The extra Diet can be dissolved by the King when he judges convenient; it must always be before the time fixed for the ordinary sessions. If, contrary to expectation, it happens that the Diet, at the time of its closing, has not regulated the expenses, or has not fixed the amount of the contributions for imposts, the old state of the expenses and the old contribution shall continue until the following Diet. If the total amount of this contribution is fixed, but the chambers are not agreed as to its assessment, the taxes founded on the different articles of the last ordinance, concerning these matters, shall be increased or diminished in the proposition existing between the total amount of the tax, which has just been fixed by the Diet, and the old contribution, the assessment of which was made by the last Diet. In this case, the Diet shall charge its deputies of the bank and the office of the public debt to prepare, according to established bases and publish a new ordinance upon this subject.

SECTION 110. No member of the Diet can be prosecuted, neither deprived of his liberty, on account of what he shall have said or done in the said capacity, unless the chamber, of which he is a member, authorizes this prosecution by a formal resolution, to which, at least, five-sixths of the members present shall have agreed. No member of the Diet can longer be expelled from the place where the Diet is assembled. If an individual or body, military or other, or a meeting of the citizens of any denomination whatever, undertake, of itself, or by order of others, to perform acts of violence on the Diet, chambers, or committee, or on any particular member of the Diet, or to interfere with the freedom of the deliberations and resolutions of the Diet, this shall be called treason, and the Diet can prosecute these infractions, according to the prescriptions of the law.

If a member of the Diet, during the session, either in a journey coming to or returning from the Diet, the object of this journey being known, is molested by words or acts, there shall be applied the resolutions of the code in force, as to violence or offenses committed against officials of the King, in the exercise, or on the occasion of the exercise, of their duties. It shall be the same, if the deputies, the delegated comptrollers' or the attorney general of the Diet, the secretaries or clerks of the chambers and committees of the Diet, are attacked with violence, or insulted in the exercise, or on the occasion of the exercise of the said duties.

SECTION 111. If a member of the Diet is charged with an offense of a serious nature, he can be arrested only on the order given by the judge, after examination of the affair, except in case where he shall have been taken in flagrant act; nevertheless, if he does not appear on the authority given by the tribunal, the resolutions of the code in force relative to it shall be applied. The members of the Diet can be deprived of their liberty only in the cases explained by the present section, and the one which precedes. The deputies and delegated comptrollers of the Diet can receive orders relative to their duties from the Diet alone, and these in conformity with the instructions given by it. They can no more be made responsible for their acts, except according to a resolution of the Diet.

SECTION 112. No official or clerk can exercise, by reason of his office, an illicit influence on the election of the members of the Diet; any one guilty thereof shall be removed from his place.

SECTION 113. Those who are designated to enforce, on the part of the Diet, ordinances relative to the assessment of taxes, can be submitted to no responsibility for the imposition of taxes.

SECTION 114. The privileges, advantages, rights, and liberties of the old estates of the kingdom shall remain in force, except so far as they attach themselves necessarily to the ancient right of representation by the orders, such right of representation having ceased. They cannot be modified, neither abolished, unless there shall be unanimity, in this respect, between the King and Diet; and that, in questions relative to the privileges, advantages, rights, and liberties of the nobility and the clergy, the nobility, on its part, and the general synod for that of the clergy, give their consent to it.

In faith of which we have desired to confirm, sanction, and accept everything which precedes, placing thereto our signatures and our seals.

CHARLES.

LAW ON REPRESENTATION

Adopted by His Majesty and the estates of the kingdom, Stockholm, June 22, 1866.

We, Charles, by the grace of God King of Sweden, of Norway, of the Goths and Vandals, make known that the estates of the kingdom having, in the order prescribed by the fundamental laws, accepted our project of a new law on representation; this law shall have, conformably to section 82 of the law on the form of government, the force of fundamental law, such as follows, word for word:

We, the undersigned, the estates of the kingdom of Sweden, counts, barons, bishops, orders of the nobility, of the clergy, of burghers, and of the peasants, now assembled in general Diet, in our name and in that of our absent fellow-citizens, make known that his Majesty having, by a proposition dated January 5, 1863, and conformably to section 81 of the law on the form of government, submitted to our examination a project of a new law on representation, we have, after having treated this important affair in the manner prescribed by fundamental laws, accepted the said project thus conceived.

GENERAL PRINCIPLES.

SECTION 1. The Swedish people is represented by a Diet, divided into two chambers, the first and the second, which have, on all questions, the same authority. The members of the Diet shall not be bound, in the exercise of their duties, by any other propositions than those of the fundamental laws of the kingdom.

SECTION 2. The ordinary sessions of the Diet shall assemble, in virtue of the law on the form of government, and without special convocation, the 15th of January of each year, or the day following, if this date falls on a holiday.

The Diet shall be convoked in extra session when the King shall judge it necessary, and also in all cases indicated in sections 91, 92, 93, and 94 of the law on the form of government.

In extra session can be treated only affairs for which the Diet has been convoked, or which, besides, have been submitted to the Diet by the King, as well as all which relates necessarily to the said affairs.

SECTION 3. For the two chambers, the members of the Diet are chosen by election, and for a fixed time. Nevertheless, the King has the right, before the expiration of this term, to cause in all the kingdom new elections, either for both the chambers or one of them.

SECTION 4. No members of the Diet can be prevented from exercising his functions. Nevertheless exception is made in time of war for soldiers when they are called into active service by the King.

SECTION 5. The ordinary Diet can, except on its own demand, be dissolved only at the expiration of four months after its meeting, unless the King orders during the session new elections, either for both the chambers or one of them. In this case, the Diet shall assemble, preserving its character of ordinary Diet, in the three months which follow its dissolution, at the time fixed by the King, and it can be dissolved by the King only at the expiration of four months after the commencement of its new session. The extra Diet can be dissolved by the King when he judges convenient; it must always be before the time fixed for the ordinary sessions.

ORGANIZATION OF THE CHAMBERS.

(a.) First chamber.

SECTION 6. The members of the first chamber shall be elected for nine years by provincial assemblies and municipal councilors, or the cities which take no part in provincial assemblies. Each provincial assembly and city of the class mentioned above elect, according to the population of its territory, a member of the Diet for each complete number of thirty thousand inhabitants. If the population does not amount to thirty thousand inhabitants, nevertheless the election of a member of the Diet shall take place.

SECTION 7. The provincial assemblies and competent municipal councilors shall proceed to the election of members of the first chamber as often as there shall be a vacancy, or when the King shall order new elections. For this object, and where it shall be necessary, the provincial assemblies shall assemble in extra session.

SECTION 8. Any member of the first chamber whose term has not expired at the beginning of a session, can continue till the end of the session, although during this time the nine years reckoned from the election shall have expired.

SECTION 9. For members of the first chamber can be elected only persons who have attained the age of thirty-five, and who possess and have possessed, during three years before the election, real estate valued by assessment of taxes at 80,000 riksdalers at the least; or those who, during the same time, have paid the tax to the State, for their capital or their work, on an annual income of 4,000 riksdalers at the least. If, after the election, the member of the Diet finds himself in a position where he shall be no longer eligible, he must resign his office.

SECTION 10. The election terminated, the credentials of the member of the first chamber are issued. These credentials, if he has been named by a provincial assembly, are signed by the president, and countersigned by the secretary of the assembly; if he has been elected by a city, they are signed by the president of the municipal councilors, and by two of these councilors. The said credentials must be written in form as follows:

By virtue of the election, which by the provincial assembly of N. N., or by the municipal councilors of N. N., has been made — day of —, N. N. is hereby empowered to be, during nine years to commence from the day mentioned above, member of the first chamber of the Diet. The place and date.

SECTION 11. If any one has occasion to complain of the election by a provincial assembly, or by municipal councilors, he can bring in an appeal to the King. For this purpose, he can require of the secretary of the provincial assembly or of the president of the councilors an extract of the protocol of the election, which must be delivered to the complainant immediately, or, at the latest, two days after his demand, and he shall, on pain of losing the privilege of complaining, address to the provincial government, at the latest a month after the election, the appeal which he makes to the King. The provincial government, by a statement published in the journals, shall fix a short time in which explanations on the said appeal can be delivered to it. This time having expired, the provincial government shall deliver without delay to the King the evidence and declarations relative to the appeal, as well as the explanations which shall have been presented, in order that the question can immediately be carried before the supreme tribunal and there decided.

SECTION 12. The member of the first chamber can receive no compensation for his services. If he wishes to resign, he must do so at the time of the elections, or later in the interval of the sessions, to the provincial government.

(b.) Second chamber.

SECTION 13. 1. The members of the second chamber are elected for three years, to begin from January 1 of the year following the one in which the election has taken place.

2. In the country, to which in electoral matters are united equally the cities which have no tribunal to themselves, as well as the burghs, there shall be elected a member of the Diet by each jurisdiction. As regards jurisdictions whose population exceeds 40,000 inhabitants, the King shall divide them as much as can be done by districts, which shall each elect a member of the Diet.

3. In each city whose population is 10,000 inhabitants or more, a member of the Diet is elected for the full number of 10,000 inhabitants. For the other cities which have their own tribunal, there shall be created, the first time by the King, and afterward every ten years by the chamber, separate electoral districts, as far as can be done by provinces, which shall each elect a member of the Diet. Each of these districts must contain a population of 6,000 inhabitants at the least, and 12,000 at the most.

SECTION 14. Every man has the right to vote in the commune where he resides who has the right of voting on general affairs of the commune, having an income from real estate in the country or city valued at 1,000 riksdalers ($266) at the least; the lessee for life, or, at least, five years, of agricultural lands, valued by the assessment of taxes at 6,000 riksdalers at the least; and, finally, any one who pays the tax to the state on an annual income of at least 800 riksdalers.

SECTION 15. The elections of the members of the second chamber take place before the end of the month of September which precedes the first of the three years for which they are held.

If the King orders that new elections be proceeded with, or, if otherwise, a member of the second chamber terminates his duties before the expiration of the time for which he has been elected, new elections are proceeded with immediately for the time which remains.

SECTION 16. For the country, the elections shall be held in the presence of the judge, by electors who shall have been designated in the presence of the president of the communal assembly; or, for the communes formed by one of the cities mentioned in section 13, paragraph 2, in the presence of the special administration established for the said cities. There is designated, for each commune, one elector or more, according to the population, or one elector for the full number of 1,000 inhabitants.

In the election districts composed of two or more cities, there shall be elected, before the magistrate, one elector or more, according to the population, or one elector for the full number of 500 inhabitants. These electors, for the elections to the Diet, shall assemble before the magistrate in that city of the election districts which has the most inhabitants.

The communes, which have to elect in common a member of the Diet, can, nevertheless, proceed by direct election if a plurality of voters have thus decided it. When in consequence of a resolution taken before the president of the communal assembly, before the magistrate, or, in the cities which have no tribunal to themselves, before the administration which is specially appointed, persons having the right to vote in a commune are determined upon by direct election, there shall be given a communication of this project to the provincial government, which shall require the votes of other communes belonging to the election districts, and shall publish a statement of the result obtained, that is to say, if the majority of the votes given is for the adoption or rejection of the project. In case of rejection, the question can be again taken up only after five years have passed. If, on the contrary, a change has been resolved upon, it enters into force for the elections which take place one month after the publication of the resolution, and remains applicable for five years at least, after which a resolution as to its continuance can be taken in the same manner as the resolution relating to the introduction of this change. In the direct elections, the votes are given separately for each commune, before the president of the communal assembly, the magistrate, or the administration specially proposed for the cities, in order to make the examination of the votes and the giving of credentials to the one who shall have obtained the majority. The protocols of the elections shall be sent, for the communes of the country to the judge, and for the cities which have their own tribunal, to the magistrate of the city which has the largest population.

In cities which have to choose alone one or more members of the Diet, the election takes place directly before the magistrate. The cities which have to choose several members of the Diet can be divided into election districts, in the manner established for the election of municipal councilors.

SECTION 17. For the choice of electors, as well as the members of the Diet, each voter has one voice. The one who has obtained the majority is legally elected. In case of equal division of votes, the proceedings shall be by lot.

Recourse shall be had for these elections to electoral lists, in force for the communes which must contain the enumeration of persons who have the right of voting, according to section 14.

SECTION 18. The provincial government is charged, when there must be an election for a member of the second chamber, to appoint a competent president of election, who shall cause to be announced in the churches the day and place of election, taking care to prescribe specially that the proceedings for the designation of electors take place eight days at least before the election.

If, in any parish, there is no place of divine service the Sunday on which the notice in question must be published, a competent clerk, on the demand of the clergy, shall cause the said notice to be circulated without delay.

Regarding the meeting for choosing electors, the proceedings shall be according to resolutions established for the meeting of the communal assembly, and for the council of the city, so far as they are applicable.

At the time of the choice of electors, the president of the communal assembly, or the magistrate who presides at the election, shall deliver a duly authenticated extract of the protocol of the election, as evidence of qualification, to the one or ones who shall have been charged with the powers of electors.

SECTION 19. Only individuals who have attained twenty-five years can be elected members of the second chamber, and who, according to section 14, possess, and have possessed at least one year before the election, the right of voting in the commune or in one of the communes for which they are elected.

SECTION 20. The credentials of that one who has been elected member of the second chamber are delivered to him immediately. They are signed by the judge for the election districts of the country; by the magistrate for the cities who choose alone a member of the Diet; and for the election districts composed of several cities, by the magistrate who has made the definite statement of the votes.

These credentials must be written in the following form:

At the elections which have taken place on the — day of —, in the jurisdiction of N. N., (election district of N. N., of the jurisdiction of N. N.,) or in the city (or cities) of N. N., N. N. has been elected member of the second chamber of the Diet for a term of three years, to commence from the 1st of January of the year following, (or, if the election has taken place in consequence of an ordinance of the King relative to new elections, or in consequence of a member terminating his duties before the expiration of the time for which he had been elected,) for the time to extend until the 1st of January of the year —. This shall serve as a proper credential. The place and date.

SECTION 21. The one who has been elected member of the second chamber of the Diet cannot, unless for valid reasons, refuse to accept this office.

The following cases are considered valid:

1. If the elected can urge obstacles considered by the code in force, as a case of legal prevention.

2. If he is more than sixty years of age.

3. If he has already, as member of the Diet, served in three ordinary Diets.

The resignation given at the time of the elections is examined by the one who presides at the election. If it is given later, in the interval of the sessions, it is examined by the provincial government.

SECTION 22. 1. If any one has protested against the election of a member of the second chamber, he must send an appeal to the provincial government of the place of the election, in case the election has taken place; for several cities, in various provinces, the appeal must be carried to the government of the province where the final canvass has been made. In this case the complainant can require of the judge, or of the magistrate who has made the final canvass, an extract of the protocol—an extract which must be returned to the complainant immediately, or, at the latest, two days after his demand. He shall, on pain of forfeiting his right to complain, address, at the latest, within eight days after the election, his appeal to the provincial government—which is said in section 11 enables competent persons to present their observations—and make known his decision, at the latest, before the end of the day which follows the one on which the time accorded expires.

2. Any one who has protested against the decision of the provincial government, can, at the latest, within eight days after the notification which has been made to him of it, address to the provincial government his appeal to the King, after which the proceedings shall be as said above, section 11.

3. If any one wishes to make an allegation against the decision by which his resignation, as member of the Diet, has not been admitted, the proceedings on this account, if the resignation takes place at the time of the elections conformably to paragraph 1 of the present section, and if taking place later, it is addressed to the provincial government, conformably to paragraph 2.

SECTION 23. Each member of the second chamber shall receive from the state funds, for traveling expenses and salary, 1,200 riksdalers for each ordinary session. But if the King dissolves the Diet before it has lasted four months, or if otherwise the member of the Diet leaves his office in the course of the session, before the four months have expired, also in case of extra session, the member shall receive, besides traveling expenses, a salary of 10 riksdalers per day, without the total sum exceeding 1,200 riksdalers.

The member of the chamber who shall not be present at the Diet at the required time, shall submit to a forfeiture of 10 riksdalers for each day of absence.

(c.) General provisions.

SECTION 24. The right of voting can be exercised only by him who, at the time of the elections, presents himself in person.

SECTION 25. If, at the elections of the Diet, which must be made by closed ballots, there shall be found a ticket bearing the name of a person who is not eligible, or designating a greater or less number of candidates than can be elected, or if the ticket presents some uncertainty as to the name of the person or persons elected, the said ticket shall not be counted.

SECTION 26. The functions of a member of the Diet can be exercised only by Swedish citizens belonging to the Protestant Church. As members of the Diet cannot be admitted—

(a.) Any one under guardianship.

(b.) Any one who has assigned his effects to his creditors, and who cannot prove in the manner duly prescribed that he is free from the disability.

(c.) Any one who is prosecuted, or who has been condemned for an infamous crime, or who for such crime has not been finally acquitted.

(d.) Any one who is not in the enjoyment of his civil rights, or who has been declared unworthy of pleading for others before a tribunal.

(e.) Any one who shall have been convicted of having, in the elections, sought to gain votes by means of money or presents; the one who shall have sold his vote finally, the one who, by violence and threats, shall have interfered with the liberty of the elections.

SECTION 27. If a person has been simultaneously elected member of both chambers or of one chamber for two or more districts, he may choose in which of the two chambers he will serve, or which election district he intends to represent. Nevertheless he must immediately make known his decision to the provincial government of the place for which he does not accept the office of member to the Diet.

SECTION 28. Each of the chambers must make known to the King the vacancies which occur in it, and which must be filled in the same session, or before the next session after which the King shall order the provincial government to proceed with new elections.

If, in the interval of the sessions, there occurs a vacancy in one or the other of the two chambers, the provincial government is charged to proceed with a new election.

SECTION 29. In the course of the session, no member of the Diet can resign his office without furnishing reasons recognized as valid by the chamber to which he belongs. Nevertheless, the present resolution effects no change to what is said above, relating to the right he has to resign his office at the time of the elections.

SECTION 30. Each chamber has the right to impose fines upon any member of the Diet who, without proper reasons, does not present himself at the desired time, or who otherwise, without authority from the chamber, and without legitimate reasons, abstains from taking part in its deliberations. These fines are received to the profit of the public treasury.

OPENING AND CLOSING OF THE DIET.

SECTION 31. The Diet shall assemble in the capital of the kingdom, excepting in cases where the approach of an enemy, pest, or other obstacles of the same gravity shall render it impossible or dangerous for its liberty and security. In this case, it belongs to the King to designate and declare officially another place of meeting, conformably to the resolutions of section 50 on the law on the form of government.

SECTION 32. 1. Any one who shall have been elected member of the Diet must, the first time he presents himself there after his election, submit his credentials to the revision of the minister of state and of justice, or the one whom the King shall have designated in his place. The examination of his credentials must take place the same day on which the Diet shall assemble, or as soon as possible, in case the member shall present himself later. This verification, which shall take place in the presence of three of the deputies of the office of the public debt, has for an object to ascertain if the credentials are in the prescribed form, and shall, at the Diet for which a new election for both chambers, or for all the members of one of them, has taken place, be completed within three days, but at other Diets the day when the credentials are presented.

2. To each chamber, nevertheless, it belongs to verify the competency of its members, not only of those whose credentials have not been acknowledged valid, but also of those against whom otherwise observations can be presented in consequence of the present fundamental law. This one, whose right to serve in the Diet is put in question, retains, nevertheless, his office as member of the Diet, until he shall have been declared incompetent to act.

SECTION 33. As soon as the verification prescribed in paragraph 1 of the preceding section has taken place, and the minister of state and of justice, or the one who has been designated in his place, has informed the chambers of what concerns their respective members, each of the two chambers shall send immediately to the King a deputation, to request him to name a president and a vice-president, whom the King shall choose for the two chambers from their respective members.

1. The president and the vice-president shall take the oath before the King, as follows: "I, N. N., appointed for this Diet president (vice-president) of the first (of the second) chamber, swear before God and His holy gospel, that I wish to sustain and defend, and that I will sustain and defend, with all my powers, the authority of the King and the rights of the Diet, conformably to the law on the form of government of the kingdom. I will conform myself equally and without reservation to the other fundamental laws of the kingdom. I will be faithful to this oath, as truly as God shall save my body and my soul."

When, in any of the cases provided for in sections 91, 93, and 94 of the law on the form of government, the Diet assembles to consider on the convocation of those cases directly designated in section 95 of the same fundamental law, each chamber has the right to choose for itself a president and a vice-president, who take before the chamber the above-written oath.

Before the appointment of the president, as said above, the presidency belongs to that one of the members present who has served in the greatest number of Diets; if two or more members have served in the same number of Diets, the presidency belongs to the eldest.

SECTION 34. The King shall make known publicly the day of the opening of the Diet, which cannot be fixed later than the fifteenth day (not holy day) after the meeting of the Diet. On this day, the members of the Diet, after having attended divine service, shall assemble in the hall of the throne, or, if it is judged best, the speech shall be delivered by one of the ministers of state. On this occasion the King shall communicate to the ordinary Diet an exposition of the condition of the kingdom since the last ordinary Diet. He shall submit equally to the Diet, in two copies, one for each chamber, a proposition relative to the condition and financial needs of the state, containing also a project relative to the means by which imposts can be demanded, such as the necessities of the state requires outside its ordinary resources. But if the Diet is assembled in extra session, the reasons of the convocation are made known to it, and it shall receive communication of the projects and propositions on which the chambers must deliberate. Nevertheless, the King remains free to present further projects.

When the King opens the Diet, as is said above, the presidents must on the same occasion, and in the name of the chambers, present to him their respectful homage.

SECTION 35. Each chamber can choose and appoint its secretaries. The other officials, whom each chamber shall judge necessary during the Diet, shall be appointed, together with the secretary, by the president and some members designated for this purpose by the chambers.

SECTION 36. If the King wishes to dissolve the Diet, and order new elections in all the kingdom, either for both chambers or for one of them, he shall convoke the Diet in the hall of the throne, where the resolution relative to it shall be communicated to it.

At the close of the Diet the members shall present themselves, on the convocation of the King, after having attended divine service, in the hall of the throne, and, through their presidents, present to him their good wishes. The reading of the proceedings of the Diet follow, after which the King in person, or one of the ministers of state, shall pronounce the Diet closed.

PREPARATION OF BUSINESS.

SECTION 37. 1. In each ordinary Diet, and within eight days after the opening, shall be formed a committee on the constitution, a committee on finance, a committee on taxes, a committee on the bank, and a committee on legislation. The standing committees of the Diet shall consist of—for the committee on the constitution, 20 members; the committee on finance, 24 members; the committee on taxes, 20 members; the committee on the bank, 16 members; and the committee on legislation, 16 members. Each of the chambers shall choose for itself one-half of these members, either by direct election, or, if the chamber thus decides, by means of electors. When it shall be judged necessary, there can be formed, in virtue of a resolution of the chambers, special committees to consider certain questions which belong to standing committees, and, on their demand, the number of committees can be augmented.

2. Each chamber can choose for itself substitutes to replace the members of a committee in case of vacancy.

3. If in one of the chambers there arises a question which is not in the province of the committees above mentioned, but, nevertheless, of a nature to be considered by a committee, there shall be formed a committee for the occasion, charged to consider the said question. This committee shall consist of as many members as the chamber shall judge necessary, and of its own members.

4. In the extra sessions, only the number of committees shall be formed necessary for the preparation of business, which, according to section 2, shall be submitted to them.

SECTION 38. It belongs to the committee on the constitution to examine the fundamental laws of the kingdom, and to propose to the Diet the modifications which it judges absolutely necessary, useful, or possible to add to it, as also to pronounce upon questions relative to the fundamental laws, which are submitted to it by the chambers.

2. The committee is charged to require protocols of the council of state, with the exception of those which concern ministerial affairs and those of military command, and which can be demanded only as far as they relate to the affairs known and indicated by the committee. The law on the form of government has established as regards the right and duty incumbent on the committee, after the examination of these protocols, to make known to the Diet the observations to which it has given place as to take such measures required in consequence of the said observations; and in case where a deputy, or even a committee, other than that on the constitution, alleges that the council of state, or some one of its members or reporters, have not properly exercised their functions, the same law on the form of government enacts equally regarding the right and duty of the committee on the constitution to make known its opinion before the question shall be decided by the Diet. It belongs also to the committee to decide the differences which arise between the two chambers upon the question as to what committee a matter must be sent, and also to decide between the chambers and its president, when he refuses to make a proposition.

SECTION 39. The committee on finance, which shall receive communication of the proposition made by the King to the Diet, relating to the condition and financial needs of the state, and which has the right to demand the communication of all the accounts and acts of the treasury, is charged with verifying, examining, and making known in a report the condition and administration of the treasury, and of the office of the public debt; also of proposing not only the sums required by the necessities, after all the reductions and necessary retrenchments have been made, but also the sum which, conformably to section 63 of the law on the form of government, must be reserved for special cases. He is charged also with proposing the amount provided for taxes.

The committee is charged equally with examining and verifying whether the payments made or dispositions of the funds of the state do not exceed the amount of the head-titles established in the budget determined upon by the Diet; also whether the payments are founded on the properly raised allowance, or on the ordinances of the King, duly countersigned, or if they are accompanied with receipts from those who have received the funds. If, contrary to the resolution of the Diet, it is found that the sums carried to the title-page have been applied to other objects than those which belong to this title-page, or that one of the credits opened by the Diet has been exceeded, the committee must point out to the chambers the official who shall have countersigned such an ordinance, after which the proceedings shall be conformably to sections 106, 107, of the law on the form of government. Nevertheless, the committee cannot, contrary to the provisions of section 90 of the law on the form of government, include in its censure the ordinances made by the King; the accountable officials, charged with public disbursements, can no longer be cited personally before the committee or before the Diet, but the latter may, if it is necessary, make known to the King the motives which exist for demanding that the said official be legally proceeded with.

SECTION 40. The committee on taxes is charged with preparing all the questions which are referred to it by the chambers, and which relate to the changes in the dispositions on the establishment of taxes, as well as to present (under the form of project) the amount of the various taxes. It is charged equally, when the financial needs have been established and appointed, to propose the means of increasing the taxes, if it is necessary, or of diminishing them if it is possible, and to submit to the Diet a project of law on the taxes made in consequence. The committee can, besides, in questions relative to taxes, propose what seems to it equitable and useful.

SECTION 41. It devolves on the committee on the bank to control the administration and condition of the bank, or to propose to the chambers, as also in cases where the Diet has delegated power to it, to give instructions relative to the administration of this establishment.

SECTION 42. 1. The committee on legislation shall give its advice on all projects sent to it by the chambers, in order to establish, modify, explain, or abrogate the general legislation, civil, criminal, or ecclesiastical. Under the title of civil and criminal laws must be included also the military laws and ordinances for those of such a nature as are applicable to civilians.

2. The committee shall examine also the accounts made by the attorney general of the Diet, as well as his journal and correspondence, and shall make a report relative thereto to the Diet.

SECTION 43. No member of the council of state, neither of the supreme tribunal, can form a part of the committees or take part in the election of the said committees. No one of those of whom the Diet can exact any responsibility whatever can form part of a committee which has to scrutinize its own administration.

SECTION 44. The committee shall choose for themselves their chairman and their vice-chairman. Until they have been named, the chairman shall be that one of the members who has served in the greatest number of Diets; and if two or more have served in an equal number of Diets, by the eldest. The permanent committees shall choose separately their secretary, and, with his concurrence, the other officials judged necessary. In the temporary committees the members shall choose among themselves, and for each matter specially, a reporter authorized to commit to writing the opinion of the committee on the matter.

SECTION 45. All the committees must assemble in four days from the one on which they were formed. They must give, as soon as possible, their opinions.

If a member of a committee has neglected three successive times from taking part in the deliberations, without lawful reasons, the chairman must give advice of it to the chamber which the affair concerns, in order that another member shall be designated, in the order prescribed, to act in the committee.

SECTION 46. If a committee has need to procure, verbally or by writing, information on the part of a functionary of the King or of a general administration, the committee can address itself, through its president, to that member of the council of state whom the King designates for each Diet, and request an order from the King, in order that the persons or administrations in question may furnish the desired information. Nevertheless, the office of state, (Stats-Kontoret,) and the administrations of the bank, and the office of the public debt, in questions of compatibility, must give immediately the information desired.

SECTION 47. If a permanent committee judges it necessary, in order to consider any matter, to unite itself to another permanent committee, this union shall take place by means of delegates, in such a manner as the committees shall agree upon. This joint committee shall have the right, on questions considered by it, to report its opinion without the other members of the two committees taking part in it.

SECTION 48. When, in a committee, a secret vote is to be taken, a secret ballot must be drawn and laid aside, which ballot shall be opened only in case when, at the counting of the votes, they shall be found equally divided. If a majority has already been obtained, the said ballot must be destroyed immediately, without having been opened.

The member who does not approve of the resolution of the committee is free to make known to the chambers his particular opinion at the same time with the opinion of the committee, and in this case this opinion must be sent in writing to the committee. Nevertheless, the delivery of the report of the committee cannot be hindered by this fact.

SECTION 49. The reports of the committee are signed by the chairman.

SECTION 50. If the King demands of the Diet special delegates for conferring with him on matters which he judges a duty to be kept secret, twelve members are chosen, six by each chamber. Nevertheless, these delegates have not the power to form decisions, but only to give to the King their opinion on matters which he has communicated to them. The King designates the secretary and other clerks of these delegates.

OF THE MANNER OF TREATING MATTERS IN THE CHAMBERS.

SECTION 51. The presidents, or, in case they are prevented, the vice-presidents, are authorized in each chamber to make the convocation of the assemblies, to make the report of affairs, to sum up and make known their expressed opinions, to make propositions relative to the resolutions to be taken, and to maintain order in the assemblies, all according to the resolutions of the present fundamental law. Nevertheless, one who exercises the presidency can take part neither at the deliberations nor in the votes, and can make no other propositions than those which concern the observing of the fundamental laws, special resolutions of the Diet or of the chambers, or further regulations established on the manner of treating the affairs of the Diet.

The president has not the right to close a session of the chamber without its consent.

SECTION 52. In the sessions of the chambers, each member has the right to express himself freely to the protocol, both to pass his judgment on all questions submitted for deliberation, and on the legality of everything which takes place in the chamber. Each one speaks, following the order in which he is inscribed and finds himself called, and no one is authorized to speak outside of the protocol. No one must allow himself to make use of personalities; if this takes place, the chamber must examine if the member who has thus forgotten himself must receive from the president suitable representations and warnings, or if the affair must be sent to competent tribunals, or even if it should be held to no account.

SECTION 53. In the presence of the King, the Diet or the chambers must neither deliberate nor take resolutions on any matter whatever.

The members of the council of state can appear in each chamber, with the right to take part in the deliberations, but not in the voting, unless they are members of the council of state. Nevertheless, the members of the council of state, when, according to the law on the form of government, they are charged with the administration of the kingdom, even as the guardians of the minor King, can neither assist in the deliberations of the chambers, nor take part in the voting.

In affairs which personally concern a member of the chamber, he is permitted to assist at the deliberations, but not in voting.

SECTION 54. The communications and propositions of the King, with the exception of those mentioned in section 34, shall be presented to the two chambers through a member of the council of state; they must always be accompanied with the opinion of the said council, and, when it relates to establishing, modifying, explaining, or abrogating general laws, civil, criminal, and ecclesiastical, also with that of the supreme tribunal.

SECTION 55. Motions, which are of the jurisdiction of permanent committees, can be made by a member of the Diet in the chamber to which it belongs, in ten days after the opening of the Diet. Later, and with the exception of projects on the fundamental laws, a member cannot make such motions, at least if they do not relate directly to a resolution taken in one of the two chambers, or to a matter treated there, or to some event which shall be brought forward during the Diet.

In matters which are not in the jurisdiction of the permanent committees, motions can be presented as long as the Diet assemblies.

Motions must always be expressed in writing, in order to be added to the protocol. Matters of a different matter cannot be united in the same motion.

SECTION 56. The propositions of the King, as also motions in matters which are of the jurisdiction of permanent committees, cannot be submitted to the decision of the chamber before the committee shall have given its opinion. If the motions concern other matters, and are not exclusively special to the chamber, they cannot be adopted without a previous reference to the committee. But the special questions belonging exclusively to one of the two chambers can be decided immediately.

SECTION 57. If a member or a committee, other than the one on the constitution, possesses the chamber with this fact, that the council of state, or one of its members or reporters, has not properly filled his office, the following formula alone must be employed :

"Allegations have been made against the council of state, either such or such a member, or such or such a reporter of the council of state, and demand is made for the sending back of the matter to the committee on the constitution, before which explanations shall be given."

This disposition must positively take place immediately. The resolutions of section 107 of the law on the form of government shall be applicable to the deliberations of the chamber on such a question, if it concerns a resolution of the King in affairs concerning the rights and interests of individuals or corporations.

SECTION 58. When a proposition or a motion shall come to the chamber for the first time, it must, unless the committee returns it immediately and with the unanimity of the committee, be adjourned to the next assembly, or the said dismission will take place if the question is not abandoned, or, if concerning the chamber exclusively, it has not been otherwise decided. Each member can express his opinion on the matter, which is also addressed to the committee, yet without this act delaying the dismission.

If the question arises to which committee a matter must be referred, the question can only for that meeting where it arose be laid on the table. At the next meeting it must necessarily be disposed of.

SECTION 59. The opinion of the permanent committee who shall succeed it shall be reported to the two chambers simultaneously, as soon as possible, for the solution of the matter. After the first notification of this report, the resolution to consider the affair shall be adjourned. At the second notification it can, on the collective demand of several members, be adjourned anew, whether there shall then have been deliberations on it or not. But when the matter shall come for the third time, it must be decided.

Regarding opinions emanating from temporary committees, they shall be the subject of a report to the chamber which shall have created these committees; the matter shall be proceeded with as said above. An immediate decision can be taken relating to propositions and preparatory inquiries of the committee, unless a member of the chamber demands an adjournment.

SECTION 60. When a matter shall be decided definitely, a reading of the parts relative to it must be made, if a member of the chamber demands it. The definite solution of a matter, which has been the subject of deliberation, cannot be undertaken before the chamber, on the reference of its president, has declared the deliberation closed. After this declaration the motion must be put. If a question can be the subject of adoption or rejection, the first proposition made by the president must be for the adoption. If decided in the negative, and if, in the course of deliberation, observations or amendments have been made on the matter, the following proposition must conform itself thereto. If a project contains several parts, which cannot conveniently be decided together, a special proposition must be made relating to each part identically, in the same order as prescribed above. The propositions shall be always decided by yes or no and the president shall declare what the vote is, a declaration to which all must conform themselves, unless the ballot shall decide, which cannot be refused; freedom shall be given, moreover, to each one to commit his personal opinion to the protocol. No one must essay to renew the resolution in question by a new deliberation. When the voting shall take place, the proposition of voting, as well as the contra-proposition, must be immediately clearly composed, adjusted, and settled, and the ballot shall take place immediately after, but no proposition can be made, neither any ballot authorized on the question whether the ballot must take place.

The ballot shall always take place by means of printed tickets, without exterior signs—simple, closed, and rolled. In order to avoid the equal division of votes by yes and no, in affairs where an absolute majority is required, the president, at each ballot and before the counting of the votes, shall put aside one of the tickets, which shall be sealed. If, when at the counting of the other tickets or ballots, there shall be found an equal division, the sealed ticket shall be opened and shall decide the majority. If the majority is already obtained, the said vote shall be destroyed, without having been opened.

SECTION 61. The president cannot refuse a proposition, unless he judges that the question may be contrary to the tenor of the fundamental laws, and he must always give the reason for his refusal. If the chamber, nevertheless, insists that the proposition shall be made, the president must declare that the deliberation is adjourned, and the matter shall be committed to the committee on the constitution, which, without delay, and in relating his advice, must declare if the question is in opposition or conformity to the fundamental laws. If the committee has declared that the proposition is not contrary to the fundamental laws, it can no longer be refused.

SECTION 62. The resolutions of a chamber, in questions which do not concern this chamber exclusively, shall be communicated to the other chamber, under the form of extracts of the protocol. If the matter has been treated by a permanent committee or a special committee, which succeeds it, communication of the resolution taken shall be made to the said committee in the same matter. If a member, who does not approve of the resolution of the chamber, wishes to make known his opinion to the other chamber, he has the right to do so. He must in this case join his opinion to the protocol, after which information of it is given to the other chamber, by means of an extract of the said protocol; but by this act the progress of the resolution can in no case be retarded.

SECTION 63. When a question arises on which the committee has expressed itself, the chamber can adopt a resolution, either immediately conformably to the advice of the committee, or without regard to what it has proposed, or, if the matter seems to demand a more ample inquiry, to order its recommitment to the committee.

If the chambers form, on the subject of a question, on which the permanent committee or the special committee which takes its place have expressed themselves, resolutions essentially or partly different, the committee shall try to conciliate as much as possible the two opinions, and shall present a project thereon to the chambers. If the question has been treated by a temporary committee, and if the chamber which has instituted the committee does not reject the motion made on the question, the resolution shall be, by means of an extract of the protocol, communicated to the other chamber; the latter shall act on the said question, either immediately or after the sending back to a committee instituted in the chamber itself, to make a further examination of it. If this chamber then does not adopt the resolution taken by the chamber which first has treated the affair, the said resolution, rejected or modified, is sent again to this last chamber; the latter, in case the resolution has been modified only, submits the matter to a new deliberation, and if the resolution of the first-mentioned chamber is not accepted without changes, the matter returns to the other chamber, to be there submitted to a new examination.

The decisions on which the chambers agree are resolutions of the Diet. If, the matter having been treated as is said above, the two chambers do not take a unanimous resolution, this matter cannot, except in cases mentioned in section 65, be again taken up in the same Diet.

SECTION 64. Every project having for its end the establishing, modifying, explaining, or abolishing fundamental laws, a question which can be raised only in an ordinary session, can be rejected during the same Diet, but it shall be accepted and approved only as a project until adjourned to the first ordinary session, which takes place after new general elections for the second chamber, in order to be submitted to a new trial. If this project is then accepted by the two chambers, it becomes a resolution of the Diet. The chambers have not the right to make any change in an adjourned project. The resolution to be taken on an adjourned project can be sent to no other Diet than the aforesaid, unless there is unanimity on the subject between the King and the two chambers.

SECTION 65. When, in questions relative to the expenses of the state, or to taxes, or concerning the revenues and expenses, as also the direction and administration of the bank of the kingdom, or of the office of the public debt, the chambers take different resolutions, which shall not be conciliated by the project of a competent committee, the two chambers shall vote separately on the different resolutions taken by each of them, and the one which has the greatest number of votes shall become the resolution of the Diet. To avoid in this ballot the equal division of votes, one vote shall be put aside in the second chamber and sealed. In case the other votes are equally divided, this ballot shall be opened and shall decide the question. If a majority is already obtained, the ballot must be destroyed without having been opened.

SECTION 66. In case of the election of the King or heir to the throne, a commission shall be formed composed of 64 persons, each chamber designating 32, within itself and by secret ballot. This commission shall be charged, in case of dissent between the two chambers, to determine the choice. The day after the commission shall have been constituted, the chambers shall proceed to the election of the King or heir to the throne. If the choice of the chambers unites on one and the same person, he shall be considered elected. In a contrary case the commission shall decide. Nevertheless, the commission cannot vote for others than those who, in each chamber, shall have obtained the most votes, each chamber presenting no more than one candidate. The members of the commission who by these duties are not deprived of their rights as members of the Diet, shall assemble the day after the one on which the elections shall have taken place in the chambers, and shall not separate until the choice is made. The one of the two persons balloted for, on whom the majority of the votes in the commission shall fall, shall be legally elected. In the case provided for in section 94 of the law on the form of government, the commission shall be elected in ten days after the one fixed for the meeting of the Diet in the act of convocation.

SECTION 67. If it is necessary to designate a guardian for the King, (minor,) the chambers shall appoint, at the latest, on the day after the opening of the Diet, a commission composed of the same number of persons, and formed in the same manner as said in the preceding section. The said commission shall ballot in order to elect guardians, the number of whom is fixed by the Diet, which number shall be one, three, or five. Each member of the commission shall bear on a secret ballot the names of the persons he considers worthy to fulfill these functions, and a sufficient number so that it may contain one more than the number fixed by the Diet. Of the names borne on this ballot, the one who shall have obtained the most votes shall be placed the first in a new ballot, and this shall be the majority of the commission, which shall decide. The proceedings shall be the same for the following one as having obtained the most votes; thus with the next, until the number of guardians prescribed shall be filled. The commission cannot adjourn until the election shall be completed, and this election shall be considered as a resolution of the Diet. If it happens that the chambers, within the three days after the opening of the Diet, shall not agree upon the number of guardians, there shall be appointed, as said above, for the commission, and with the same number of persons, a special committee, who shall decide this question by ballot in the term of ten days, the decision having the authority and effect of a resolution of the Diet. The commission must afterward have an election also in the term of ten days, so that in all cases the election of the guardians shall be accomplished in seven days after the opening of the Diet.

SECTION 68. In consequence of section 96 of the law on the form of government, each ordinary Diet shall designate a man known to be versed in jurisprudence and for his perfect honor, who shall be authorized to watch over the administration of the laws by the judges and officials, and to prosecute before the court of the kingdom, or before other competent tribunals, according to legal forms, of which section 102 of the same fundamental laws regulates the organization and grants, those who, in the exercise of their duties, are suspected of having, through favor, partiality, or other motive, committed some illegalities or neglected to fulfill properly their duties.

This attorney general of the Diet, whose rights and duties are more fully defined as well in the law on the form of government as in special instructions, shall be elected by forty-eight electors designated for this purpose, and of whom twenty-four shall be chosen by each chamber by itself. These electors, who must assemble for election the same day they shall have been chosen, cannot adjourn until the election be accomplished, and each one shall propose forthwith, in a secret ballot, the person upon whom the vote must fall. If a person obtains more than half the votes, he is regularly elected. If the votes are divided between several persons in such a manner that the requisite majority is acquired by no one, there shall be a new secret ballot for the choice of the one who shall have obtained the most votes, or, if he is not accepted, for the choice of the one who shall have had the greatest number of votes after him, and so following. If, after all these ballots, no one shall have obtained the majority here prescribed, a new ballot shall be made, over all those which have been the subjects of the previous ballots, and he who shall obtain the most votes shall be considered as regularly elected.

The electors must at the same time that they designate the attorney general of the Diet elect in the same manner a person possessing the qualities required of the said official, in order to succeed him in case of his decease before the following ordinary Diet shall have proceeded to a new election, and to replace him if he becomes seriously ill, or is otherwise incapacitated. In case, while the Diet is assembled, the attorney general of the Diet resigns or dies, the Diet shall immediately put in his place the person who shall have been designated for his successor. If, during the session, the successor designated by the attorney general of the Diet resigns, or if he enters upon duties as attorney general of the Diet, or if he dies, the proceedings shall be as above for the election of another person fulfilling the desired conditions.

If one of the above cases presents itself in the interval of the sessions, the right of the Diet in this respect shall be exercised by the deputies of the bank and the office of the public debt.

SECTION 69. The ordinary Diet shall appoint every three years a commission of forty-eight persons, twenty-four of whom shall be chosen by each chamber, by itself and by secret ballot. This commission, according to sections 103 and 104 of the law on the form of government, has the right of judging if all the members of the supreme tribunal merit to retain their important offices, or if certain ones among them, without it can be proved they have committed faults or crimes, which are provided for in section 102 of the law on the form of government, ought nevertheless to be deprived of the right of exercising royal justice.

This commission shall assemble the same day on which it shall have been appointed. All the members of the commission shall vote first, one after the other, on this question, in order to know if they shall have a ballot for the exclusion of one of the members of the supreme tribunal. If this question is decided negatively, unanimously, or by an absolute majority, all the members of the supreme tribunal must be retained. If it is decided affirmatively, each of the members of the commission shall prepare a secret ticket, bearing the names of those members of the supreme tribunal, in a greater or less number, whom he considers deserve to be excluded. Among these members the three who shall unite the greatest number of votes between them, shall be submitted, one after the other, to a new ballot. In order that one or several members may be declared dismissed from the confidence of the Diet, two-thirds of the votes are required; afterward the proceedings shall be in conformity to the resolutions of section 103 of the law on the form of government.

SECTION 70. The ordinary Diet shall designate every three years six persons, distinguished for their knowledge, to watch over the liberty of the press, conjointly with the attorney general of the Diet, who shall be their president. These delegates, two of whom besides the attorney general of the Diet must be jurisconsults, must be appointed by the ballot of twenty-four electors, chosen by each of the chambers by itself, twelve for each of them. If in the interval of the sessions the functions of a member cease, the others shall choose a competent person to take his place.

SECTION 71. Each ordinary Diet shall choose by forty-eight electors, of whom twenty-four shall be chosen by each chamber by itself, deputies charged to administer, in conformity with special regulations, the funds and property of the bank of the kingdom and of the office of the public debt. These deputies shall be for each administration, and if, in questions submitted to the ballot, the votes shall be equally divided on two different opinions, the vote of the president shall be the preponderating one. The election shall be made by secret ballot, and in such a manner that for each administration the president shall be chosen first, then the other six members. For each administration the deputies can choose among themselves a vice-president, charged to take the place of the president in case he is incapacitated.

SECTION 72. In each Diet there shall be appointed delegated comptrollers each year, of whom six shall be designated by each of the two chambers. These delegated comptrollers are charged to verify, in conformity to the law on the form of government, and to special instructions, the condition, management, and administration of the treasury, the bank of the kingdom, and the office of the public debt. Each revision shall embrace the account of one year. It shall commence every year, the 15th of August, or, if this is a holiday, the day following, and must be terminated in two months. The delegated comptrollers shall choose among themselves their president, who shall have the ruling vote in case of an equal division of votes by ballot. The observations which the delegated comptrollers believe themselves justified in making in their report to the Diet, shall be, after the explanations relative to it have been furnished, sent by the following ordinary Diet to a competent committee for their examination and further action.

SECTION 73. At the same time and in the same manner as the deputies and comptrollers are appointed, according to the two preceding sections, substitutes shall be designated to take their places in case they shall be incapacitated, viz: three substitutes for the deputies of the bank, three also for the office of the public debt, and six for the annual delegated comptrollers.

SECTION 74. The members of the commission and the electors of the Diet shall choose a president of their own number.

SECTION 75. In every election care shall be taken to observe that the tickets of names, to be valid, shall be simple, closed, and rolled, without exterior signs, and that they present no uncertainty as to the name of persons, neither any error as to their number. When circumstances demand it, the decision shall be by lot between the persons who, in the elections, shall have obtained an equal number of votes.

SECTION 76. On the adoption of a resolution it cannot be changed, but such an addition can be made to it as shall not constitute a change. After the adoption of a protocol, with the consent of the chamber and the speaker, expressions employed by the latter, and the discussion to which it shall have given place, can be suppressed. But such expressions on which the resolution is evidently based cannot be suppressed.

SECTION 77. The member of the Diet who has not been present during the adoption of a resolution by the chamber to which he belongs, has the right to have stated in the protocol this fact, that he has not taken part in this resolution; but he has no right to find fault with the resolution adopted by the members present.

SECTION 78. The Diet, or each chamber separately, in matters which concern it exclusively, has the right to establish regulating orders which, beside the fundamental laws, they judge necessary for the treatment of matters or the maintenance of order, either in the chambers or in the committees. In these orders nothing contrary to the fundamental laws, or to others in force, can be introduced.

COMMUNICATION OF THE RESOLUTIONS OF THE DIET.

SECTION 79. The representations to the King, resolved upon by the Diet, as also the response by this body to the projects emanating from the King, must be made to him in writing. As regards the propositions of the King, in questions for establishing, modifying, explaining, or abrogating the fundamental laws, the response of the Diet, if the resolution contains an approbation of the King's projects, shall be given in the hall of the throne on the day the King shall have fixed.

SECTION 80. For matters which shall have been treated by a permanent committee, or the special committee which takes its place, the documents which have emanated from the Diet shall be committed to writing, and expedited by the chancellor of the committee which shall have treated the matter.

The compiling and sending of other documents, common to the two chambers, as well as the resolutions of the Diet, shall be confided to a special chancellor of the Diet, under the superintendence of two members of the first chamber and two members of the second chamber, designated for this purpose, who shall be equally authorized to choose and appoint, conjointly with the presidents and vice-presidents, the clerks whom the Diet shall judge necessary for this purpose.

No resolution of the Diet can be sent away if it has not been previously verified and adopted before the chambers. The resolutions of the Diet shall be signed by the members. The other transmissions emanating from the Diet shall be signed only by the presidents.

SECTION 81. The ordinances and general regulations adopted in common by the King and the Diet, shall be published only in the King's name, and signed with his signature.

SECTION 82. The protocols of the chambers and the other acts of the Diet shall be as quickly as possible printed at the expense of the state, the acts wholly, and the protocols in such a measure as each of the chambers, in whatever concerns it, shall judge best.

In faith of which we have confirmed and sanctioned what precedes, placing thereto our signatures and our seals.

ORDER OF SUCCESSION,

Established by the King and the estates of the kingdom, in virtue of which the male descendants of the very high and very powerful prince, his royal highness the Prince of Sweden, Prince John Baptiste Jules de Ponte-Corvo, shall have the right to the throne of Sweden, as well as to take the reins of government of the kingdom of Sweden. Örebro, September 26, A. D. 1810.

We, Charles, by the grace of God, King of Sweden, of the Goths and Vandals, &c., &c., heir of Norway, duke of Schleswig-Holstein, of Stormarie, and of Ditsmarsen, counts of Oldenburg and of Dalmenhorst, &c., &c., &c., make known: that the estates of the kingdom, having unanimously adopted and resolved upon the order of succession, in virtue of which the male descendant of the very high and very powerful prince, his royal highness the Prince of Sweden, Prince Jean Baptiste Jules, shall have the right to the throne of Sweden, as well as to take the reins of the government of the kingdom of Sweden, and this fundamental law having been presented to our approbation, we have, in virtue of the right which belongs to us, according to section 85 of the law in the form of government, been pleased to adopt, approve, and confirm this order of succession, consented to by the estates of the kingdom of Sweden, such as follows, word for word:

Order of succession, by which the male descendant of the very high and very powerful prince, his royal highness the Prince of Sweden, Prince Jean Baptiste Jules de Ponte-Corvo, shall have the right to the throne of Sweden, as well as to take the reins of the government of the kingdom of Sweden.

Done and resolved upon by the King and the estates of the kingdom in extra Diet held at Örebro, September 26, 1810.

We, the undersigned, the estates of the kingdom of Sweden, counts, barons, bishops, orders of the nobility, of the clergy, of the burghers, and the peasants, here assembled at Örebro in general and extraordinary Diet, make known: that the very high and very powerful prince, his royal highness the Prince of Sweden, Prince Charles Augustus, having deceased without male descendants, and we, the undersigned, having, by the act of election dated August 21, 1810, elected the very high and very powerful prince, Jean Baptiste Jules de Ponte-Corvo, prince royal of the kingdom of Sweden, to succeed with the conditions determined by the said act of election, as well as by the act of acceptance signed, on our demand, by the said prince to his royal Majesty, our very gracious King and actual master, Charles XIII, after his death, (which God, the all-powerful, deign in His grace to retard a long time,) in the government of the kingdom of Sweden and its dependencies, to be crowned and to receive fealty as King of Sweden, and to govern the kingdom, we have, for the male and legitimate descendants of his royal highness, Jean Baptiste Jules, Prince de Ponte-Corvo, been pleased to commit to writing, and decree the present order of succession to the throne and government of Sweden, in the manner and with the conditions herein expressly determined.

SECTION 1. The marriage already concluded of his royal highness, the Prince Royal Jean Baptiste Jules de Ponte Corvo, having been blessed with a male heir, and being yet the first-born son of his royal highness, shall succeed to him in the government, and, after him, his male descendants in direct line, in the order in which they are the nearest to the head of the family. If the male line of the first-born son is extinct, the government shall then fall to the second son of his royal highness, with the right of succession for his male descendants, following the order determined for the first-born; that is to say, according as they are in direct line the nearest to the head of the family. If the male line of the second son is also extinct, the right of succession falls to the third, and thus one after the other, of the other sons of his royal highness, in the same order and in direct descent, following the right of primogeniture as is prescribed herein, through the descent of the first-born.

SECTION 2. If the King of Sweden dies without leaving a male heir, but the surviving queen is enccinte, the council of state shall govern the affairs of state with the royal power and authority, in the manner and according to the conditions indicated in sections 41 and 93 of the law on the form of government, until the estates of the kingdom in the time indicated by the law on the form of government shall be able to assemble for the purpose of establishing the regency of the kingdom. If the queen gives birth to a male child, the estates of the kingdom shall appoint guardians to the minor king, in the manner prescribed in section 94 of the law on the form of government. If the child of the queen is of the female sex, the one of the family who, by order of primogeniture, is the nearest heir of the deceased king, as is said in section 1, shall take the reins of government in the capacity of king.

SECTION 3. The daughters of the royal family and their descendants, though they be males, have no right to the crown, neither to the government of Sweden.

SECTION 4. The second section of the law on the form of government orders expressly that the King must always profess the pure evangelical faith, such as is established and explained by the unaltered Confession of Augsburg, and the decree of the synod of Upsala of the year 1593. The princes of the royal house must also be educated in the same doctrine and in the kingdom. Any one of the royal family who shall not profess the said doctrines shall be deprived of all right of succession.

SECTION 5. No prince of the royal house can marry without the knowledge and authorization of the King. The marriage made without this authorization carry privation to all right of succession to the throne, as much for the prince himself as for his children and descendants. It shall be the same, if with or without the knowledge and authorization of the King he marries the daughter of a private Swede or foreigner. Nevertheless, he shall not be prevented, with the authority of the King, to marry a person of the royal house of Sweden, if she is not related to him to the degree where marriage is prohibited according to the Swedish law.

SECTION 6. The princesses of the royal house cannot contract a marriage without the knowledge and authorization of the King. They shall not be permitted to marry a Swede outside of the royal house.

SECTION 7. The princes and princesses of the royal house of Sweden cannot undertake a journey to a foreign country without the knowledge and authorization of the King.

SECTION 8. No prince of the royal house of Sweden can, without the consent of the King and the estates of the kingdom, become prince of a foreign state, although he may be called there by election, heirship, or marriage; otherwise, he and his descendants lose all right to succeed to the throne of Sweden.

SECTION 9. If the misfortune arrive that all the dynasty to which the right of succession to the kingdom is reserved is extinguished in the male, or lose the right of succession, for having neglected to observe what the present order of succession expressly prescribes, the throne shall be vacant, and the estates of the kingdom shall then elect a new dynasty.

In faith of which, we, the estates of the kingdom of Sweden, have approved and decreed all which precedes, in placing thereto our signatures and our seals. Done at Örebro, September 26, A. D. 1810.

For the nobility:

CLAES FLEMING, [L. s.]
Marshal for the Nobility.

For the clergy:

JAC. AXCL. LINDBLOM, [L. s.]
President.

For the burghers:

J. WEGELIN, [L. s.]
President.

For the peasants:

LARS OLSSON, [L. s.]
President.

All which is stipulated above we will not only accept ourselves as irrevocable, fundamental law, but also we command and order all who owe faith, respect, and obedience to us and to our successors, as well as to the kingdom, to recognize the present order of succession, to observe, conform, and submit to it.

In faith of which we have signed and confirmed these presents with our own hand, and have placed thereto our royal seal. Done at Örebro, September 26, A. D. 1810.

CHARLES. [L. s.]

LAW ON THE LIBERTY OF THE PRESS.

Adopted by the estates of the kingdom and sanctioned by the King, July 16, A. D. 1812 at Örebro, with the changes made therein by the King and the estates of the kingdom up to the Diet of 1865, 1866, at Stockholm, inclusive.

We, Charles, by the grace of God King of Sweden, of the Goths and Vandals, &c., &c., heir of Norway, Duke of Schleswig-Holstein, of Stormarn, and Dithmarsk, Count of Oldenburg and of Dithmenhorst, &c., &c., make known: The estates of the kingdom, at present assembled, having unanimously resolved to modify in certain respects the laws on the liberty of the press of March 9, 1810, actually in force, and the law thus modified having been submitted to our approbation, we have been pleased, in virtue of the right which section 85 of the present law on the form of government accords us, to accept, sanction, and confirm by these presents the said law on the liberty of the press, approved by the estates of the kingdom, such as follows, word for word:

We, the undersigned, the estates of the kingdom of Sweden, counts, barons, bishops, orders of the nobility, of the clergy, of burghers, and peasants, now here assembled at Årebro, in general extraordinary Diet, make known: The law in the form of government, accepted by us June 6, 1809, and decreed by the King and the estates of the kingdom, having granted the liberty of the press to the Swedish nation by the following resolution of its section 86, "that by liberty of the press is understood the right for all Swedes to publish writings without previous obstacles on the part of the public, and not proscribed by the law on the liberty of the press, with the powers afterward to be prosecuted for their contents before competent tribunals, and not to be punished for the said writings, only as far as the tenor of them is contrary to a law established, for guaranteeing the public tranquillity without placing obstacles for the propagation of information." We have resolved hereby, and with regard to the end thus proposed, to declare that every one shall be free to express and manifest his thoughts on any subject, and in any style whatever, of whatever nature the matter, whether it concerns this kingdom or foreign countries, present or past time, persons living or deceased, on condition, nevertheless, that he observes the resolutions against the abuse of the liberty of the press, which, in conformity to the code in force, shall be expressly established hereafter, as to the interior tranquillity and the exterior safety of the state, as well as to the inviolability of the respect due to the Supreme Being, to the government, to citizens and to morals. Consequently, everything imposing upon all of us who can know of the faults of the press, the obligations of being the supporters and protectors of the innocent, we have, in order to insure the liberty of the press, in a manner compatible with the just exigencies of society and of every citizen, decreed what follows, viz:

SECTION 1. 1. The laws, regulations, and proscriptions on the liberty of the press, and the book-trade, before in force, are abrogated by the present law, and consequently also the various defense made up to this time for publishing certain books, writings, and documents. These can be prosecuted only in the manner prescribed by the present law on the liberty of the press. Under the denomination of writings employed in the present law is comprised everything which, by the press, is placed before the eyes of the public. By periodical writings is understood those which appear in regular numbers, or at fixed times.

2. Publications shall be subjected to no examination, previous to their printing, neither to any defense for writing. Notice of a work before the publication shall not be demanded of the printer, editor, or author, and it shall no more be permitted to exercise over printers, authors, or editors a watchfulness of a nature to cramp the printing or the distribution. The institutions of public instruction shall, nevertheless, preserve the ancient right of examining and approving the theses, which must be sustained at their institutions.

3. It shall not be necessary, henceforth, to demand privileges for the publication of a work of any form or nature whatever, and the right of publication by every author or editor by the press is recognized, nevertheless, without prejudice to the exclusive rights already obtained by others. Such an exclusive right can, for the future, be accorded for no longer time than twenty years. Every privilege, already granted for an indefinite time, shall terminate with the life of the one who shall have obtained it. The privileges for the publication of works accorded to the profit of public institutions shall continue to exist only during twenty years, to commence from this day. Nevertheless the King can renew them, each time for twenty years at the longest.

4. Any one who shall publish a journal or periodical must make to the minister of state and of justice a declaration, containing the title and place of printing; the minister shall be required to deliver to him a certificate, testifying that no obstacle exists to the publication of the work, provided, nevertheless, that the applicant has not been condemned for an infamous crime or declared unworthy to plead for others.

5. A privilege shall not be necessary, in order to establish a printing-office, but it shall be free to every one, except prevented by some special ordinance, by ancient privileges, or book-printing regulations, except he is subjected to some corporation rules, to establish in cities, or, at the farthest, at the distance of three English miles therefrom, printing-offices of the nature and size which is judged proper.

When a printing-office is thus established outside the city, the printers, workmen of the said printing-office, and the authors and editors of works which are printed there, shall be under the jurisdiction of the city in all affairs which relate to the printing of books.

Any one who establishes a printing-office shall be required, at the latest within thirty days which precede the publication of a work, to make known in writing to the magistrate of the city the place of his industry, or the jurisdiction to which he belongs as printer, as well as to the provincial government to whose administration the city belongs, that he has established a printing-office, and its locality. The omission of this declaration shall be punished with a fine of 100 riksdalers, and the violation of it shall be published in the public journals. If, in a printing-office whose establishment shall not have been declared in the manner stated, anything prohibited is published, the printer and the author shall be subjected to the same penalties and responsibilities as regards the contents and the violation of the article, and the printing-office shall be confiscated for the public treasury. It shall be the same if the printing-office changes proprietors. In these two cases the provincial government shall be required, as soon as it shall have been duly informed of it, to give immediately, by the first mail, information of it to the minister of state and of justice.

6. The author shall not be required to sign the printed work. Whether he wishes it to remain anonymous or not, he must send to the printer a sealed letter bearing his name and residence, and provided with a certificate, stating the exactitude of this declaration, and signed by two Swedish citizens enjoying a good reputation and residing in Sweden; in case the work shall be prosecuted in the time fixed by law, and the name and residence of the author shall have been falsely indicated, or they shall have been omitted in the letter, or even in case the author, without lawful reasons, shall have omitted to make his appearance, they shall be subjected to the responsibility which attaches to the author. If the printer reveals the name and residence of the author, without being legally enjoined by the judge, he shall suffer a fine of 200 riksdalers, and his offense shall be published in the public journals.

7. The one who publishes the work of a foreigner, or a translation of the said work, or indeed the work of a citizen, who shall not have made known his name, shall have the same rights, duties, and responsibilities as the author, in all cases where it is not otherwise decreed in the present law. The editors of journals or of periodicals, as regards responsibility, shall be always accounted the author of them; they must watch that the conditions further decreed in the present law, as to publication, be scrupulously observed.

8. The printer shall be required, at the time of the opening of the process, to present to the tribunal the letter bearing the name of the author; otherwise, he shall incur the responsibility of the author, unless the latter shall voluntarily make himself known to the judge. If the process relates to the journals or periodicals, the name of the editor shall be, in consequence of the declaration prescribed herein, given by the minister of state and of justice. The judge must open the letter which contains the name as soon as received by him, and disclose, before the tribunal, the veritable part thus denounced. If, at the end of the process, the judge finds that the complainant has commenced the prosecution without any necessity, in such a manner that the opening of the letter has resulted from it, the complainant shall be liable to a fine of 100 riksdalers. The printer who shall have placed the name of the author, or of the editor, on a writing without his authorization, shall be sentenced to an imprisonment of from two months to one year.

9. The property of every writing rests in the person of the author, or of his heirs or assigns. Nevertheless, if the heirs or assigns of the author have not used their right of publication in the twenty years which follow his death; or even, if after, this right is not exercised during the twenty years, for which it has been renewed, any one may publish by the press the works left by the author. Any one who, without the written authorization of the author or of his assigns, shall print or reproduce his work, shall submit to the confiscation of the edition, or shall pay to the profit of the proprietor an amount equal to the entire value.

It shall be the same with the one who shall print or reproduce the translation of a foreign work made by others, or who shall pass his translation for that of another: nevertheless, the right of property of the translator of a work shall prevent no one from publishing another translation of it.

The editor of a journal or periodical does not infringe upon the property of the author by the fact that he has published therein anonymous writings addressed to him. Any one who shall place a false title to a writing, or indicate a false name of an author or editor, shall be sentenced to hard labor of from six months to two years. It shall not be forbidden to place on the title-page a name which does not designate a person really existing, when a letter indicating the true name of the author shall have been given. Articles taken from a journal shall not be accounted counterfeit when reproduced in another journal; provided, nevertheless, that the journal whence the article is taken is indicated at the same time.

10. The name of the printer, the place and the year of printing, must be indicated on each writing; the omission of this indication on the part of the printer shall be punished by a fine the first time, 300 riksdalers, and, in case of repetition, 600 riksdalers. At the second repetition the printing-office shall be confiscated. Whoever shall have indicated on any printed matter a false name of the printer, or a false place of printing, shall be sentenced to hard labor of from two months to one year. What has been decreed here concerning the indications of the name and the place shall not be applicable to notifications, communications, formulas, contracts, and other works of the same nature.

11. Besides the copy mentioned below, paragraph 2, section 4, the printer shall be required to deposit and furnish gratis to the royal library and to each of the universities of the kingdom, a complete and correct copy, with the plates with which the edition can be ornamented, which shall be effected in such a manner that everything which shall have appeared in the course of the preceding year may be delivered before the end of June of each year. Whoever shall violate this shall be punished with a fine of 25 riksdalers for each time, and shall be always, under the same penalty, required to supply the said copies in the time newly prescribed.

12. No obstacles shall be imposed on the exercise of the book-trade, neither the publishing for the sale of writings published either in the kingdom or in a foreign country. Every author or editor shall be free in this respect, to sell or cause to be sold a writing belonging to him; nevertheless, those who, with the right of making announcement of it in the journal, desire to exercise the book-trade, or to sell books, either in a shop or otherwise, shall be required to make a declaration of it to the minister of state and of justice, in the manner prescribed for the establishment of printing-offices, and with the same responsibility. There shall be no other hindrances in the selling of a work than those mentioned in section 4 of the present law. Whoever shall have sold a printed work bearing neither the name of the printer nor the place, neither the year of the printing, shall be each time sentenced to a fine of 50 riksdalers, and shall incur, in case the writing shall be prosecuted, the responsibility to which the author is liable if the printer nor the author cannot be found.

SECTION 2. 1. In conformity to the principles established above, for the establishment of general and legal liberty of the press, every author shall be permitted, on conditions stipulated hereafter, section 3, to publish, by the press, his opinions on anything which can serve for the progress of human knowledge.

2. For every matter the style shall depend on the choice of the author, nevertheless, on the responsibility determined hereafter, in case where the writing shall be of an ignominious or infamous nature.

3. In conformity to what is stated in section 1, paragraphs 3, 4, and 9, every author or editor shall be permitted to publish writings of any form, extent, or nature whatever, under the condition only of not violating the right of the property of others.

4. In conformity to what is stated in paragraph 1, of the present section, and for the more certain direction of the editor, every one, nevertheless, with the exceptions and conditions determined upon hereafter, shall be permitted to publish by the press, all documents, protocols, and decisions, relative as much to legal processes as to other public affairs, of whatever name or contents they may be, and if they refer to past or future affairs, to be carried to the court or kingdom, to the supreme tribunal, and to the inferior revision of justice, (Nedre-Justitie Revision,) to the preparatory committee of public matters, to the tribunals, superior and inferior, to colleges, committees, preparatory commissions, directions, commissions, administrations, provincial governments, ecclesiastical consistories, authorities charged with making seizures, or to other public administrations, and that, without distinction, according as these affairs are of a civil, criminal, economical, military, or ecclesiastical nature; besides all the instructions and constitutions, all the regulations, statutes, ordinances, privileges, rescripts, and public decrees abrogated, actually in force, or in view and without distinction from whom they emanate; as also all memorials, official letters, and relations of tribunals, superior and inferior, colleges, administrations, public corporations above mentioned, and officials and employés of the state; in short, the memorials, petitions, propositions, reports, complaints of all associations, both of the administration and of individuals, as well as the decisions and responses relative to it, inasmuch as they are under the jurisdiction of functionaries and public administrations, and for this purpose, not only all the acts must, in the said tribunals and public administrations, be delivered immediately and without delay, and at the expense of whoever shall have demanded knowledge of them, whether he may be interested in the subject or not, at the responsibility of the functionary who refuses to give it, or shall cause an undue delay therein; but still, and under this same responsibility, every one shall be permitted to copy, himself, or to have copied, all records of any nature whatever, in all the archives, and where serious obstacles occur as to authenticated copies, to obtain them on the payment of proper fees.

The following exceptions shall be observed in the authorization above:

The protocols made in the presence of the King, concerning ministerial affairs or those of military command; the protocols and the acts of the council of state, or of the estates of the kingdom; those of the secret committee, or of the committee on constitution relative to the council of state; those of the administration of the bank, and of the office of the public debt; those of committees of the bank and of finance; or those of delegated comptrollers of the administrations of the bank and of the office of the public debt, concerning their secret affairs, can only be required or delivered with the consent of the official who has charge of the same. If similar acts are published by the press without the authority of the official who has charge of them, the editor, if he has been charged to keep them, or if it shall have been his duty to keep them secret, shall be punished according to the code in force, and to special rules. Every other individual who is guilty of this offense shall be condemned to a fine of 100 riksdalers, or more, according to the nature of the infraction. It shall be the same for the one who shall have illicitly published by the press the above-mentioned records, in case they have been committed to his keeping, unless he shall have been bound by higher fixed accountability not to reveal them.

It shall be forbidden to publish, or deliver, without the authority of the government, ministerial records, memorials, or private reports of diplomatic agents on ministerial affairs of a period of at least fifty years back, private letters—unless they necessarily belong to some judicial proceeding—the writings and records deposited in public archives, without the authority of those who have charge of the same. The offender shall pay a fine of 50 riksdalers.

Every party, in whatever process it may be, is authorized to publish at will, and before the pronouncement of the judgment or sentence, requests, complaints and accusations; but it is equally bound to publish, by the press, the defense of the adverse party, as well as the sentence of the tribunal and the various opinions of its members, as well as everything which can serve for the complete enlightenment of the affair itself, the manner in which it has been conducted, and the preliminary remarks to the sentence shall also be carried to the knowledge of the public. Nevertheless, no one shall be bound to produce other records than those indispensably necessary to such an object: and the decision in this regard shall belong to the judge who shall have been charged with the matter under legal accountability, whether on such an occasion the proceedings do, or do not, conform to the meaning and evident resolutions of the present law. Every offender shall pay a fine of 50 riksdalers.

Every party who shall have a matter, involving his personal rights, pending either before the supreme tribunal, or any other tribunal or public authority, shall have printed information relative to it, or what is called species facti; he must, nevertheless, conform to truth and decency. The offender shall pay a fine of 33 riksdalers 16 skillings.

The protocols and records belonging to a criminal case, on which subject the parties are agreed, cannot be printed during the life of these parties without their authorization; or, if the parties are deceased, until after the expiration of fifty years, commencing from their decease. Every offender shall pay a fine of 33 riksdalers 16 skillings.

No one can, in other cases than those specified by the code and ordinances in force, communicate or deliver to be printed, extracts from church registers, or of other records concerning the care of souls and ecclesiastical discipline, relative to the private life and morals of individuals, inasmuch as these records can produce damage or wrong in their consideration. Every offender shall pay a fine of 33 riksdalers 18 skillings.

Everything which shall be obscene, or shall wound modesty, or shall contain blasphemies against God, or injurious expressions against the government of the kingdom, or, indeed, anything which shall have been introduced in judicial records of an injurious character, abusing to or slandering persons, whom the affair does not directly concern, cannot be published by the press, under penalty of a tax of 33 riksdalers 16 skillings, unless, in this last case, the judge who has last pronounced on the matter does not find it necessary to impose the principal sum.

Moreover, as it becomes too extensive to specify scrupulously all the objects, causes, and matters which can present themselves, every one shall be free to publish by the press everything which is not expressly forbidden by the present law; consequently all which, on matters authorized by the present law, shall be the subject of observations, of citations, and remarks by the press, or shall be otherwise made public under the form of examination of reflections, cannot, under the pretext of implying a fault or criticism, be regarded as criminal, inasmuch as the violation shall not cause criminal construction, which involves a punishment to the present law.

SECTION 3. Under the presupposed conditions that on the examination of a writing or of the responsibility it involves, those upon whom such an examination depends must, in doubtful cases, acquit, rather than condemn; and always fix their attention rather on the illegality of the subject and the meaning than on that of the expression; rather on the tendency of the publication than on the violation, and that they shall not otherwise have the right to draw vague conclusions of expressions employed in writing; these shall be considered as abuse of the liberty of the press.

1. Blasphemies preferred against God, or derision of the word of God, or the sacraments: The offense shall be punished according to the code in force, and the publication shall be confiscated.

2. Denial of the existence of God, and of the life beyond, or denial of the pure evangelical doctrine: The offender shall be punished with a fine of 33 riksdalers 16 skillings, or imprisonment from two months to one year, and the publication shall be confiscated.

3. Derision of divine service: The offense shall be punished in conformity to the code in force, and the publication shall be confiscated.

4. All sorts of vicious declarations concerning the King, his person or his actions, his wife, the Queen, or heir-presumptive to the throne: The offense shall be punished according to the code in force, and the publication shall be confiscated.

5. Opprobrious expressions against any other member of the reigning dynasty, invested with royal or princely dignity in the kingdom: The offense shall be punished in conformity to the code in force, and the publication shall be confiscated.

7. Exciting to sedition or revolt: The offense shall be punished according to the code in force, and the publication shall be confiscated.

8. Opprobrious expressions against functionaries and employés in the kingdom, in the exercise of, or on the occasion of the exercise of, their duties: The offense shall be punished according to the code in force.

9. Opprobrious or offensive opinions and expressions, which tend to cause dissensions with foreign powers, if they have been uttered against nations or contemporary States with which the kingdom is at peace, against the chiefs of these States, their government or constitution, superior officers and diplomatic agents, their interior or exterior condition, their enterprises or negotiations: The offense shall be punished in conformity with sections 28 of section 8 of penal law, and the publication shall be confiscated. If the writing is not opprobrious or offensive, but it shall have caused a misunderstanding with a foreign power, it shall be confiscated without legal process.

10. Every publication by the press, which belongs to negotiations entered upon by the state with foreign powers, or decisions and desigus of the King which refer to them, as well as the records of his ministers, councilors, and diplomatic agents, unless the publication shall have taken place with the authorization of the government or with official permission: The offenses shall be punished in conformity to the code in force, and the publication shall be confiscated.

11. Attacks directed against a private citizen and of a nature to criminate his honor, or defame his name and his reputation: The offense shall be punished in conformity to the code in force, and the writing shall be confiscated.

12. False reports and distorted representations tending to deceive and mislead the public: These offenses shall be punished with a fine from 33 riksdalers 16 shillings to 100 riksdalers, and the publication shall be confiscated.

13. The corruption of morals, either by the propagation of doctrines tending to the vice, and especially to the one which wounds modesty, either by representations of the vice so shameful and so little concealed that the result of it may have been to favor a dissolute life: The violation shall be punished in conformity to the code in force, and the publication shall be confiscated.

Regarding confiscated publications, they cannot, as a general rule, be again published by the press, unless the tribunal which decides last the matter shall not have considered it criminal.

SECTION 4. With regard to the watchfulness to be exercised on the lawful publications of writings, the following resolutions shall be observed, viz:

1. The minister of state and of justice must himself, or by delegates appointed by him, as well in the capital as in the country, watch over the publication of writings in the manner and in the measure fixed below.

2. In order to favor this object it is prescribed, as an indispensable measure, that at the same time, not later, a writing shall have been exposed to sale, or in whatever manner it may have been distributed, a copy of it must be sent to Stockholm to the minister of state and of justice, and also to his deputy. The printer, for not fulfilling this formality, shall be punished each time with a fine of 50 riksdalers, and if he prints a journal or periodical without being furnished with a certificate by the minister of state and of justice, testifying that the demand for publication has been duly made, the fine shall be 100 riksdalers, and the distribution of the publication shall be suspended until the editor shall have observed what is decreed in this regard.

3. In all cases where, in conformity with the terms of section 2, paragraph 4, and of section 3, the prosecution shall be exercised by the public ministry, the minister of state and of justice, or his deputy, shall have the right, when he shall judge it necessary, to cause the writing to be seized, which must take place within eight days. The minister of state and of justice must, one month after the day on which a seizure shall have been made, in a provincial town, make known to his deputy if he approves of the seizure or if it must be vacated. If, in the capital, eight days pass without the seizure having been made, or if, in the country, the approbation of the minister of state and of justice has not been procured in the eight days above mentioned the seizure cannot take place, unless a competent tribunal and the committee named to watch over the liberty of the press orders it; but, on all occasions where the minister of state and of justice finds that an infraction of the present law has been made, and all times that the matter, as purely administrative, is not of his jurisdiction, or, even when it relates to personal injuries, and when it can be prosecuted only by the injured party himself, the minister of state and of justice must, whether the writing must be seized or if it shall be only prosecuted before a competent tribunal, transmit the writing without delay, and directly, to the attorney general of the King, to be proceeded with according to law.

4. The following cases shall be considered as administrative cases: If, at the time of the establishing of a printing-office, the resolutions of section 1, paragraph 5, are not observed; if the printer omits to indicate his name on the writing, the place and year of the printing, as thus it is decreed in section 1, paragraph 10; if he does not send, within the prescribed time, a publication issued from his presses to the minister of state and of justice, or to his deputy, in violation of section 1, paragraph 12, printed works, where the name of the printer, the place and the year of printing have been omitted. In these cases the minister of state and of justice can, in conformity to the resolutions of the present law, immediately impose upon the accused the fine; nevertheless the latter shall be free, if he judges it to the purpose to make application against this decision to the King, through the inferior justice revision, to be made at Stockholm in fifteen days, and in the country in a month after the decision of the minister of state and of justice shall have been duly signified. Besides, shall be considered as administrative affairs only those of an economical nature, which, according to a regulation made on printing-offices and the book-trade, can be of the jurisdiction of the minister of state and of justice, and which shall cause no alteration in the resolutions of the present law.

5. As soon as the minister of state and of justice shall have made known any infraction of the present law to the attorney general of the King, the latter shall be required, immediately, to prosecute the offense before a competent tribunal by an attorney for this deputy. Moreover, he must himself, by respective delegates, watch attentively what belongs to the liberty of the press within limits fixed by law. The attorney general of the Diet shall be equally bound, as regards the infractions of the present law, to lend his service in conformity to principles established in the instructions concerning matters which enter into his province. With regard to personal injuries the injured party can prosecute them either himself or by an attorney.

6. If six months have passed since a publication, in conformity to paragraph 2 above, has been transmitted to the minister of state and of justice, or even to his deputy, which time must be proved immediately by the delivery of a receipt, this writing can no longer give rise to public action. But the party can, in the limits fixed by the law in force, use his right to prosecute if he has been offended in his person by the printing of the writing. If a work has been seized, judicial prosecution must take place within eight days, in the capital and in the country—in eight days after it shall have been known that the minister of state and of justice shall have approved of the seizure; if not, the seizure is dropped, and the sale of the publication shall encounter no obstacles.

7. The editors of journals and periodicals who, as stated in section 1, paragraph 1, are alone responsible, are reminded to make a legal use of the liberty of the press, and for the faults which an editor may commit by means of such a sheet, the fine shall be made double every time the pecuniary sentence must be pronounced.

8. The seizure or the confiscation shall not comprise a larger part of the writing than the sheet, the sheets, numbers or volumes, which are the objects of prosecution.

9. Whoever shall have been convicted of having sold or distributed a publication duly seized or confiscated, shall be, when he shall have had or should have had knowledge of the seizure, subjected to the same responsibility as the author, and punished according to the same rules. The displacement of objects seized shall be, if they are not sold or distributed, punished according to the law in force.

10. For the selling and distribution of Swedish works imported from a foreign country, the minister of state and of justice shall have the same rights and duties as regards works printed in the kingdom, and every vender of such publications shall be subjected to the obligations and responsibility established for printers in paragraph 1 of the present section.

11. If the minister of state and of justice finds that a publication in a foreign language contains anything contrary to paragraphs 4, 5, 7, 9, 10, and 13 of section 3, he must, after temporary seizure laid thereon, humbly apply for an order from the King whether the sale of the publication should be allowed, or continue under further seizure. For this purpose, every individual having been authorized, in consequence of an application addressed to the minister of state and of justice, to engage in the book trade, must send to the said minister, or his deputy, a list of the foreign works introduced by him into the kingdom. If, then, a seizure shall take place, the minister of state and of justice must inquire of the King if security for the seizure must be given for exposing the publications for sale, or if the publications must continue to remain under sequestration, in order to be afterward re-exported, in which case the King shall decide if the bookseller must be indemnified out of the funds of the State, and to what extent.

SECTION 5. The examination of the legality of printed works, which shall be prosecuted, shall always henceforth be submitted to a jury or commission, composed of five persons, who shall assemble at the tribunal where the infractions of the present law shall be prosecuted, and where, through the trial of the parties, the allegations of the accuser and the defense of the accused must take place.

2. Each of the parties must afterward choose four persons residing in the city or environs, enjoying a good reputation for their civic virtues; the tribunal shall choose five of them, the total number thirteen; and after these persons shall have been judged unexceptionable by the tribunal, one named by the opposite party, and one by the tribunal, must be excluded by each of the parties without any explanation of the reasons.

3. The number of the members of the jury having thus been reduced to nine, they shall be convoked by the tribunal on a day fixed as soon as may be, and they shall take the following oath before the judge :

"Almighty God! Thou readest my heart! Nothing is concealed from thy sight, which embraces the universe. Mayest Thou forever withdraw Thy goodness and Thy mercy if I dissimulate my conviction in this matter. I, N. N., swear, therefore, before God and His Holy Gospel, to give my opinion in this matter according to my best understanding and conscience, and to preserve a religious silence on the secret deliberations of the jury."

4. The judge must send to the jury a succinct and exact statement of the nature of the matter and state the question to it in these terms: "Is the publication criminal under the law cited by the prosecution?" And after the president and the members of the tribunal shall have retired, the jury cannot separate until they have voted on the question by yes or no. To condemn the accused, at least two-thirds of the votes shall be necessary; if not obtained, the case shall be discharged.

5. Immediately after the verdict of the jury has been taken, the tribunal must, without delay, pronounce the sentence in the presence of the parties, declaring the punishment which should be imposed if convicted, or, if acquitted, the reparation to which he is entitled.

6. The violations of the present law shall be under the jurisdiction of the inferior court of the city where the printing-office is situated, from which the criminated work was issued, or where, in conformity to section 1, the establishment of it has been announced. In Stockholm these matters shall be under the jurisdiction of the inferior court; in other cities, where there exists the first and second inferior court, the latter shall take jurisdiction of matters of the press; the jurisdiction of the universities shall nevertheless remain intact, in conformity to their regulations. The time for appearance in the summons shall be always the same, whether the printing-office be established within the city limits or without, as thus the above-mentioned section provides, and the proceedings in this respect shall be in the manner prescribed by the code in force, as to the day of the appearance in the cities. If the question arises whether a printer or author shall be prosecuted for a printed work, or only be subjected to an examination, the party must confront, personally, the said tribunal, but he shall profit, nevertheless, by the privileges of the law, according to the code in force, and the particular ordinances, for everything which has not been otherwise established in express terms by the present provision.

7. After the opinion of the jury shall have thus been taken, the judge shall examine and judge the matter; then he shall refer the judgment to the examination of the second inferior court, as is thus prescribed in chapter 25, section 5; but the papers shall always, in every process relating to the liberty of the press, be sent by the first inferior court to the second, to be there examined.

8. If the minister of state and of justice, or his deputy, finds that in conformity to principles further established for the seizure of a printed work, he can order or demand that it be seized, he shall have the right to cause this seizure to be made, at Stockholm, by means of the grand governor; and in other cities or localities by the magistrate of the jurisdiction to which the printing-office belongs, according to section 1, who cannot refuse to lend his assistance as soon as possible. A protocol of the seizure must be made, stating equally the motives which have occasioned it, and the number of copies of the criminated work found at the printer's house; there shall be three copies of the protocol, one of which shall be sent to the minister of state and of justice, or to his deputy, another to the magistrate, and a third to the printer. The magistrate, under the accountability to which he is liable for a fault committed in the exercise of his functions, must send, by the next mail, a copy of the protocol to the attorney general of the King. At Stockholm, the protocol shall be sent to the said attorney general immediately, or, at the latest, before the close of the day following. The attorney general of the King must immediately, in Stockholm, within eight days, and in the country, at the latest, in three weeks, which follow the seizure, have the matter sent to a competent tribunal, and an accuser appointed, after which the tribunal must, at the latest, in eight days, declare if the seizure must be maintained. If this is not done, and if the seizure is not removed within a month, the printer has the right, in the same order in which the aid of the magistrate for imposing the seizure has been communicated, to demand that it may be removed, which cannot be refused, on penalty of loss of office. The minister of state and of justice cannot otherwise exact the seizure, neither occupy himself further with the matter, but it shall return immediately to the attorney general of the King, who shall watch under his further responsibility that such matters may be treated conformably to the code in force and to the present law. If a work is referred to the attorney general of the King, the latter must, within fifteen days at the latest, cause the matter to be carried to a competent tribunal by an accuser whom he shall have appointed for this purpose; but he cannot order the seizure mentioned above without the authorization of the minister of state and of justice, or of his deputy. If the matter has been carried before a competent tribunal, and if the prosecution shall have demanded the seizure, the tribunal must decide on this demand within eight days, under the obligation moreover of taking the advice of the minister of state and of justice, or of his deputy, if that can be done without delay. If the demand of seizure is denied, the proceedings shall take their course notwithstanding, but if the demand is granted, and if the minister of state and of justice, or his deputy, shall have approved of the same, it shall be put into execution; the decree of the first inferior court must, nevertheless, in these two cases, be immediately sent to the second inferior court: the latter must afterward take the advice of a committee appointed to watch over the liberty of the press. If this committee votes for the seizure, the second inferior court can, if it judges proper, give its assent to it by a verdict, and the seizure shall then be maintained until the end of the process. If the said committee voted against the seizure, but if the second inferior court finds, notwithstanding, that it must be made, the verdict of the tribunal shall not then go into execution, but shall be submitted to examination of the supreme tribunal. The attorney general of the Diet can, after having been informed of the deliberations on such a matter, assist at the debates, after which he must immediately cause the protocols to be printed, also the verdict of the supreme tribunal, at the expense of the state in case a private publisher is not willing to charge himself with it.

9. In the tribunals of the first inferior court the judge shall examine and judge matters, and shall afterward submit the decree to the examination of the second inferior court, as is thus prescribed in chapter 25, section 5, of the code of procedure, but the paper shall always, in every action involving the liberty of the press, be sent by the first inferior court to the second, to be there examined.

10. If, after the complainant's demand, a work is of such a criminal nature that a felony punishment must follow, and if the author belongs to such a class of citizens that, according to the law and ordinance, he can be judged for this offense only by the second inferior court, (Hoffräll,) the first court, where the ticket bearing the name of the author has been opened, must send the matter to the second inferior court, after which the proceedings shall be in the manner prescribed by the present law.

11. If, in printed works one or several individuals are attacked, and if the attacks not taken place in the exercise, or on the occasion of the exercise of their functions, the injured party alone shall have power to prosecute, and the public ministry can never include such an offense in its accusation, neither prosecute it. The injured party can, nevertheless, if he desires, demand of the attorney general of the King the assistance of the public ministry in the process, the granting of which is optional with him; nevertheless, the absence or non-appearance of the public ministry cannot retard the proceedings before the tribunal. The prosecutions commenced by private persons shall be regulated entirely by the mode of procedure prescribed in the present law and by the code in force; in such matters between private persons the judge of the first inferior court can, nevertheless, without having taken the advice of the minister of state and of justice, or his deputy, proceed with the examination and decision of questions relative to the seizure of the work, after which the parties can, in the desired order, appeal from the decision of the superior tribunal; in this case the seizure cannot be put into execution.

12. In questions of seizure the provincial governments and the magistrates must necessarily, and upon legal penalty, lend their assistance; the seizure of a work published in the kingdom, and found with a bookseller or other vender, can, nevertheless, not be demanded unless it can be proved that the seizure of the work has been made in the place where the printing was done, or that the work has not, in conformity with the provisions of section 4, paragraph 2, been sent to the minister of state and of justice, or to his deputy.

13. If publications printed in Sweden, or works published in a foreign country and introduced into the kingdom, is regarded by one or several foreign ministers or by their governments as of a nature to cause discontent to other powers, the King can decree on this subject, according to the nature of the matter and circumstances, if he deems it necessary, to cause the said works to be seized and confiscated by his minister of state and of justice, or by his attorney general, not only those with the printers, but also with the venders or other distributors in respect to this. The proceedings shall be in the manner prescribed above for making seizures; in case one of the officials, to whom the King shall have given the order for executing this measure, does not make use of the public ministry for the prosecution of the publications before the respective tribunal, he must immediately and necessarily take the advice of the committee appointed to watch over the liberty of the press relative to the works in question. If the committee, who has not entered into the examination of the considerations and political circumstances, finds that the work is not subject to a prosecution according to the letter of the law, it shall depend upon the resolution of the King if the editor or bookseller ought to be more or less indemnified out of the public treasury for the expense of printing and for the paper of the copies seized.

14. If it happens, unexpectedly, that the committee appointed to watch over the liberty of the press is prosecuted in virtue of section 108 of the law on the form of government, the knowledge and decision of the matter shall belong to the second inferior court at Stockholm, of which the fiscal advocate must be the accuser. When the sentence shall have been pronounced, it must immediately, with all the protocols and parts of the process, be carried to the knowledge of the public by the press and at the expense of the state. If the matter is carried before the supreme tribunal, the proceedings must be the same. He who shall have been appointed by the estates of the kingdom to succeed the attorney general of the Diet shall be, in such a case, authorized to enter upon his duties to cause to be printed the parts of the proceedings, and to assist at the deliberations of the supreme tribunal on this matter.

15. All matters relative to the violations of the present law shall be judged with the greatest dispatch with accountability for judges and officials, and in all cases where there can be any question as to punishment of several offenses of a different nature, these matters shall be treated separately; so that, in all cases where the guilty party shall not have incurred the penalty of death or of penal labor for life, he shall suffer separately the punishment to which he shall have been condemned in virtue of the present law. The fines prescribed by the present law shall be charged in conformity to the code in force.

16. The fines imposed by virtue of the present law shall return to the state, except in cases where, according to what has been decreed above, they must return to the injured party.

In faith of which we have confirmed and approved what precedes, placing thereto our signatures and our seals.

[Inclosure No. 2.—Translation.]

The constitution of the kingdom of Norway (sections 1—112;) also
The act of union between Norway and Sweden, (sections 1—12.)

THE CONSTITUTION OF THE KINGDOM OF NORWAY,

Given at the National Assembly at Eidsvold, on the 17th of May, 1814, on the occasion of the union of the kingdoms of Norway and Sweden, determined by an extraordinary meeting of the Storting in Christiania, and accepted the 4th of November, 1814.

We, Charles, by the grace of God King of Sweden and Norway, of the Goths and Vandals, &c., &c., &c., Duke of Schleswig-Holstein, Stormarn, and the Dithmarsk, Count of Oldenburg and Dithmenhorst, &c., &c., hereby make known :

Whereas an extraordinary meeting of the Storting of Norway, which, on the 20th October last, decided on the union of this kingdom with that of Sweden, by negotiations with our appointed commissioners, has agreed upon a constitution which, though in some respects modified, still maintains the chief provisions of the constitution of Eidsvold; and whereas we find that the rights and duties of our new subjects are so clearly defined in the constitution which was accepted by the Storting on the 4th instant, and now submitted to us for our sanction, that the unity and strength of the royal power, as well as the legal liberty of the Norwegian people, have been secured, we are pleased, as are our commissioners, (having discussed and ratified the same, according to our full powers,) hereby to accept, confirm, and establish the said constitution and the law of succession attached thereto, together with all their articles, points, and clauses literally, as follows:

Not only are we ourselves pleased to accept them as perpetual, fundamental laws, but we command and ordain that all who are bound to us, our successors, and the kingdom by oaths of allegiance, do acknowledge, observe, and obey this constitution and law of succession.

For further security we have signed these presents with our own hand, and have caused our royal seal to be affixed thereto, which was done in Christiania, on the tenth day of the month of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fourteen.

In Attestation with the authority granted to me by my most gracious lord and King.
CARL JOHAN. [L. S.]

FISCHER.

We, the representatives of the kingdom of Norway, at an extraordinary meeting of the Storting assembled on the 7th of October, 1814, according to letters-patent of the 16th August, make known:

Having resolved on the day previous, after mature consideration, (as shown by our publication of the 21st ultimo,) that the kingdom of Norway in future shall be an independent country, united with the kingdom of Sweden under one king, without change in its constitution, always excepting such modifications as may be found necessary on occasion of the union, and for the prosperity of the country, we, in view of the said union, have given them our most careful deliberation and treated of them with the royal commissioners appointed to that end, in compliance with the convention of Moss, concluded on the 14th of August ultimo.

We have now resolved, as we hereby declare and decree, that instead of the constitution given by the national assembly at Eidsvold, on the 17th day of May ultimo, the following provisions, which are partly derived from the said constitution and partly made on account of the union, shall be in force, and be inviolably maintained and considered by all whom they may concern, as the constitution of the kingdom of Norway.

A.—THE FORM OF GOVERNMENT AND RELIGION.

SECTION 1. The kingdom of Norway shall be a free, independent, indivisible, and inalienable country, united with Sweden under one king. Its form of government shall be monarchical, limited and hereditary.

SECTION 2. The evangelical Lutheran religion shall remain the established religion of the state. The inhabitants who confess it shall be bound to educate their children in it. Jesuits and monastic orders shall not be allowed.

B.—THE EXECUTIVE POWER, THE KING AND THE ROYAL FAMILY.

SECTION 3. The executive power shall be vested in the King.

SECTION 4. The King shall always confess, maintain, and protect the evangelical Lutheran religion.

SECTION 5. The King's person is sacred; he cannot be blamed nor accused. All responsibility rests with his council.

SECTION 6. The order of succession to the throne shall be lineal and agnatic, such as is provided by the order of succession of the 26th day of September, 1810, passed by the Diet of the kingdom of Sweden and sanctioned by the King, and which is annexed to this constitution in translation. Among those entitled to succession are also counted those who may be born after their fathers' death and who will immediately assume their place in the hereditary line.

When a prince entitled to succeed to the united crowns of Norway and Sweden is born, his name and the time of his birth shall be announced to the next Storting and be registered on its records.

SECTION 7. If no prince entitled to succession exists, the King can propose his successor to the Storting of Norway at the same time as to the Diet of Sweden. So soon as the King has made his proposal, the representatives of both people shall form a committee from their own members, which is entitled to make the election, if the proposal of the King be not approved by the majority of the representatives of both the peoples separately.

The number of the members of this committee, which shall be the same from each country, and the order which is to be observed at the election, shall be fixed by a law, which the King will move simultaneously at the next assembled Storting, and at the Diet of the kingdom of Sweden. One of the aggregate committee, drawn by lots, shall withdraw.

SECTION 8. The year of the King's majority shall be fixed by a law enacted by agreement between the Storthing of Norway and the Diet of Sweden; or, if they cannot agree, by a committee elected by the representatives of both countries, according to the provisions made in section 7. So soon as the King has reached the age fixed by law, he shall publicly declare himself to be of age.

SECTION 9. So soon as the King, being of age, enters on the government, he shall take the following oath before the Storthing: "I promise and swear to govern the kingdom of Norway in accordance with its constitution and laws. May God and His holy word help me thereunto." If the Storthing be not assembled at that time, the oath shall be recorded at the council of state and be solemnly repeated by the King at the next Storthing, verbally or in writing, by some one whom he may depute.

SECTION 10. The King's coronation and anointment shall take place, after his coming of age, in the cathedral of Trondhjem at such time and with such ceremonies as he may himself appoint.

SECTION 11. The King shall, every year, reside some time in Norway, if no unavoidable impediments occur.

SECTION 12. The King shall himself choose a council of Norwegian citizens, whose age must not be less than thirty years. This council shall consist of at least one minister of state, and seven other members.

The King can also appoint a viceroy or a governor.

The King shall apportion the business among the members of the council of state in the way he deems most serviceable.

The King, or in his absence the viceroy, (or the governor, together with the councillors of state,) can, on extraordinary occasions, call other Norwegian citizens to assist at the council of state, but no member of the Storthing.

Father and son, or two brothers, must not be members of the council of state at the same time.

SECTION 13. During the King's absence he shall charge the viceroy, the governor, and at least five members of the council of state, with the internal administration of the country, for the cases prescribed by himself. They shall govern in the King's name, and on his behalf. They shall inviolably observe both the provisions of this constitution and such special orders in accordance with it which the King may convey to them as instructions. They shall transmit to the King an humble report on the matters which they may thus decide on. The affairs are decided by vote. In event of the votes being equal, the viceroy or the governor, or during their absence the first member of the council of state, shall have two votes.

SECTION 14. Only the crown prince or his eldest son can be appointed viceroy, but not before they have attained the age prescribed for the King. Either a Swede or a Norwegian can be appointed governor. The viceroy shall reside within the country, and must not be absent longer than three months in the year. When the King is present the functions of the viceroy shall cease. When no viceroy exists, but a governor, his functions shall also cease, he being in such case only the first councillor of state.

SECTION 15. During the King's residence in Sweden the Norwegian minister of state and two members of the council of state shall always be with him. The latter shall be changed every year. They shall have the same duties and the same constitutional responsibility as the government in Norway, (mentioned in section 13,) and in their presence only shall Norwegian affairs be decided by the King. All proposals to the King from Norwegian subjects shall be first submitted to the Norwegian government, whose opinion is requisite before they are decided on. In general, Norwegian affairs cannot be decided until the opinion of the government residing in Norway has been ascertained, unless important hinderances occur to prevent it.

The Norwegian minister of state shall lay the affairs before the King and be responsible that the documents be in conformity with the resolutions.

SECTION 16. The King shall order all public, church, and divine service, and all meetings or assemblies on religious matters. He shall take care that the public teachers of religion observe the prescribed rules.

SECTION 17. The King can give and repeal ordinances concerning commerce, duty, trade, and police. They, however, must not be at variance with the constitution and the laws given by the Storthing (as prescribed in the following sections, 78 and 79.) They shall be in force till the next assembled Storthing.

SECTION 18. The King shall generally take care that the taxes and duties imposed by the Storthing be collected. The Norwegian treasury shall remain in Norway, and its revenues shall be exclusively employed for the use of Norway.

SECTION 19. The King shall take care that the properties and revenues of the state be employed and administered in the way resolved by the Storthing, as most conducive to the public welfare.

SECTION 20. The King shall, in council, have power to grant pardon to criminals on whom judgment has been passed. The criminal may choose either the King's pardon or the punishment awarded him. In cases of impeachment by the Odelsting before the high court of the kingdom, (rigsret,) no further pardon can be granted beyond dispensing with capital punishment.

SECTION 21. The King shall nominate and appoint, by and with the advice of his Norwegian council of state, all civil, clerical, and military officers. They shall swear allegiance and fidelity to the constitution and the King.

The royal princes must not fill any civil offices. The crown prince, or his eldest son, however, can be appointed viceroy.

SECTION 22. The governor of the kingdom, the minister of state, the other members of the council of state, the council officers, ambassadors, and consuls, the principal civil and clerical authorities, the commanders of regiments and other military corps, commanders of fortresses and vessels of war, may, without any previous judgment, be dismissed by the King after he has taken the opinion of the council of state.

The next assembled Storthing shall decide whether pensions be granted to the officers thus dismissed; meanwhile they shall continue to receive two-thirds of their previous salary.

Other officers can only be suspended by the King, and shall, in that case, be immediately proceeded against by the courts, but except such judgment be pronounced they cannot be dismissed, nor removed from office against their will.

SECTION 23. The King can confer orders at pleasure, in recognition of distinguished merit, but his reasons for conferring such must be proclaimed. He can grant no other rank or title than that which belongs to the office. The orders shall not exempt any one from the common duties and burdens of a citizen, nor especially shall they admit any one to government offices. Officers who have been honorably dismissed shall retain the titles and rank attached to the offices which they have occupied.

No personal or mixed hereditary privileges shall be granted to any one in future.

SECTION 24. The King shall nominate and appoint the royal household and its officers.

SECTION 25. The King shall be commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the kingdom. They must not be increased nor reduced without the consent of the Storthing. They must not serve under foreign powers, nor must soldiers of any foreign power be called into the country without the consent of the Storthing, except as auxiliary troops against hostile attacks.

In times of peace none but Norwegian troops shall be garrisoned in Norway, neither shall there be any Norwegian troops in Sweden. The King, however, may have in Sweden a Norwegian guard of volunteers, and may, for a short time, not exceeding six weeks in the year, gather the nearest troops of the armies of both countries within the boundaries of one of the countries, but in times of peace no more than three thousand soldiers of all arms of the troops of one country shall in any case be assembled in the other. The troops and the fleet of row-boats of Norway shall not be employed in any aggressive war without the consent of the Storthing.

The Norwegian fleet shall have its dock-yards, and in times of peace its stations and harbors, in Norway.

Vessels of war belonging to one country shall not be manned by sailors of the other, except as volunteers.

The militia and other Norwegian troops, which cannot be classed among the line must never be employed beyond the frontiers of Norway.

SECTION 26. The King shall have power to gather troops, commence war and conclude peace, to enter into and dissolve alliances, and to send and receive ambassadors.

When the King proposes to declare war, he shall communicate with the government in Norway, who will pronounce its views on the subject, and also furnish a complete report of the financial state of the country, its means of defense and other matters.

When this has been done, the King shall form an extraordinary council of state, consisting of the Norwegian minister of state and the Norwegian councilors of state, together with those of Sweden, and he shall then lay before them the grounds and circumstances of the case.

The report of the government of Norway on the state of that country, together with a similar one of Sweden, shall then be produced. The King shall require their opinion on these subjects, which shall be put down separately on the records by each of them, under the responsibility provided by the constitution. The King shall then have power to hold and execute the decision, which he may think most profitable to the country.

SECTION 27. Every councilor of state shall be present at the council, unless lawfully prevented, and no resolution shall be passed, unless more than half the members are present.

In Norwegian cases which (in accordance with section 15) are decided in Sweden, no resolution shall be made unless either the Norwegian minister of state and one of the Norwegian councilors of state, or both the Norwegian councilors of state, are present.

SECTION 28. Reports of appointments to offices and other important subjects (except diplomatic matters and those which properly belong to military commands) shall be conveyed to the council of state by that member to whose department they belong, and the cases shall be dispatched by him in accordance with the resolution taken in the council of state.

SECTION 29. When a councillor of state is lawfully prevented from being present to report on the subjects which belong to his department, another councillor of state, deputed by the King, if he be present, (or by him who presides at the council of state, if he be absent, and by the other councillors,) shall report on them.

If so many are lawfully prevented from assisting that no more than half the fixed number of members are present, other officials shall equally be deputed to take a seat in the council of state, of which a report shall immediately be made to the King, who shall decide whether they shall continue to fulfil their functions.

SECTION 30. Registers shall be made of all cases which are discussed in council. Every one who has a seat in the council shall give an honest opinion which the King is bound to hear, but the latter can make his own decision. If a member of the council find that the King's resolution is at variance with the constitution or the laws of the country, or is evidently to the detriment of the country, it shall be his duty to oppose it vigorously and to have his opinion recorded in the registers. Whosoever has not thus protested, shall be considered to have agreed with the King and to be responsible for it, as mentioned hereafter, and he can be impeached by the Odelsthing before the high court of the kingdom (the rigsret.)

SECTION 31. All orders given by the King himself, (except on matters of military command,) shall be countersigned by the Norwegian minister of state.

SECTION 32. The resolutions which are passed by the government in Norway in the King's absence shall be published in the name of the King and be signed by the viceroy, or the governor, and the council of state, and be countersigned by him who reports on the subject, who shall be responsible that it be dispatched in accordance with the register on which the resolution was entered.

SECTION 33. All reports on Norwegian matters, and the publication of them, shall be given in the Norwegian language.

SECTION 34. The heir apparent to the throne shall have the title of crown prince, if he be the son of the reigning King. The others who are entitled to inherit the crown shall be called princes, and the royal daughters princesses.

SECTION 35. As soon as the crown prince has reached his eighteenth year, he shall be entitled to a seat in the council of state, but without vote or responsibility.

SECTION 36. No prince of the blood shall marry without the King's consent. If this be done, he shall forfeit his right to the crown of Norway.

SECTION 37. The royal princes or princesses shall not be judged by other than the King, or one whom he may appoint as their judge.

SECTION 38. The Norwegian minister of state and the two Norwegian councillors of state who attend the King shall have seats and deliberative votes in the Swedish council when subjects concerning both countries are there discussed.

The opinion of the government in Norway ought also to be asked in such matters, unless they need to be decided on so quickly that there is no time for it.

SECTION 39. When the King dies, and the successor to the throne is not yet of age, the Norwegian and Swedish councils of state shall be immediately convened, in order to call together the Storthing in Norway, and the Diet in Sweden.

SECTION 40. Until the representatives of both countries be assembled, and until they have arranged the government during the minority of the King, a council of state, composed of an equal number of Norwegian and Swedish members, shall take charge of the administration of both countries, duly observing their respective constitutions.

The Norwegian and Swedish ministers of state who sit in the mixed council of state above mentioned, shall draw lots for the presidency.

SECTION 41. The rules mentioned in the preceding paragraphs 39 and 40 shall also be observed, when it shall be the duty of the Swedish council of state, in their capacity of council of state, to govern according to the provisions of the Swedish constitution.

When, however, the King, owing to absence from his countries, or illness, shall be unable to discharge the government duties, the heir apparent, if he have reached the prescribed majority, shall take care of the government as the temporary representative of the royal power, and with the same rights as the government ad interim.

SECTION 42. The King shall propose to the next Storthing in Norway and to the Diet in Sweden a law, resting on the principle of complete equality between both countries, concerning the future provisions necessary for the cases mentioned in paragraphs 39, 40, and 41.

SECTION 43. The choice of the guardians who shall govern on behalf of the King during his minority, shall be made according to the same rules and in the same manner as has already been provided in section 7, regarding the election of a successor to the throne.

SECTION 44. Those who in the cases mentioned in paragraphs 40 and 41 shall be invested with government, shall take the following oath before the Norwegian Storthing— ing: "I do promise and swear to govern in accordance with the constitution and the laws: so help me God and His holy word."

The Swedes shall take the oath before the Diet of the kingdom of Sweden. If the Storting or the Diet be not assembled at that time, the written oath shall be deposited with the council of state and repeated at the next Storting or Diet.

SECTION 45. At the expiration of their government they shall render an account of it to the King and the Storting.

SECTION 46. If those who are responsible do neglect to convoke the Storting immediately, according to paragraphs 39 and 41, it shall become the positive duty of the Storting to direct the same after the lapse of four weeks.

SECTION 47. The direction of the King's education during his minority shall be fixed in the way mentioned in section 7 and section 43, provided no written instructions have been left by his father.

It shall be an unalterable rule, that the King shall be sufficiently instructed in the Norwegian language during his minority.

SECTION 48. If the royal male line has become extinct and no successor to the throne has been elected, a new royal lineage shall be chosen in the way mentioned in section 7. Meanwhile the executive power shall be invested as mentioned in section 43.

C.—CIVIL RIGHTS AND THE LEGISLATIVE POWER.

SECTION 49. The people shall exercise legislative power through the Storting, which shall consist of two divisions, a Lagthing and Odelsting.

SECTION 50. The right of voting is confined to Norwegian citizens, who have attained their twenty-fifth year, who have resided in the country for five years, who live there and (a) are or have been government officials; (b) who are land owners, or who have rented land for more than five years in the country, or who have had certain privileges in Finmark for five years; (c) who are citizens of towns, or who own house or ground in any city or town of the value of at least 300 rigsbank dollars, silver value.

SECTION 51. Returns of all the inhabitants entitled to vote shall be made in every city by the magistrate, and in every parish by the sheriff and the pastor, and an immediate entry shall be made of the changes which may occur in course of time.

Before being entered in the list of voters every one shall swear allegiance to the constitution publicly in the court.

SECTION 52. The right of voting shall be suspended, (a) in the case of criminal prosecution; (b) on account of insolvency or failure, until the creditors have received full payment, unless the failure has been caused by fire, or by other accidents, proved to have been unintentional.

SECTION 53. The right of voting shall be null and void, (a) in case of condemnation to imprisonment, or ignominious punishment; (b) if foreign service is entered without the consent of the government; (c) if the citizenship of another country is acquired; (d) or if detected in buying or selling votes, or in voting at more than one election.

SECTION 54. The elections shall be held every third year. They shall be completed before the end of the month of December.

SECTION 55. The elections shall take place in the country in the principal church of the parish; and in the cities in the church, the town hall, or some other convenient place.

They shall be conducted in the country by the parish priest and his assistants; in the cities by the magistrates and the municipal councilors. The votes shall be given in the order in which the voters are registered. Dissensions concerning the right of voting shall be decided by the officers presiding at the election, whose decisions can be appealed to the Storting.

SECTION 56. Before the elections begin, the constitution shall be audibly read, in the cities by the first magistrate, and in the country by the clergyman.

SECTION 57. In the cities one elector shall be chosen for each fifty inhabitants entitled to vote. These electors shall assemble within eight days after, at a place prescribed by the authorities, and elect either from among themselves, or from the other voters in their election district, thirty-seven representatives to meet and take their seats at the Storting. From among these shall be chosen, (until otherwise directed, from Aalesund and Molde together, one representative; from Arundel and Grinstad together, one; from Bergen, four; from Brewig, one; from Christiania and Hønefoss together, four; from Christianssand, two; from Christianssund, one; from Drammen, two; from Flekkefjord, one; from Frederikshald, one; from Frederikstad, one; from Holmestrand, one; from Kongsberg, one; from Kragerø, one; from Laurvig and Sandefjord together, one; from Lillehammer and Hamar together, one; from Moss and Drobak together, one; from Porsgrund, one; from Sarpsborg, one; from Skien, one; from Stavauger, two; from Yrimsö, Hammerfest, and Vadsö together, one; from Trondhjem and Leranger together, four; from Tönsberg, one; and from Osterrisjer, one.

When a city which has not been mentioned here shall have fifty or more inhabitants entitled to vote, it shall unite with the nearest city and form one district for electing representatives. The same rule shall apply to cities which may be founded after this time. A city which may form an election district, together with another city, shall appoint its own elector, even if the number of its inhabitants entitled to vote should be less than fifty. A city which constitutes an election district by itself shall in no case appoint less than three electors.

SECTION 55. In every parish in the country the inhabitants entitled to vote shall choose electors in proportion to their numbers. Thus, 100 shall choose one; 100 to 200, two; 200 to 300, three, and so forth, in the same proportion. These electors shall, within a month, assemble at a place prescribed by the governor, (amtmand,) and then choose, either from among themselves or other persons in the province (amt) who are entitled to vote, seventy-four representatives to meet and take seats at the Storthing, viz:

From the amt of North Bergenhuns shall be chosen five; from that of South Bergenhuns, five; from that of Christian, five; from that of Hedemarken, five; from that of Romsdal, five; from that of Stavanger, five; from that of Yrumsö, two; from that of Finmark, two, and from each of the ten other amts in the country four representatives.

SECTION 59. The provisions contained in sections 57 and 58 shall remain in force until the meeting of the next legislature. If it shall then be found that the representatives from the cities constitute more or less than a third of the representatives of the entire kingdom, the legislature shall, for the future, alter these provisions in such a manner that the representatives of the cities shall be to those of the country in the proportion of one to two, and the whole number of representatives must be not less than 75 nor more than 100.

SECTION 60. Persons entitled to vote, being in the country, but unable to attend on account of illness, military service, or other lawful impediments, may send their written votes to those who preside at the elections, before their conclusion.

SECTION 61. No person can be elected a representative who has not attained the age of thirty years, and who has not been ten years a resident in the country.

SECTION 62. Members of the council of state and the functionaries employed at its offices, pensioners, and officials of the court cannot be chosen.

SECTION 63. Every one who is elected is bound to accept the election, unless he be prevented by impediments, which shall be proved by the electors, whose decision can be submitted to the judgment of the Storthing.

The person who has appeared as representative at three ordinary Storthings after the same election, shall not be bound to accept the nomination at the next election for the Storthing.

If a representative be prevented by legitimate impediments from attending the Storthing, his place shall be filled by him who stands next through the highest number of votes, or (if a special deputy election was made in the district) by the chosen deputy.

SECTION 64. So soon as the representatives are chosen they shall be provided with full powers, signed, in the country by the chief authorities, and in the cities by the magistrates, together with all the electors, as a proof that they are elected in the manner prescribed by the constitution. The lawfulness of these full powers shall be judged by the Storthing.

SECTION 65. Each representative shall be entitled to compensation from the treasury for traveling expenses to and from the Storthing, and for subsistence during the time he shall stay there.

SECTION 66. The representatives shall, on their journey to and from the Storthing, and during their stay there, be exempt from personal arrest, unless they be detected in the commission of public crimes; neither shall they be answerable out of the sessions of the Storthing for the opinions they have set forth there. Every one is bound to submit to the established rules of proceeding.

SECTION 67. The representatives chosen in the way above mentioned shall form the Storthing of the kingdom of Norway.

SECTION 68. The Storthing shall generally assemble on the first week-day of the month of February in every year, at the capital of the country, unless the King shall appoint another city in the country on account of invasion by enemies or contagious illness. Such an order must be promptly published.

SECTION 69. The King shall have power on extraordinary occasions to convene the Storthing out of the ordinary time. The King shall then issue a publication, which must be read in the churches of all the chief towns of the stifts (bishoprics) at least a fortnight before the members of the Storthing assemble at the appointed place.

SECTION 70. Such an extraordinary Storthing can be adjourned by the King to such time as he may think proper.

SECTION 71. The members of the Storthing shall sit as such for three consecutive years, both at the extraordinary and the ordinary Storthings which may be assembled within that period.

SECTION 72. If an extraordinary Storthing be still assembled when an ordinary one shall commence, the former shall be adjourned before the latter assemblies.

SECTION 73. The Storthing shall choose from among its members a fourth part, which shall form the Lagthing; the remaining three-fourths shall form the Odelsting. The choice shall be made at the first ordinary Storthing in consequence of a new election, after which the Lagthing shall remain unchanged during all the Storthings which are assembled in consequence of the same election, unless vacancies which may occur among the members by special choice.

Each Thing shall sit separately and choose its own president and secretary.

No Thing must sit unless two-thirds of its members are present.

SECTION 74. So soon as the Storthing has declared itself assembled, the King or his deputy shall open its sessions with a speech, informing them of the state of the country and the subjects which he particularly wishes to bring before the attention of the Storthing.

No debates shall take place in the presence of the King.

SECTION 75. The Storthing shall have power—

(a.) To make and repeal laws, to levy taxes, excises, duties, and other public imposts, which, however, shall not be in force longer than the 1st of July of the year in which the next ordinary Storthing shall assemble, unless they are expressly renewed by it.

(b.) To borrow money on the credit of the country.

(c.) To inspect the finances of the country.

(d.) To grant the amount necessary for the expenses of the state.

(e.) To settle how much shall be paid annually to the King and the viceroy for their households, and to fix the royal family's allowance, which, however, shall not consist of real property.

(f.) To demand the records of the government in Norway, and all public reports and documents, (matters of military command excepted,) authenticated copies or extracts of the records, made in the King's presence by the minister of state and the two councillors of state residing in Sweden, or the public documents which have been produced there.

(g.) To receive communication of the alliances and treaties which the King has concluded with foreign powers on behalf of the state, with the exception of the secret articles, which, however, must not be in variance with the public ones.

(h.) To require the attendance of every one before it in matters of state, the King and the royal family excepted. This restriction, however, shall not apply to the royal princes if they are filling other posts than that of viceroy.

(i.) To revise the lists of temporary salaries and pensions, and make therein such alterations as may be necessary.

(k.) To choose five revisers, who shall, every year, examine the accounts of the state and publish printed extracts of them. The accounts shall, therefore, be transmitted to these revisers every year before the 1st of July.

(l.) To naturalize foreigners.

SECTION 76. Every bill shall first be proposed in the Odelsting, either by its own members or by the government, through a councillor of state. If the bill be passed it shall then be sent to the Lagthing, which shall either approve or reject it, and in the latter case return it with its objections. These shall be reconsidered by the Odelsting, which shall either reject the bill or return it to the Lagthing, with or without alterations. When a bill from the Odelsting has been laid twice before the Lagthing, and has been rejected a second time, the whole Storthing shall assemble and the fate of the bill shall then be decided by two-thirds of the votes. Three days at least shall elapse between each of these sittings.

SECTION 77. When a bill proposed by the Odelsting has been approved by the Lagthing, or the assembled Storthing, it shall be sent by deputies from both divisions of the Storthing to the King, if he be present, or otherwise to the viceroy, or the Norwegian government, requesting the King's approval.

SECTION 78. If the King approve of the bill he shall sign it, and it becomes a law. If he disapprove he shall send it back to the Odelsting, declaring that he finds it advisable at present to withhold his approval, in which case the bill must not again be presented to the King by the Storthing then assembled.

SECTION 79. If a bill be passed, without alterations, by three ordinary Storthings assembled after three consecutive elections, and separated by at least two intermediate Storthings, without any fresh resolution having been made by any Storthing in the interval between the first and the second approval, and if it then be presented to the King with the request that His Majesty should not withhold his approval of a bill which the Storthing (after the most mature deliberation) has considered advisable it shall become a law, even if it has not obtained the King's approval, before the adjournment of the Storthing.

SECTION 80. The Storthing shall continue to set so long as it considers it necessary; but not longer than two months without the King's permission. When it has concluded its deliberations, or having assembled for the prescribed term the Storthing be adjourned by the King, he shall then communicate his resolution regarding the bills not yet decided on, by either approving or rejecting them. Every bill not expressly approved by him shall be considered rejected.

SECTION 81. Every law shall be published in the Norwegian language, and in the King's name, (those mentioned in section 79 excepted,) under the seal of the kingdom of Norway, and in the following terms:

"We, N. N., make known: Whereas the resolution of the Storthing bearing the date of N. N. has been presented to us with these contents, (here follow the resolutions,) we have approved and confirmed, as we hereby approve and confirm it as a law, under our hand and the seal of the kingdom."

SECTION 82. The King's approval shall not be required for those resolutions of the Storthing by which it—

(a.) Declares itself assembled as a Storthing according to the prescriptions of the constitution.

(b.) Determines the rules of its proceedings.

(c.) Approves or rejects the power of the present members.

(d.) Confirms or rejects decisions concerning controversies at the elections.

(e.) Naturalizes foreigners.

(f.) And finally, to resolutions by which the Odelsting impeaches councilors of state or others.

SECTION 83. The Storthing may require the opinion of the supreme court on legal matters.

SECTION 84. The sittings of the Storthing shall be public, and its proceedings shall be printed and published, except in such cases where the majority shall decide to the contrary.

SECTION 85. Whosoever obeys a command which tends to disturb the liberty and safety of the Storthing, shall commit treason against his native country.

D.—THE JUDICIAL POWER.

SECTION 86. The members of the Lagthing together with the supreme court shall form the high court of the kingdom, (rigsret,) which shall pronounce final sentence upon all cases of prosecution brought by the Odelsting upon members of the council of state, or by the supreme court, for crimes of official commission.

The president of the Lagthing shall take the chair of the rigsret.

SECTION 87. The accused may, without assigning any reason, challenge one-third of the members of the rigsret; provided, however, that the court shall consist of at least fifteen members.

SECTION 88. The verdict of the supreme court shall be final. It must not consist of less than one president and six assessors.

SECTION 89. The supreme court, together with two superior officers appointed by the King, shall, in times of peace, be the second and final appeal in all courts-martial which may affect either life, honor, or imprisonment for more than three months.

SECTION 90. Sentences passed by the supreme court shall in no case be appealed or revised.

SECTION 91. No person shall be appointed member of the supreme court who has not attained the age of thirty years.

E.—GENERAL PROVISION.

SECTION 92. Government offices shall be conferred on those Norwegian citizens only who confess the Evangelical Lutheran religion, who have sworn allegiance to the constitution and the King, and who speak the language of the country, and—

(a.) Who were born in the country, of parents who were then subjects of the state.

(b.) Or were born in foreign countries of Norwegian parents, who were not at that time subjects of any other country.

(c.) Or who were settled in the country on the 17th May, 1814, and did not refuse to take the oath for maintaining the independence of Norway.

(d.) Or who shall continue to reside in the country for ten years.

(e.) Or who become naturalized by the Storthing.

Foreigners, however, may be made professors at the university and the public Latin schools, physicians, and consuls in foreign countries. No one can be appointed chief magistrate before he has attained the age of thirty years; and magistrates, judges, and sheriffs must have reached the age of twenty-five years.

SECTION 93. Norway shall only be liable to pay its own national debt.

SECTION 94. A new general, civil, and criminal code of laws shall be made at the first, or, if not practicable, at the second ordinary Storthing.

The laws of the country now in force shall meanwhile be valid; provided they be not repugnant to this constitution or the temporary resolutions which may be published. The permanent taxes now in force shall equally be valid until the next Storthing.

SECTION 95. No dispensations, or any other exemptions from law, shall be granted when the new general code of laws has been published.

SECTION 96. Every one shall be judged according to the law, and they shall be punished by law after sentence has been passed.

Examination by torture shall not take place.

SECTION 97. No ex post facto law shall be passed.

SECTION 98. Taxes to the treasury shall not be paid at the same time as fees to the court officers.

SECTION 99. No person can be arrested except in such case and manner as is prescribed by the laws. Those who order an unauthorized arrest, or are guilty of illegal delay, shall be responsible to the arrested.

The government shall have no power to use military force against the citizens, except in accordance with the provisions of the laws, unless any assembly should disturb the public security, and refuse to disperse immediately on the riot act having been audibly read to them three times.

SECTION 100. There shall be liberty of the press. No person shall be punished for any writing, whatever its contents may be, which he may have caused to be printed or published, unless he have willfully and evidently broken the laws, or advised others to do so, or disregarded religion, decency, or the constitutional powers, resisted their orders, or been guilty of calumny or defamation.

Freedom of speech shall be granted to all, with respect to the government and other matters.

SECTION 101. New and permanent restrictions connected with free trade shall not be granted to any one in future.

SECTION 102. Domiciliary searches shall not be allowed, except in criminal cases.

SECTION 103. Places of refuge shall not be granted in future to bankrupts.

SECTION 104. Real and personal property shall in no case be confiscated.

SECTION 105. If it be necessary for the welfare of the state that any one shall give up his real and personal property to the public, he shall have full compensation from the treasury.

SECTION 106. Purchase money, and revenues of properties bequeathed to the clergy, shall be exclusively employed for the benefit of the clergy and the promotion of public education. The funds of charitable institutions shall solely be employed for their benefit.

SECTION 107. The allodial privileges shall not be abolished. The first or the second Storting shall fix the conditions of such privileges as shall remain in force and be of the greatest benefit to the country and the inhabitants of the rural districts.

SECTION 108. Neither counts' or barons' estates, nor any other entailed family estate, shall be founded in future.

SECTION 109. All citizens shall generally be bound to defend their native country for a certain time, without regard to birth or fortune. The first assembled ordinary Storting shall decide on the right application of this rule, and affix the restrictions to which it shall be subjected, due information having been previously received by a committee. It shall also decide whether it be serviceable to the country that the duty of bearing arms shall cease when a citizen has attained the age of 25 years. Meanwhile the prescriptions now in force shall remain valid.

SECTION 110. Norway shall keep its own bank, its current-money, and coinage system. These institutions shall be fixed by a law.

SECTION 111. Norway shall have the right to use its own flag for merchant vessels. The naval flag shall be a union flag.

SECTION 112. If experience should prove the necessity of an alteration in any part of the constitution of the kingdom of Norway, the proposal shall be made at the first ordinary Storting after a new election and be printed and published. But the question of carrying the proposed amendment shall be decided by one of the ordinary Storthings after a new election. Such an amendment, however, must never contradict the principles of this constitution, but only modify some of its points in such way that the character of the constitution be not changed. The amendments shall be carried by two-thirds of the members of the Storting.

Christiania, at the extraordinary meeting of the Storting, on the fourth day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fourteen. [78 signatures.]

ACT OF UNION,

Established between the Storting of the kingdom of Norway, and the Diet of the kingdom of Sweden, determining the constitutional relations between the two kingdoms.

We, Charles, by the grace of God, King of Sweden and Norway, the Goths and the Vandals, &c., &c., Duke of Schleswig-Holstein, the Stormarn and the Dithmarsk. Count of Oldenburg and Delmenhorst, &c., &c., make known:

Whereas, the Storting of the kingdom of Norway, and the Diet of the kingdom of

Sweden, in accordance with our gracious proposals, have agreed on and resolved, in order to determine the constitutional relations between Norway and Sweden, to make a special act of union, as here exactly and literally follows:

We, the undersigned, representatives of the kingdom of Norway, assembled in Christiania at an extraordinary meeting of the Storthing, and we, the Diet of the Kingdom of Sweden, counts, barons, bishops, knights and nobles, clergy, citizens, and common people, now assembled here in Stockholm, at an extraordinary meeting of the Diet, make known:

Whereas, by the help of God, a union has been successfully established between the people of Scandinavia, and as it shall be maintained by mutual recognition of the legal rights of the people for the protection of the two thrones, and also, as it was established by voluntary conviction and not by arms, and whereas we, the undersigned states of the kingdom of Sweden, (on occasion of His Royal Majesty's gracious proposal of 12th April last concerning the new constitutional relations established between Norway and Sweden,) have recognized and unanimously confirmed all points in the constitution of the kingdom of Norway of the 4th November, 1814, regarding these constitutional relations, which, while we reserve our constitutional rights in those points, will involve alteration or modification in the constitution of the kingdom of Sweden, have, on the 10th November, been accepted and sworn to by our most gracious Lord and King; we, the lawful representatives of the inhabitants of Norway and Sweden, can find no worthier or more solemn way of ratifying and permanently establishing the union formed between Norway and Sweden under one King, (but with different governments and laws,) than by consenting thereto, and constituting the said condition into a special act of union, such as is hereby literally subjoined and follows:

SECTION 1. The kingdom of Norway shall be a free, independent, indivisible, and inalienable country, united with Sweden under one King. Its form of government shall be monarchical, limited, and hereditary.

SECTION 2. The order of succession to the throne shall be descending and agnatic, such as is provided by the order of succession of the 26th day of September, 1810, passed by the Diet of the kingdom of Sweden and sanctioned by the King.

Among those entitled to succession are also counted those who may be born after their father's death, and who will immediately assume their place in the hereditary line.

When a prince entitled to succeed to the united crowns of Norway and Sweden is born, his name and the time of his birth shall be announced to the next Storthing and be registered on its records.

SECTION 3. If no prince entitled to succession exist, and an election of a successor must be held in both countries, the Storthing in Norway and the Diet in Sweden shall be convoked on the self-same day.

The King, or (if such election occur during the vacancy of the throne) the legal government ad interim of both countries, shall, on the same day and in both places, make proposal concerning the succession. This must take place within eighteen days subsequent to that on which the Storthing in Norway and the Diet in Sweden were lawfully opened.

The members of the Norwegian Storthing and the Swedish Diet shall have power to propose a successor. If any intend to do so, his proposal must be made within the prescribed time.

The Storthing of Norway and the Diet of the kingdom of Sweden shall thereupon fix separately the day of election; but the election of the successor shall of necessity take place no later than on the twelfth day after that prescribed for the proposal.

On the day previous to that fixed for the election by the Storthing of Norway and the Diet of the kingdom of Sweden, the Storthing of Norway and the Diet of the kingdom of Sweden shall choose (from among their own members) a committee, who (in event of the choice falling on different persons) shall be charged to meet on behalf of the representatives of both countries, to decide by vote the choice of one person.

The Storthing of Norway and the Diet of the kingdom of Sweden, on the day fixed for the election, in accordance with the rules prescribed in the constitutions of both countries, shall each select one from the proposed candidates.

When the choice of both countries falls upon the same person, he shall be lawfully elected successor to the throne. If, on the contrary, each country should have elected a different person, the question shall be decided by the votes of the combined committees of both countries.

This committee shall consist of thirty-six persons for each country and eight deputies, elected in the way specially prescribed by the Storthing of Norway and the Diet of the kingdom of Sweden. The deputies shall enter upon service in stated order, but only in event of any of the regular members being absent at the election.

Carlstad shall be the place where the committees of both countries shall meet. Before each committee leaves the place where the Storthing in Norway and the Diet in Sweden are assembled, they shall elect a chairman from among themselves.

The King, or, in case of his death, the legal government ad interim of both countries shall, within the shortest possible time, (after having been informed of the choice of both countries, and duly considering the distances between the places where the Storting in Norway and the Diet in Sweden are held from the place of meeting,) fix the day on which the committees of both countries shall meet at Carlstad. This shall not be later than twenty-one days after that day prescribed above and named as the latest election period for the Storting of Norway and the Diet of the kingdom of Sweden.

The chairmen of the committees of both countries shall, immediately on their arrival, order them to assemble in the forenoon of the day next to that appointed for the arrival of the committees at the place of meeting.

When they are assembled, the chairman of each committee shall first read his own and his colleagues' full powers, whereupon both chairmen shall draw lots for the presidency at the election.

The combined committee for both countries, thus united under one president, (who also has a vote,) shall then, immediately, without any debate commence the voting.

The committee shall not separate, neither shall any member leave the room where they are assembled until the election be completed.

As each vote is given the chairman of the committee of either country shall read and exchange the document which contains the choice made by his committee. The proposal of voting shall then be recorded, and the names of both candidates be registered according to the following scheme:

"The deputies of the Storting of Norway and the Diet of the kingdom of Sweden shall vote together, in order to elect a successor to the united thrones of Norway and Sweden. The Storting of Norway has proposed N. N., and the Diet of the kingdom of Sweden has proposed N. N.

"If the majority of votes are in favor of N. N. he shall be lawfully elected to succeed the King (be King) on the united thrones of Norway and Sweden.

"Before summoning the votes, all the provisions relating to the manner of voting shall be distinctly and audibly read.

"The summons shall be given as follows: When the chairman of the combined committees is a Norwegian, the Swedish deputies shall be summoned first to vote; and that the Norwegians, and vice versa when the chairman is a Swede. The voting shall be made by slips of paper, exactly corresponding in size and appearance, on which the name of each candidate shall be printed in characters of equal size. The chairman who does not preside at the election shall sign the slips of paper before they be delivered to the deputies. These slips of paper, in order to be valid, shall be single, without any marks, and shall be shut up and folded together. A majority of one shall decide the election.

"Before counting the slips the chairman shall draw out one, seal it, and lay it aside. If on opening the slips, after the above summons, there should be found any which are not valid, according to the rules before mentioned, they shall be destroyed immediately.

"If the result prove to be an equality of votes, the sealed slip shall be opened and shall decide the election, provided it possesses the necessary qualifications.

"If it be not admissible, the whole proceeding shall be considered null and void, and a new voting shall take place immediately.

"If there be a majority without adopting this measure, the slip which was put aside shall be destroyed without being opened.

"The votes shall be recorded by the deputies themselves, in the Norwegian language if the chairman be a Norwegian, and in the Swedish language if he be a Swede. The record shall, immediately after the close of the poll, be loudly read and acknowledged; whereupon, two similar copies shall be made, be signed by the whole election committee before they separate, and sealed in their presence.

"They shall forthwith be dispatched, on the same day, by the chairmen of the committees of each country, one to the Storting of Norway, directed to its president, and the other to the Diet of the kingdom of Sweden, directed to the president of the nobility and to the other presidents.

"These records shall be signed in this manner: The copy which is sent to Norway shall be signed first by the Norwegian and then by the Swedish deputies; and the copy which is forwarded to the Diet of Sweden shall be first signed by the Swedish and then by the Norwegian deputies.

"On the arrival of this election act at both places, it shall directly, or at latest on the following day, be reported to the Storting in Norway, and to the Diet in Sweden. And the Storting of Norway and the Diet of the kingdom of Sweden shall immediately take care that this resolution of the representatives of both countries be communicated to his royal highness; or, if he be dead, to the lawful government ad interim."

SECTION 4. The King shall have power to gather troops, commence war, and conclude peace, to enter into and dissolve alliances, and to send and receive ambassadors.

When the King proposes to declare war, he shall communicate with the government in Norway, who will pronounce its views on the subject, and also furnish a complete report of the financial state of the country, its means of defense, and other matters. When this has been done, the King shall form an extraordinary council of state, consisting of the Norwegian minister of state and the Norwegian councilors of state, together with those of Sweden, and he shall then lay before them the grounds and circumstances of the case.

The report of the government of Norway on the state of that country, together with a similar one of Sweden, shall then be produced. The King shall require their opinion on these subjects, which shall be put down separately on the records by each of them, under the responsibility provided by the constitution. The King shall then have power to hold and execute the decision which he may think most profitable to the country.

SECTION 5. The Norwegian minister of state and the two Norwegian councilors of state who attend the King, shall have seats and deliberative votes in the Swedish council, when subjects concerning both countries are there discussed.

The opinion of the government in Norway ought also to be asked in such matters, unless they need to be decided on so quickly that there is no time for it. So often as matters concerning both countries are discussed in the King's presence, at the Norwegian council of state, whosoever assembled, three members of the Swedish council of state shall have their seats and vote there.

SECTION 6. When the King dies and the successor to the throne is not yet of age, the Norwegian and Swedish councils of state shall be immediately convened, in order to call together the Storting in Norway, and the Diet in Sweden.

SECTION 7. Until the representatives of both countries be assembled, and until they have arranged the government during the minority of the King, a council of state, composed of an equal number of Norwegian and Swedish members, shall take charge of the administration of both countries, duly observing their respective constitutions, and under the name of the government ad interim of Norway and Sweden. This united council of state shall consist of ten members from each country, viz: From Norway, the Norwegian minister of state and the two councilors of state who reside in Stockholm, together with seven real or specially appointed councilors, (who, in the event of a vacancy to the throne, or during the King's minority, shall be elected by the government in Norway, from among their own members,) in whose place at least three councilors shall be appointed, ad interim; and from Sweden, the two ministers and eight councilors of state.

Both the Norwegian and Swedish cases shall be prepared and examined according to the prescribed law of both countries.

The Norwegian cases which transpire during the government ad interim shall be reported, registered, and dispatched in the Norwegian language by the Norwegian minister of state, and the Swedish cases shall be reported, registered, and dispatched in the Swedish language by the official to whose department they belong.

Cases which concern both countries, and which from their nature do not belong to any special department, shall be reported by the minister of state for foreign affairs, and be dispatched to each country in their own language, to Norway by its minister of state, and to Sweden by the official above mentioned.

Diplomatic matters shall also be reported by the minister of state for foreign affairs, and registered on special records.

The cases shall be decided by a majority, and if the votes be equal the decision rests with the chairman.

All the resolutions that are passed shall be signed by all the members.

The combined council of state (the government ad interim) shall meet at Stockholm.

At the first meeting of both councils of state the Norwegian and the Swedish state ministers shall draw lots who shall first be chairman. This order being established, the chairman shall be changed every eight days, so that each minister of state shall be chairman in succession for one week only.

In all cases when, in accordance with the constitutions of Norway and Sweden, the countries shall be governed by the council of state, the councils of state of both countries shall meet in equal number, and in the way above mentioned.

SECTION 8. The choice of the guardians, who shall govern on behalf of the King during his minority, shall be made according to the same rules and in the same manner as has already been provided in section 3 regarding the election of a successor to the throne.

SECTION 9. The Norwegians who, in the cases above mentioned, shall be invested with government, shall take the following oath before the Norwegian Storting: "I do promise and swear to govern in accordance with the constitution and the laws, so help me God and his holy word."

The Swedes shall take the oath before the Diet of the kingdom of Sweden.

If the Storting or the Diet be not assembled at that time, the written oath shall be deposited with the council of state, and repeated at the next Storting or Diet.

SECTION 10. The direction of the King's education, during his minority, shall be fixed in the way mentioned in section 8.

It shall be an unalterable rule that the King shall be sufficiently instructed in the Norwegian language during his minority.

SECTION 11. If the royal male line has become extinct, and no successor to the throne has been elected, a new royal lineage shall be chosen in the way mentioned in section 3.

SECTION 12. As the provisions contained in this act of union are partly copied from the constitution of the kingdom of Norway and partly additions to it, founded on the authority given by the constitution to the now assembled Storting, they shall, as concerns Norway, be established and continue as valid as the constitution of this kingdom, and they shall not be altered except in the way prescribed in section 112.

For further security, having decreed and resolved all the foregoing, we, the Storting of the kingdom of Norway, and we, the Diet of the kingdom of Sweden, have established and confirmed this act of union with our signatures and our seals, which was made in Christiania, on Monday, the thirty-first day of July, and in Stockholm on the sixth day of the month of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifteen.

We are pleased hereby to accept, confirm, and establish the said act of union, with all its articles, points, and clauses.

We also graciously command and ordain, that all who are bound to us, our successors, and the kingdom by oaths of allegiance, do acknowledge, observe, and obey this act of union. For further security we have signed and confirmed these presents with our own hand, and have caused our royal seal to be affixed thereto, which was done at our residence, the city of Stockholm, on the sixth day of the month of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifteen.

No. 36.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Berne, February 1, 1871. (Received February 18.)

SIR: The French army of the East, or what remains of it, its retreat being cut, and finding itself destitute of supplies, crossed the Swiss frontier, in the neighborhood of Pontarlier, this morning, and laid down its arms. General Bourbaki, its late commander, is reported to be dying from a wound inflicted by his own hand some days since, designed to terminate his life. The Swiss general-in-chief, Herzog, reports the number of the French prisoners thus suddenly thrown upon Switzerland at eighty thousand, or, perhaps, rather more. The federal council are making arrangements for their internment. They are to be apportioned to the different cantons, the quota of the canton of Berne being twenty thousand five hundred. The war has already imposed burdens that are serious to be borne by so small a country as Switzerland, and this event will, for the present, materially add to their weight. They are, however, cheerfully met by a brave, patriotic, and intelligent people, who shrink from no sacrifice that is essential for the preservation of their independence.

The Swiss army now occupying the northwestern frontier, along the line of the Jura, numbers about thirty thousand men.

The news of the armistice recently arranged between the members of the government of the national defense at Paris and the Emperor of Germany, notwithstanding the deep sympathy which is felt for France at the present moment, was received here with much satisfaction, since it was generally regarded as the preliminary step to a conclusion of the war. It appears, however, that a strong disposition is manifested in many quarters of France, and especially in those which have, as yet, remained unvisited by the actual horrors of war, to reject the armistice and to adhere to Mr. Gambetta's policy of war à outrance. Thus that unhappy country is threatened with new distractions, and it is possible that the calamities of civil strife are about to be added to the ruin and humiliation brought upon it by a foreign invasion.

From the most trustworthy data I am able to obtain, I am firmly of the conviction that if the real voice of France could make itself heard it would pronounce decidedly in favor of peace, even though upon terms hard and humiliating. Whether that voice can be stifled and a contest of despair continued, in which there is no prospect of ultimate success to justify it, and which promises nothing but new, and, if possible, more frightful disasters, the unavailing slaughter of thousands of men and the devastation of still more cities and provinces, remains to be seen. During the past three or four months France has surprised the world by the rapidity with which she has called new armies into existence, but it would, perhaps, be erroneous to attribute her achievements in this regard to the patriotic fervor of the masses of her people. The government of the national defense inherited the machinery of the empire. It found also a people with the habit of obedience of yielding readily to whatever person or persons the vicissitudes of the time might bring into authority. The new levies answered promptly to its call when summoned. Thus it was a comparatively easy task to place in the field armies imposing in point of numbers, however deficient in other vital respects. But it was quite another thing to breathe into them that ardor and frenzy of patriotic enthusiasm which have sometimes enabled a people, accustomed to liberty and fighting in self defense, victoriously to confront superior numbers and organization. Thus the French armies have been scattered as rapidly as they have been organized. With many individual exceptions, of course, there has been a lack of zeal and steadfastness among the soldiers, while no happy inspirations of genius seem to have visited their commanders. Moreover, both the armies and the people have been constantly fed upon delusions. False reports from Paris have stimulated the courage and the hopes of the provinces, and false reports from the provinces have stayed up the faltering resolution of Paris to the hour when surrender became inevitable. With the fall of Paris it will be necessary to abandon this system; at least it will become, in a great measure, impracticable to continue it. A large body of German troops will be released for other operations, and it is quite improbable, whatever may be the present inclinations of the people of cities like Bordeaux, Lyons, and Marseilles, that the war can be renewed upon any large scale. The great mass of the rural population want peace.

During the later stages of the contest, the sympathies of the Swiss people, at first largely enlisted on the side of the Germans, have turned strongly in favor of France. Commiseration for her misfortunes, the hope, though clouded by many doubts, of witnessing the successful establishment of republican institutions in that country, and apprehensions respecting the ulterior designs of those who bear a leading part in accomplishing the unity of Germany, have united to produce this change. There have not been wanting fears that in the intoxication likely to follow such unexampled successes as have attended the German armies, the absorption of the German-speaking cantons of Switzerland might be regarded as essential to German unity. Some manifestations of a desire to rectify the boundaries of Baden by acquiring certain small bits and savages of Swiss territory lying on the right bank of the Rhine and including the city of Schaffhausen, have created more or less uneasiness as to the future policy of the new German empire. The subject has given rise to some discussions in the public journals, but I think no serious apprehensions respecting it are at present entertained in government circles here.

I am, &c.,

HORACE RUBLEE.

P. S.—I have received some additional particulars respecting the surrender of the French troops on the frontier this morning. They are under the command of General Clinchaut. Only a part of the troops have yet crossed the frontier, but the whole force is to cross and lay down their arms in pursuance of a convention concluded between General Clinchaut and General Herzog, the Swiss commander, at 5 o'clock this morning.

The number of French troops who thus surrender is 84,900. They are to be interned in the several cantons as follows: Zurich, 11,000; Berne, 20,000; Lucerne, 5,000; Uri, 400; Schwytz, 1,000; Obwalden, 400; Midwalden, 300; Glarus, 1,000; Zug, 700; Fribourg, 4,000; Solothure, 3,000; Baleville, 1,500; Bale Campagne, 1,500; Schaffhausen, 1,200; Appenzell, R. E., 1,500; Appenzell, R. L., 200; St. Gall, 7,000; Grisons, 1,000; Argovie, 8,800; Thurgovie, 3,900; Vaud, 8,000; Valais, 1,000; Neuchâtel, 1,000; Geneva, 1,500.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Berne, May 25, 1871. (Received June 14.

SIR: I have the honor to submit the inclosed correspondence with the federal council of Switzerland on the subject embraced in your dispatch No. 13, of the 13th of June, 1870. The delay in the response of the federal council is the result of its preoccupation with the events and consequences of the recent European war. The brochure, referred to several times in the report of Mr. Feer-Herzog, which accompanies the reply of the federal council, was transmitted by me to the State Department with my No. 22, of the 24th of August last.

I am, &c.,

HORACE RUBLEE.

Mr. Rublee to Dr. Dubs.

No. 15.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Berne, July 5, 1871.

The undersigned, minister resident of the United States of America in Switzerland, begs leave to transmit to his excellency the President of the Swiss confederation, in chief of the political department thereof the inclosed copy of a dispatch from the Secretary of State of the United States respecting the adoption of a common unit and standard of an international gold coinage. I am therein instructed to say that the Government of the United States, at the request of the Senate, invites the government of Switzerland to express its views upon the subject in question, with the purpose of promoting the adoption of such a common unit and standard; and, further, that the President of the United States will deem it his duty, under the resolution of the Senate requesting him to invite this correspondence, to transmit to that body any communication which the government of Switzerland may be pleased to make in relation thereto.

The undersigned seizes this occasion to renew to your excellency and to the high federal council the assurances of his highest consideration.

HORACE RUBLEE.

[Translation.]

BERNE, May 17, 1871.

With the note which the minister resident of the United States addressed to the federal council on the 5th of July, 1870, he transmitted a copy of a paper from the minister of foreign affairs concerning the unification of gold coin and invited the council to communicate to the Government of the Union its opinion upon this important question, with the object of effecting the earliest possible solution of it. The federal council has, in consequence, the honor to transmit herewith to Mr. Horace Rublee a copy of a report on this subject made to the federal department of finance by Mr. Feer-Herzog, of Aarau, a member of the national council and a man extremely well versed in the question. The federal council will unite with pleasure in the efforts which are the subject of the Senate resolution of the 1st of February and of Mr. Fish's dispatch of the 13th of June, 1870. However, it must be observed that the council does not perceive any possibility of a solution in the system No. 2, (Kelly-Elliot,) explained in the dispatch, and that the mere monetary approximation, (rapprochement,) which is the purpose of system No. 3 of the dispatch, will not, in the judgment of the federal council, produce the useful results which the author of the dispatch seems to anticipate from it; that, hence, the federal council recommends to the very serious attention of the Government of the United States system No. 1, monetary unification by means of simple equations between the principal existing types, conformably to the plan of the conference of 1867 and to the bill introduced in Congress by Mr. Hooper. In conclusion, Switzerland must occupy the special position imposed by the monetary convention of 1865, and which does not permit her to act definitely except in concert with her present monetary allies. The federal council renews, &c.

In the name of the federal council,

SCHENK,
President Swiss Confederation.

The Vice-Chancellor, I. KERN GERMAN.

[Translation.]

Report to the federal department of finance on the American dispatch of June 13, 1870, relative to monetary unification.

The events of the war will probably explain to you why I have so long delayed the submission of the opinion which you have requested on the dispatch of Mr. Hamilton Fish, dated June 13, 1870, relative to monetary unification, and transmitted to the federal council by Mr. Rublee on the 5th of the following July.

The step of Mr. Fish is a consequence of the invitation addressed to Mr. Grant by the Senate of the United States to enter into correspondence with foreign powers for the establishment of a common unit and an international coinage. Having already announced this step in a brochure that I published in May, last year, under the title, "La France et ses alliés monétaires," (see page 17.) in which I considered the questions treated of in the dispatch of the United States, I think I may abbreviate by referring to the said work for a more extended development of the subject, and confine myself to the succinct exposition which follows:

The American dispatch is not limited to asking the opinion of the governments to whom it is addressed, but it sets forth at the same time the conditions to which a common coinage should conform.

1st. That it must not vary, or as little as possible, from the existing coinage of the United States.

2d. That it must be acquiesced in by Great Britain and by the countries that have adopted the franc of France.

3d. That gold must be made the sole standard, and that the double standard must be discarded.

The dispatch then proceeds to elucidate the several systems which seem to be more or less adapted to realize this programme in a manner more or less complete, and to some extent indicates an opinion upon them. These systems are—

I. That of the conference of 1867, which consists in taking as a common denominator the gold value of the 5-franc piece, (1.4561 grains, pure gold, or 1.6123 grains, gold of nine-tenths fineness,) and to effect some slight modifications in the unit of other nations. The modifications required would be a diminution of $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in the American dollar, making it the equivalent of the 5-franc piece; a diminution of .008 in the English sovereign, making it the quintuple of 5 francs; an augmentation of 1 per cent. in the Austrian florin, making it equivalent to one-half of 5 francs; finally, Germany, conformably to the propositions of her Handelstag, would adopt a florin similar to that of Austria. The international coinage would then be represented by—1st. In France, a 25-franc piece; in England, a sovereign; in Germany and Austria, a 10-florin piece; in the United States, a half eagle, or \$5; all identical in value, in weight, and alloyage. 2d. By the multiples and submultiples of these pieces. This system, warmly recommended by Mr. Ruggles, commissioner of the United States at the conference of 1867, forms the basis of a bill introduced in Congress by Representative Hooper, of Massachusetts. Mr. Fish, however, alleges that the modification of the dollar contemplated by this system is so considerable that the Government of the United States cannot resolve upon it until first satisfied that Great Britain will make a corresponding modification in the sovereign.

II. The Kelly-Elliott system is mentioned in the second place. The American dollar contains 1.5046 grains fine gold. Messrs. Kelly and Elliot propose to reduce it to 1.500 grains, an insignificant change, which would give the dollar a round number in grammes of fine gold. This modification would produce the equation upon which the authors of the plan so much rely: \$20 = 3 German crowns. By increasing the franc about 3 per cent., and the pound sterling $2\frac{1}{2}$, we should again have equality between \$20, 100 francs, and 4 sovereigns. A bill embodying this system has been introduced in Congress by Mr. Kelly, but that body has not yet taken action either upon it or the concurrent bill of Mr. Hooper.

III. The author of the American dispatch, appearing to think that the second system demands too large an augmentation of the franc and the sovereign to be relished in France and England, just as he himself shrinks from the diminution of the dollar proposed by the conference of 1867, asks if it is not possible to realize, up to a certain point, the advantages of a common coinage, without wholly abandoning special coinages, and he thinks this result may be obtained, without sensibly changing existing coinages, by establishing a common measure or divisor of these coinages. This divisor would be the decigramme of pure gold. The fractions of decigrammes in each special coin would be dropped, and such coin henceforth would be made to contain a certain weight of fine gold reckoned in round decigrammes. The half-eagles, or $5, would be reduced from 75.232 to 75 decigrammes, &c. (See page 11 of the dispatch.) The decigramme would then be a common normal measure. The number of decigrammes of fine gold which they (the coins) contained would be indicated upon the exterior of the pieces, and the reciprocal value of coins, in international exchanges, would be determined by the decigrammes of fine gold that they represented.

Before pronouncing upon these three propositions, I ought to remark that the dispatch in a memorandum annexed classes the countries in which the dollar, the franc, and the sovereign are employed, in a manner altogether arbitrary. It enlarges the domain of the sovereign by assigning to it the East Indies, which have the rupee and not the sovereign; and China and Japan, where the sovereign does not exist, under the pretext that most of the drafts drawn upon Europe in those countries are expressed in pounds sterling. In order not to lessen the dollar, he adds also China and Japan to the domain of the latter, on the pretext that the Mexican piastre, closely approximating to the dollar, is the denomination in use in the seaports of those countries. Finally, he adds Germany and Austria as having a like system, which is incorrect. I oppose, on my part, to this comparative table that of another American, Mr. Ruggles, reproduced on page 80 of my brochure, and which, properly leaving Asia out of the question, as having nothing to do with the comparison, proves that, in respect to population, to existing currency, and to international commerce, the group of the franc of France is by much the more considerable. I propose that the federal council call the attention of the Government of the United States to this table, (extract from a brochure, entitled International Coinage, by Samuel B. Ruggles, 1870, New York, and prepared by the author from figures furnished him by the English board of trade.)

The showings of this table explain why the governments that have adopted the French franc are expecting other peoples to approximate to the franc rather than they, themselves, to approximate to a foreign unit. The gold coins of the French system are the most numerous, the most generally diffused, and the most acceptable. The sovereign requires much less change to adapt itself to the franc than to conform to the dollar, as proposed by the Kelly system. The monetary system of Germany is on the eve of being reformed, and the most popular and most national reform, that which preserves the small German units of reckoning, (page 22 of my brochure,) is its adaptation to the franc by means of the florin of the value of francs 2.50. It is true that to make the American dollar equivalent to 5 francs requires a diminution of about 3 per cent. in the dollar. But this reduction would not cause serious inconvenience, as the dispatch alleges, (page 5,) to the American people, because all existing credits would be reduced proportionately to the change in the dollar, and the price of commodities raised in consequence. Finally, the gold coinage of the United States has been attended by a profit, the mint tax being $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. The withdrawal of the existing gold coin would not, then, cause any loss to the State in respect to the expense of mintage; neither would there be any loss on account of wear, the present monetary laws of the United States not requiring the Government to withdraw gold coin depreciated in that manner. The demonetization, then, of the coin now in circulation will produce no loss to the Government, because the pieces may be withdrawn upon paying to the holders the weight value. Finally, the great part of the business transactions within the country, having for a long time been carried on in paper dollars, of a varying value, the fixity of value of the gold dollar does not possess for the habitudes of the citizens of the United States the signification which the fixity of the monetary unit would have in countries with an exclusively metallic circulation, that is to say, where a legal tender in paper does not exist. The Kelly-Elliott system, that the American dispatch places by the side of that of the conference of 1867, belongs in the category of those that would, at any price, establish monetary unification upon a quantity of gold capable of being metrically expressed without running into a fraction. I object to it, in the first place, that if the dollar can, without any inconvenience whatever, be reduced to 18.500 fine gold, its rapprochement to the other types will not be thereby further advanced. The equation, 30 grammes fine gold = \$20 = three German crowns, which constitutes the great argument of the authors of this system, does not produce monetary unification at all, since the German crown, despite this equation, will never be divisible by the dollar. Moreover, this crown, (10 grammes of fine gold alloyed to nine-tenths,) created by the convention of 1857, is a coin that has no commercial role, since it does not harmonize with the currency in usage on the continent, and is condemned by a majority of German authors. It would need to become the basis of the new German system to give any value to its relation with the dollar, and in spite of the recommendations of some theorists, there is very little probability that Germany will adopt a unit which is worth 34.44 francs, or 9 thalers and 9 silbergroschen, and the decimal subdivision of which would never conform to the subdivision of the thaler or the florin, which would destroy all connection with the ancient monetary systems, and oblige the public to guess the values of things, or to reckon by means of factors entirely new to it. Finally, it seems impossible that the pound sterling should be augmented by $2\frac{1}{4}$ per cent., the franc by $3\frac{1}{4}$, in order to conform to the Elliott equation: \$20 = 100 francs = 4 pounds. For, it must be observed, it is easier to effect an adaptation by a diminution of the existing unit, it being exceedingly difficult to accomplish it by increasing those units. I propose, then, to the federal council, the categorical rejection of the Kelly-Elliott combination. The third system mentioned in the dispatch remains to be considered. I freely concede that the point of view which forms the basis of this system is very reasonable. In case a veritable unification be impossible, if the Englishman will not renounce his sovereign, the Frenchman his franc, the American his dollar, and if each refuse to adopt the modifications necessary to render his type the equivalent, the multiple or the submultiple of the others, a relative progress would be attained in finding a common measure, and it seems, indeed, by the table on page 11 of the American dispatch that, with slight changes, the decigramme of fine gold would furnish each a common measure. The governments having once adopted it, the decigramme of fine gold contained in each coin, as indicated on it, would supply the necessary means of reduction required for their circulation and change. Unfortunately, this proposition, just in theory, loses its greatest value as soon as it is brought into practice. Coins are not composed of fine, but alloyed gold. If the half-eagle be reduced to 75 decigrammes of fine gold, and the Napoleon to 58, these round figures again become fractional when a ninth of alloy is added in order to secure the standard termed nine-tenths. It follows that the verification by weight is no longer practicable, and that the simple comparison derived from the inscription of the decigrammes of fine gold cannot be established by weighing. Everybody will agree that the absence of such a test forms a capital objection to system No. 3. This objection is so much the more grave since the coins composing the table on page 11 of the American dispatch are quite differently alloyed, viz:

The English sovereign and the Russian imperial.....	916
The Napoleon, American, eagle and German crown	900
The Friedrich d'or of Prussia	896
The old doubloon of Spain.....	875

And it is evident that with such divergences the verification of the weight of the coins in fine gold would become so complicated that the quantity on which the system reposes would prove illusory. In order to attain the character of surety essential to the success of the system, the weight even of the coin should coincide with its inscription. In other words, it would be necessary that the common measure, which the plan seeks to find in the decigramme of fine gold, should be the decigramme of an alloyage universally adopted, that of nine-tenths for example. The governments disposed to agree in this respect would then be obliged—(a.) To adopt the alloyage of nine-tenths if they did not already employ it; (b.) To suppress the fractions of decigrammes in the weight of their coins expressed in decigrammes of nine-tenths fineness. In this case The Napoleon, of nine-tenths, and weighing 64.516 decigrammes, would be diminished by

Half-eagle, weighing 83.570, would be diminished by	.0014
The sovereign, changed to nine-tenths, weighing 81.360, would be diminished by	.007
The Russian half-imperial, weighing 66.652, would be diminished by	.0044
	.010

Thus the reductions become more considerable than is calculated in the table on page 11 of the dispatch, and nearly average those imposed by the conference of 1867. We have, then, the choice, at the cost of derangements and modifications that are not far from equal, between a scheme which would produce these relations:

$$\text{Decigramme } 10 = \frac{20 \text{ frs.}}{64} = \frac{$5}{83} = \frac{1 \text{ sovereign}}{81} = \frac{\text{half-imperial}}{66}$$ or, the equation which would result from the plan of the conference of 1867, as follows:

$$25 \text{ frs.} = $5 = 1 \text{ sovereign}; \text{ and } 20 \text{ frs.} = 5 \text{ rubles.}$$

The simplicity of these last relations is such that I think this plan merits the preference, in view of its convenience for calculations. But it merits it, above all, for the reason that it allows the creation of international types, having everywhere legal circulation, while it is impossible to produce such types under the system No. 3.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Berne, May 31, 1871. (Received January 15.)

SIR: The request of the French government that the fugitive members of the defeated party in Paris who may succeed in escaping into other countries shall not be regarded as political refugees, but be held and delivered up as culprits guilty of murder, arson, and robbery, coupled with the announcement that Belgium and Spain have resolved to accord no protection to this class of persons, but will promptly surrender them to the vengeance of their pursuers, has aroused much popular solicitude throughout Switzerland respecting the course which the government here would adopt. At Geneva, on Monday last, a call appeared addressed to all citizens who were in favor of maintaining intact the right of asylum to convene on the evening of that day and unite in an address to the Federal Council on the subject. This call was signed by the officers of the association, or society of the Grutli, a semi-political organization, and by those of the Association politique ouvrier nationale. The meeting was quite largely attended, those present and actively participating belonging, for the most part, to the laboring classes. Persons at the entrance of the hall in which the gathering took place distributed to all comers printed sheets containing a short address rather violent in its tone and strongly sympathizing with the communists. The proceedings, however, were orderly, and the address to the Federal Council which was adopted was respectful but earnest in its tenor. It denounced the action of "the monarchical governments of Belgium and Spain as trampling under foot the laws of neutrality heretofore observed under similar circumstances, and called upon the Federal Council to receive the refugees coming from France, in consequence of recent events, as the victims of political misfortune, having the rights of asylum, to be sheltered from all attack and all possibility of extradition." In the meantime, however, the Federal Council had taken its decision. Its members, after due deliberation, determined that it was not consistent with the established policy of Switzerland to accede to the demand of the French authorities in the form under which it was presented. At the same time the government was prepared faithfully to execute the existing treaty with France for the extradition of fugitives from justice. It would not refuse the rights of asylum to persons charged with or guilty of merely political offenses, but would act on individual cases as they arose, holding in custody for a reasonable time persons whose extradition might be demanded by France, until it could be determined whether they could properly be classed in the category of ordinary criminals, or in that of merely political offenders. This decision appears to be well received by all classes of the Swiss people. The public journals of the country, as far as I have seen, without distinction of party, give it a cordial approval. At the same time many of them refer in no flattering terms to the course of Belgium and Spain. The Bund, probably the most widely circulated and influential of the Swiss journals, and, more nearly than any other, the organ of the present administration, speaks of them as having given "a promise of unconditional and unlimited aid to the government of Versailles in hunting down the fugitive communists of Paris," and declares that the action of the Federal Council affords "a gratifying contrast with the decision of the ultra-montane Belgium government, that stands ready, without further proof, to deliver up the communists in a lump to their executioners." In concluding an article on the policy adopted by Switzerland it uses this language:

In the street and barricade contests of Paris both parties have participated in the horrible devastation of the city. The combatant who defends himself with all the appliances at his command is not a mere ordinary criminal, no matter on which side he is engaged. On the other hand, those who, with diabolical premeditation, collected the means for a systematic devastation, and carried it into effect, are execrable criminals, and should be punished as such, since they acted not in mere self-defense, but in a desperate delight in murder and arson. The murderers of the unfortunate hostages, the people who saturated buildings with petroleum, and committed other similar acts, are criminals. Switzerland will not pollute her right of asylum by extending it to such as these; but to expel all other fugitive partisans of the commune on account of these assassins and incendiaries would be almost as equally disgraceful. The Federal Council, according to our view, will only act in harmony with the sentiments of the great majority of the people of Switzerland if, in deciding these extradition cases, it rigorously excludes all political considerations. The people of Switzerland do not wish to see the highest tribunal of their country either in the camp of the communists and internationalists, or in that of the reactionaries of Versailles.

A report was received yesterday that two prominent members of the party of the commune, Felix Pyat and Paschal Grousset, had succeeded in reaching Geneva. The French minister, the Marquis de Chateauneuf, immediately made a demand for their extradition, and the Federal Council issued an order for their arrest. Up to the present time no official news of their arrest has been received.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatches to No. 45, inclusive.

I inclose herewith a copy of a note which I addressed to the President of the Swiss Confederation, communicating the substance of your No. 43 in regard to the protection of Swiss citizens, in certain cases, by the diplomatic and consular agents of the United States, together with the reply of the President, expressive of the gratitude of the Federal Council for the promptness with which the Government of the United States has complied with its wishes upon the subject in question.

I am, &c.,

HORACE RUBLEE

Mr. Rublee to the President of the Swiss Confederation.

The undersigned, minister resident of the United States, has the honor to inform you that he has acquainted his Government with the desire expressed by your excellency that the diplomatic and consular agents of the United States, in places in which there are no such representatives of Switzerland, might be instructed to extend protection to such citizens of Switzerland as may seek such protection. In reply I am notified by the Secretary of State of the United States that circular instructions, in compliance with the wishes of the government of Switzerland, will be addressed to the ministers and consular representatives of the United States, directing them to extend such protection.

The undersigned seizes the occasion to renew to your excellency and the members of the high Federal Council the assurances of his high consideration.

[Translation.]

The President of the Swiss Confederation to Mr. Rublee.

The Federal Council has had the honor of receiving the note which Mr. Horace Rublee addressed to it on the 27th of June last, informing him that the Government of the United States of America has given to its diplomatic and consular agents, at places where Switzerland has no representatives, proper instructions that they may extend the protection to such Swiss citizens as may solicit it.

While thanking the minister resident of the United States of America for this communication, the Federal Council begs that he will convey, on its behalf, to the Government of the Union its sentiments of warm gratitude for the interest which it has taken in complying with the wishes expressed to it on this subject, and further avails itself of this occasion to renew to Mr. Horace Rublee the assurances of its high consideration.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Berne, July 3, 1871. (Received July 26.)

SIR: The ordinary summer session of the Federal Assembly of Switzerland commences to-day. The most important question likely to occupy the attention of the assembly is the proposed revision of the federal constitution. It is quite probable, however, that definite action upon it may be again postponed, and its consideration remitted to a special session during the coming autumn, at which no other business will be taken up.

During the interim between the last and the present session, two committees, one composed of members of the national council, and the other of members of the council of states, have been engaged in maturing plans of revision. Each has prepared a long series of amendments to the present constitution. These amendments are in many instances identical, and, in their general scope, indicate considerable harmony of views between the respective committees. They have been published in a pamphlet in connection the text of the existing constitution, so as to show at a glance the precise innovations proposed, and the divergencies that exist between the two committees. A copy of this pamphlet will be forwarded to you by the same post with this dispatch.

The general effect of the amendment would be, if adopted, to enlarge materially the bounds of the federal authority, and to give the government a more centralized form and character.

The most important changes proposed are those which would place the organization of the army entirely within the dominion of federal legislation, and entail directly upon the confederation the charges for its instruction and equipment, as well as maintenance, and those which would deprive the cantons of all direct interest in the receipts from customs, tolls, postages, and the tax on exemptions from military service. There is much difference of opinion in respect to the policy of such a radical change in the existing system. Some of the most experienced and enlightened public men of the country hesitate to give them their approbation, or openly oppose them. These doubt or deny that the relief afforded the cantons through the assumption by the confederation of the expenses of the army would compensate the cantons for the loss they would sustain by abandoning their present receipts from tolls, postages, &c., while they apprehend a serious diminution of local zeal in the collection of such taxes, as well as in the maintenance of rates essential for the needs of the government, should the proceeds be directed into the federal treasury.

The other principal modifications of the present constitution proposed are :

1. Respecting citizenship. A Swiss citizen establishing himself in any canton is to enjoy all the rights of such canton, except participation in the property of the bourgeoisie or of corporations. After three months' residence, he may vote at cantonal and communal, as well as federal elections. At present he may be excluded from voting at canonical elections, and the residence required before he is permitted to vote at cantonal elections is regulated by the law of the canton, limited by a provision of the actual constitution which declares that not more than two years' residence shall be required. Cantonal laws in regard to settlements are to be submitted to the sanction of the Federal Council.

2. A Swiss citizen who acquires or accepts a foreign citizenship will forfeit his Swiss citizenship.

3. The free exercise of worship is guaranteed. At present this guarantee is limited to recognized Christian confessions.

4. Cantonal laws for the repression of abuses that may arise from the exercise of the right of association accorded to the people must be submitted to the approval of the Federal Council.

5. The abolition of the death penalty. This is only proposed by the committee of the national council.

6. The federal tribunal constituted a supreme federal tribunal, with a jurisdiction more approximated to that of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Of the new articles proposed, the principal are in substance as follows :

1. Legislation respecting the constitution and management of railways appertains to the confederation.

2. The opening of gambling-houses is prohibited. Those already licensed to be closed when the present license expires.

3. Regulations for the conduct and police of industrial establishments, as well as in regard to the labor of adults and children in factories, will be prescribed by federal legislation.

4. Liberty of conscience guaranteed. No one to be disquieted in the exercise of his political or civil rights on account of religious opinion, or to be compelled to perform religious acts, or to incur any penalty for abstaining from them, or to be made to pay taxes for the support of a worship or religious confession to which he declares he does not belong. No person to be released from the performance of civil duties on account of his religious opinions.

5. Marriage placed under the protection of the confederation. Marriages not to be hindered on account of the indigence of either of the parties thereto, or their previous conduct; marriages performed in accordance with the laws of the canton where they are solemnized to be valid throughout the confederation; the wife will acquire the rights of citizenship and of bourgeoisie of the husband; children born out of wedlock to become legitimate on the subsequent marriage of the parents.

6. Federal legislation to be extended over the subjects of commercial law, contracts, marriage, domicile, the keeping of the registers of the stat-civil, prosecutions for debts, and bankruptcies.

7. When 50,000 electors demand a modification or the repeal of an existing law, or that a new law be enacted, on a specified subject, the two houses of the legislative body, if they approve of the demand, are to prepare a bill in conformity therewith, and submit it to a vote of the people and of the cantons. If the two houses do not approve of the demand, this is to be submitted to a vote of the people and of the cantons, and if a majority of the people and of the cantons approve of the demand, it will be the duty of the legislative body to frame a bill in conformance therewith, and submit such bill to a vote of the people and of the cantons.

The principle of the last-mentioned amendment has been incorporated in the constitution of the canton of Zurich. It is called "popular initiative." The proposition to include it in the federal constitution proceeds from the committee of the national council, and is not concurred in by the committee of the council of states. The principle, however, is very favorably regarded in Switzerland, and it is not unlikely to prevail if any considerable portion of the projected plans for a revision prevail. The committee of the council of states, while rejecting the "popular initiative," propose that laws involving an expenditure of more than one million of francs shall be submitted to a vote of the people and of the cantons, when the two houses of the legislative body so decree, or when, within three months after the publication of such a law, five cantons, or 50,000 electors, shall ask for such submission.

The demand for a revision appears to proceed chiefly from the political and commercial classes of the population. The latter, especially, are urgent in calling for a unification of the laws regulating contracts, the collection of debts, &c., great inconvenience and injustice frequently resulting from the conflicting systems which at present prevail in the several cantons. At the same time, the agricultural and laboring classes seem indifferent, or to take very little interest in the subject. Again, many persons, who would otherwise look with favor upon propositions for giving increased authority to the central government, in view of the peculiar circumstances in which Switzerland is placed, the progress made under the established order of things, and the present very satisfactory condition of the country, both in its internal and external relations, deem it unwise to enter upon new experiments. The primitive cantons, the French cantons, and the Catholic element of the population are also pronounced in their opposition to the general scope of the revision projects. Conservatives of all shades shrink from giving any occasion for disturbing the harmony now prevailing between the different sections of the confederation, and fear that such might be the consequence of any considerable centralization of the government. Three different races of people, each speaking a different language, are comprised in the population of Switzerland. Of these, the German-speaking portion is largely predominant in numbers, and can at will wield the federal authority as it chooses. Thus every increase of the federal power would give increased ascendancy to the German-speaking element of the people, and would afford additional pretexts, if not just grounds, for apprehensions and jealousies on the part of the French and Italian cantons.

It is not improbable that the Federal Assembly, notwithstanding some serious differences of opinion on the subject between the two houses, will be able to harmonize upon a project of revision; but it is still a matter of considerable doubt whether, in case sufficient interest is awakened to call out a full vote of the electors, the result of their deliberations will secure a popular approval.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Berne, July 24, 1871. (Received August 9.)

SIR: The summer session of the Federal Assembly of Switzerland closed on Saturday the 22d instant. After considerable discussion, and several disagreeing votes, the two houses finally coincided in postponing the consideration of the report on the proposed revision of the federal constitution to a special session, which will be convened for the purpose on the 6th day of November next.

The summer session was mainly devoted to the consideration of measures of a purely local interest.

Recent events in Europe have caused increased attention to be given to the promotion of the efficiency of the army, and credits to the amount of seven and a half millions of francs were voted for the purpose of improving the arms now on hand, for the manufacture of additional supplies, and for the new arming of the Landwehr with repeater-guns.

By the same post with this dispatch, I forward printed copies, in duplicate, of a message of the Federal Council to the Federal Assembly concerning the new armament of the Landwehr and the creation of a reserve of guns, and a message of the Federal Council to the Federal Assembly concerning the transformation of the cannon of the light artillery into rifled breech-loading guns and the increase of field batteries. These documents contain some interesting details respecting the armament of Swiss forces, and recent improvements in artillery and fire arms.

A discussion of some importance occurred in the council of states, on the day preceding the final adjournment, upon a motion by Mr. Carl Vogt inviting the Federal Council to take the initiative in calling an international conference for the purpose of establishing definitive rules in regard to the rights and duties of neutrals. The author of the motion remarked that at present the same rules did not apply alike to different powers. There was one law for the weak and another for the strong. In illustration of this assertion, he averred that during the recent war between France and Germany, the United States and England had permitted an extensive traffic in arms and munitions of war, while Switzerland and Belgium felt constrained to prohibit such exportations. The internement of the French Army of the East had imposed heavy sacrifices; a powerful state, he said, would have disarmed the forces and sent them back into their own country. The Geneva convention for the aid of the sick and wounded, in time of war, established certain rules respecting neutrals; why not, in like manner, establish a code for the conduct of neutrals in other respects? Referring to the recent treaty between the United States and Great Britain, the speaker said it proposed to settle the Alabama question by agreeing upon certain principles of international law as binding upon neutrals, and was a step in the same direction with the measure which he proposed.

The President of the confederation, Dr. Schenk, in reply, opposed the motion chiefly as impracticable and likely to lead to no result. Conceding, however, that the several powers gave their consent, and a conference was held, there would exist such a diversity of views and interests that it was hardly possible that they could be reconciled. He also referred to the difficulty of enforcing an international code, and the probability that it would be disregarded, at their convenience, by the great powers, if once adopted. He accordingly regarded the advantages that might be anticipated from such a conference as illusory.

After considerable discussion pro and con, the motion was modified so as merely to invite the Federal Council to inquire whether it may not be possible by international action to define and establish the rights and duties of neutrals, and to prepare a report upon the subject. In this form the motion was adopted by a large majority.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch No. 50, transmitting the draught of a note to be presented by me to the government of the Swiss Confederation, requesting that the President of that confederation will be pleased to appoint an arbitrator to form, with the arbitrators to be named by the President of the United States, by Her Britannic Majesty, by His Majesty the King of Italy, and by His Majesty the Emperor of Brazil, the tribunal of arbitration to which, in pursuance of the first article of the treaty signed at Washington on the 8th of May, the United States and Her Britannic Majesty have agreed that all claims growing out of the acts committed by the several vessels which have given rise to the claims generically known as the "Alabama claims" shall be referred.

In conformity with the instructions contained in your dispatch, I arranged with Mr. Bonar, the British minister here, for the simultaneous presentation of our respective notes on the subject, which, together with copies of the treaty, were accordingly placed to-day in the hands of the President of the Swiss Confederation, who is ex-officio minister for foreign affairs. A copy of my note is herewith transmitted.

In a subsequent conversation with the President, in which he again signified his consent to name an arbitrator, as requested, I took occasion to draw his attention to the final clause of Article I of the treaty, which relates to the period within which it is desired that the nomination may be made. The President, in reply, remarked that he hoped to be able to name an arbitrator within a much shorter period. * * *

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Berne, August 3, 1871.

His Excellency Dr. KARL SCHENK,
President of the Swiss Confederation :

Differences having arisen between the Government of the United States and the government of Her Britannic Majesty, growing out of the acts committed by the several vessels which have given rise to the claims generically known as the "Alabama claims," the high contracting parties, in order to remove and adjust all complaints and claims on the part of the United States, and to provide for the speedy settlement of such claims, have agreed, by the first article of a treaty signed at Washington on the 8th day of May, 1871, of which a copy is annexed, to refer all the said claims growing out of acts committed by the aforesaid vessels, and generically known as the "Alabama claims," to a tribunal of arbitration, to be composed of five arbitrators, to be appointed in the following manner; that is to say: One shall be named by the President of the United States; one shall be named by Her Britannic Majesty; His Majesty the King of Italy shall be requested to name one; the President of the Swiss Confederation shall be requested to name one; and His Majesty the Emperor of Brazil shall be requested to name one.

The high contracting parties, therefore, reposing entire confidence in the spirit of justice and impartiality which distinguish the President of the Swiss Confederation, the common friend of the two states, have agreed, in pursuance of the said treaty, to address themselves severally to the President of that confederation, and to request him to be pleased to appoint an arbitrator, to form, with the arbitrators to be named by the other powers above named, the tribunal of arbitration to which the reference agreed upon in the first article of the treaty shall be made.

The undersigned, minister resident of the United States accredited to the Swiss Confederation, having received the orders of his Government to communicate to the President of the Swiss Confederation the agreement thus made on the part of the United States, has been further charged to express the earnest desire of the President of the United States that the President of the Swiss republic will be willing to afford his good offices on the present occasion, and will be pleased to appoint an arbitrator to act in the premises.

The undersigned has, therefore, the honor to lay this communication directly before His Excellency the President of the Swiss Confederation, as holding, at the same time, the office of federal councillor for the political department and for foreign affairs, and to request that his excellency may be pleased to make known to the undersigned his determination with regard to the request therein set forth.

The undersigned seizes the occasion to renew to your excellency and to the members of the high Federal Council the assurance of his highest consideration.

SIR: Up to the 9th instant, the government of France had reimbursed to the government of Switzerland five millions of francs on account of the expenditures of the latter consequent upon the internement of the French Army of the East. The aggregate expenditure of Switzerland in the transaction is placed at eleven millions of francs. The announcement is made that an arrangement has been effected between the two governments, in pursuance of which France is to pay to Switzerland, after the 15th of the present month, the sum of one million of francs every fifteen days until the claim of the latter is satisfied. At the same time, France reclaims the material of war which was surrendered with the Army of the East, and the Federal Council has given orders for its immediate delivery.

An extradition case is pending at Geneva, which excites considerable interest in diplomatic circles here. On the 17th ultimo, one M. Razbua, who is alleged to have held a commission under the communal government of Paris, and to have had charge of the concern known as the Ecole Militaire during the reign of the commune, was arrested at Geneva, upon the demand of the French government. Among the charges brought against him, and upon which his extradition is asked, the one most relied on, I believe, is that which accuses him of having pillaged the Ecole Militaire. He remains in confinement at Geneva, awaiting the production of satisfactory evidence, on the part of the French government, that he is guilty of offenses which, under the existing extradition treaty between Switzerland and France, will justify his delivery to the French authorities. Meanwhile, the "Association politique ourière nationale," of Geneva, has addressed a long petition in his behalf to the Federal Council, demanding a vigilant maintenance of the right of asylum for persons guilty only of political offenses, and strenuously urging the title of the communist authorities of Paris to be recognized and treated as belligerents in their struggle with the Versailles government.

BERNE, August 9, 1871.

The President of the Swiss Confederation to Mr. Rublee.

The undersigned has had the honor to receive the note dated the 3d instant, addressed to him by the minister resident of the United States of America, by which Mr. Rublee informs him that the United States Government and the government of Great Britain have agreed, by the treaty of Washington of the 8th May, 1871, that the claim of the United States against England arising from the war of North America, and known under the name of the "Alabama question," be regulated by a "tribunal of international arbitrators," upon the basis of the dispositions of said treaty.

In conformity with article 1st of the treaty, the tribunal shall consist of five members, of which two shall be named by His Excellency the President of the United States and Her Majesty the Queen of England, and three others by His Majesty the King of Italy, the President of the Swiss Confederation, and His Majesty the Emperor of Brazil.

In transmitting the acts relative to this case to the undersigned, Mr. Minister Resident of the United States of America has expressed the desire of his high government that he may undertake to choose one of the arbitrators.

Thanking Mr. Rublee for this communication, the undersigned has the honor to inform him that he has immediately acquainted the Federal Council of the honorable mission intrusted to Switzerland by two high governments with which it is, by ties of friendship, so intimately connected, and that the council has, with pleasure, expressed its readiness to contribute to a work of reconciliation that answers so well to the dignity of two contracting nations, and to the principles of modern civilization.

In accordance with these considerations, the undersigned has been authorized to accept the honorable mission which was offered to him, and he will not fail to communicate in proper time to the Mr. Minister Resident of the United States the name of the arbitrator which he will have nominated.

In having the honor to bring these facts to the notice of Mr. Rublee, he hastens to renew to him the assurance of his high consideration.

SIR: During an interview with the President of Switzerland to-day, he informed me that, in compliance with the joint request of the governments of the United States and of Great Britain, he had named a member of the tribunal of arbitration provided for by the treaty of Washington, of May 8, 1871, and that he had designated Mr. Jacob Stämpfli as the member from Switzerland of such tribunal. This fact he communicated to me unofficially, adding that he reserved its official announcement until such time as the appointment of a member of the tribunal of arbitration by Italy should be made public.

Mr. Stämpfli is one of the most prominent public men in Switzerland, and one of its most able statesmen, having been in public life for more than twenty years past. Since the organization of the government, under the constitution of 1848, he has been continuously a leading member of the national council, and for a considerable part of the time a member of the Federal Council. He has been three times chosen President of the confederation. He is a lawyer by profession, but, during some years, since resigning his position as a member of the Federal Council, has been chiefly occupied with the affairs of the Federal Bank, of which he is president. In politics he belongs to the liberal, or perhaps I might more properly say, the radical, party of Switzerland.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Constantinople, December 6, 1870. (Received December 30.)

SIR: In two days after the date of my last dispatch we received the news of the proposal of a conference on the eastern question, and as I am writing we are assured of its acceptance. The peaceable solution of the difficulty is regarded here as certain; indeed war has never been regarded here as anything but improbable; but, as much of this opinion rested upon the mistaken belief that in no event would England engage in war, it has not impressed me as profoundly as it otherwise might have done. What appeared to me far more important was what I learned of the attitude of the Sultan in the matter. I am tolerably sure that he has been resolved upon peace at almost any price, and I should not be surprised if communications to that effect had passed between him and the Czar. Indeed, the information I received leads me to suppose that the grand vizier, who is believed to follow implicitly the advice of England, has had great difficulty in persuading His Majesty to abstain from direct interference in the interests of peace.

So many facts, however, from independent sources, have come to my knowledge, all tending in one direction, as to compel me to the belief that the Porte was very slow of movement in the first stages of the difficulty, and might even have been found impossible of control on the part of its allies, if an escape from war had not been discovered. Now that a conference has been accepted, the opinion in high quarters here is universal that it will result in the concession of the Russian demand, with possibly some slight counterbalancing concession to Turkey, and a new guarantee of all the other conditions of the treaty of Paris of 1856.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 13, 1870.

SIR: An application has been made to this Department, in a letter dated the 1st ultimo, and signed Mathieu Orlich, for a passport.

The applicant states, as you will observe, that he obtained a passport from this Department in 1853 or 1854; but upon examination of the Department records, this statement appears to be inaccurate. If Mr. Orlich be entitled to a passport, an application to you would have been sufficient to secure one.

In judging Mr. Orlich's claim to protection as an American citizen, you have the principle laid down in the circular from this Department issued October 14, 1869, to guide you. Without determining that the continued residence in Turkey of an Hungarian or Austrian who may have been naturalized as an American citizen is necessarily to be regarded in the same light as the circular indicates with respect to a naturalized citizen returning to the country of his nativity, it may well be that the same principle applies. The fact of the person having been born in a contiguous jurisdiction assimilates his case very closely to the case contemplated by the circular, which was intended only to indicate the general principle and theory by which the agents of the Government in foreign countries are to be governed in deciding the questions which come before them.

Among the tests which may be applied to determine the intent of a naturalized person who resides continuously abroad, the fact of payment by such person of the income and excise taxes which have been imposed by law (since 1861) upon American citizens will be an important aid. Inquiry should be made when, and in what assessment district, the returns required by the internal revenue laws have been made; where and to whom the taxes have been paid. The omission to have made the returns, or to have paid any tax, would necessarily cast grave suspicion upon the claim of the party applying for the protection of a government from whose support he has withheld the contributions required of all its citizens, whether resident at home or abroad; and if such omission has been long continued, it will, as a general rule, justify the refusal of a recognition of the claim to protection.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Constantinople, December 31, 1870. (Received Jan. 30, 1871.)

SIR: The unsettled state of the public mind here to which I alluded in my dispatch of the 24th instant, has rather tended, I am sorry to say, to increase than to disappear during the past week. Indeed, current opinion at this capital has undergone several marked changes since the appearance of the Russian circular.

After the panic on the Bourse, which followed the first intelligence of the circular, there was little alarm manifested in consequence of it. The legations were almost unanimous in expecting a peaceful solution of the difficulty, nor did the Porte appear to apprehend serious danger of war. Indeed, as I informed you at the time, it was gravely doubted here whether England would in any possible event defend the treaty by arms, and even if she decided to do so, whether Turkey would follow her guidance. The first doubt disappeared when Lord Granville's answer to the circular was received; and the long and uniform foreign policy of the Grand Vizier, who remained in office, notwithstanding repeated rumors of his resignation, seemed to make clear the probable course of the government of the Sultan.

These considerations soon sufficed to produce great uneasiness and distrust, and for some days transactions in the public debt of the empire almost ceased. In a few days, however, the news of Count Bismarck's proposal of a conference, and its probable acceptance, reached us; and it at once seemed to renew the general confidence in an amicable solution of the questions at issue, and to give it even more tone and vigor than it had originally displayed. For the East, peace was believed to be assured. The capitulation of Paris was expected to be close at hand, and with it the end of the terrible Franco-Prussian struggle. It was, therefore, very generally supposed that with the new year, or very soon thereafter, peace would be restored to Europe in the west as well as in the east, and that a large portion of the blessings of that result would fall to the share of the Ottoman empire in an increased sense of its stability, at home and abroad.

To such an extent, indeed, did I share this general conviction, that under its influence I wrote you for leave to return home; and though of course I was careful to assure you that I would not leave my post so long as there was any apprehension of war or other serious difficulty, I anticipated, with confidence, being able to start in the early spring, without detriment to the public service, so peaceful promised to be the aspect of affairs here by that time. As, however, considerable uneasiness and uncertainty are again discernible in the public mind here, and it may require longer time than I expected to be perfectly sure of peace, if the leave I requested has not been forwarded when this dispatch reaches you, please to withhold it until such time as I shall feel free to renew my application for it.

Various causes are assigned for the renewed anxiety to which I have alluded, and which is quite apparent at present. The recent action of Prince Charles of Roumania, the revolt in Asia, the suspected disloyalty of the Viceroy, and the bad condition of the finances, give rise in part to the fears of internal troubles, while the continuance of resistance by the French republic, Count Bismarck's recent letter to the Prussian ambassador at Florence, his renunciation of the treaty of Luxemburg, and the general willingness attributed to him to find or make cause of quarrel with some or all of the allies of the Sultan, give rise in fact to the fears of foreign troubles. These fears may be altogether groundless, and to a great extent they certainly appear to be so, but they serve to create a feverish and unsettled feeling, both here and in other parts of the empire, which in itself may become a source of danger. I hope to be able to send you a dispatch of some interest by the next mail on the subject of the Straits of the Dardanelles and the Bosphorus.

The rumor reaches us to-day that the approaching conference will consider the question of their use by foreign powers. Their importance is increasing day by day, and the time cannot be very far distant when an authoritative determination of their status will be required alike in the interest of commerce and of peace.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 5, 1871.

SIR: Your dispatch No. 14, of the 8th ultimo, has been received. The view is correct which it takes of the absurd newspaper report of a letter from President Grant to the Emperor of Russia, congratulating the latter upon his denunciation of the clause of the treaty of Paris which restricts liberty of navigation in the Black Sea. The occasions are rare which are conceived to warrant or require a deviation on the part of the President from the rule which limits his communications to foreign sovereigns to mere letters of ceremony. The occasion adverted to was not deemed sufficient to call for any such communication. It is true that the United States, not having been a party to the treaty of Paris, may have more or less reason to complain of any curtailment of their rights under the law of nations which it may have effected. No formal complaint on the subject, however, has as yet been addressed to either of the parties to that instrument, though the restriction which it imposes on the right of our men-of-war to the passage of the Dardanelles and the Bosphorus is under serious consideration.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Constantinople, January 19, 1871. (Received Feb. 18.)

SIR: The different consulates within my jurisdiction, as you are aware, desire my opinion and assistance from time to time in matters concerning the officers attached to the consulates or the American citizens under their protection. As a general rule the difficulties are easy of solution, but it occurred to me that you might desire to know the general principles by which I am guided in the instructions I give, as well as my answer to a recent application for instructions by the consul general at Beirut.

In the litigations and other troubles of the numerous dragomans and cavasses attached to our consular offices, I have always insisted that it was very undesirable for the legation to bring them to the attention of the Porte, or to endeavor to secure their removal from the ordinary methods of judicial procedure, unless they arise from or were in some manner related to the official conduct of the dragoman or cavass in question. Many of these officers are such in name only; they receive no salary; they seldom discharge any duties, because there is rarely occasion for their services; and they are almost universally engaged in other business.

The value of their protection from the consular officer depends upon their withdrawal from responsibility to the tribunals of their own country. As these tribunals are often very inefficient and often believed to be corrupt, and as the relations of the consular officer are frequently very intimate with his six or eight attachés, it is quite natural that the importance of their protection in all their litigations should appear to the consular officer in quite an exaggerated form, while it is equally natural that he should not see the ill effect such continual intermeddling by the legation in such small matters between the Porte and its own subjects is sure to exert upon the character of the legation itself.

Moreover such intermeddling encourages a litigious disposition on the part of the persons protected. In the last ninety days three matters of litigation have been brought to the notice of the Porte affecting a single dragoman of the very subordinate vice-consulate at Aleppo, not one of them, so far as I can remember, having the slightest connection with his office. Then, too, I have not been able to agree that the disposition of other governments to withdraw as many Turkish subjects as possible from the jurisdiction of their own tribunals furnished any rule for our guidance; nor have I assented to the idea, which seems to be prevalent, especially in Asiatic Turkey, that a large following of unpaid attachés is at all necessary to inspire the local authorities with proper respect for the Government of the United States.

The question presented to me by the consul general at Beirut, and to which I have alluded, was of a wholly different character. He desired to know whether the right of interference in his official capacity existed in behalf of native teachers in American mission schools. My answer, after pointing out that the praiseworthy and even Christian character of the work to be advanced could make no difference in its treatment, informed the consul general that I supposed the proper rule for his guidance was, that, if the native teachers were troubled because of their services to American citizens, he ought to interfere; if not, he ought not to interfere.

Inasmuch as our citizens had an undoubted right to preach and teach, and as the presence and assistance of natives were indispensable to the enjoyment of these rights, any attempt to persecute or harass in any way natives for rendering lawful services to American citizens, was an infraction of the rights of such American citizens, and was to be resisted, as such, and in the names of such American citizens. In other words, I informed him that in my judgment the true criterion was, not whether an Ottoman subject was being harshly or unjustly treated, but whether, directly or indirectly, the rights of an officer or a citizen of the United States were likely to be infringed.

The practical application of the rules I have mentioned will always be more or less difficult under Ottoman administration, and I have endeavored in all cases to recommend them with proper courtesy and with the distrust due to my limited experience; but I am satisfied, if properly observed, they will afford an almost perfect guarantee of our ability to settle all the questions arising here satisfactorily, without recourse to the Department.

There are several considerable settlements of Americans in this empire, to which I may make a brief visit with a view of rendering their relations to the legation more intimate; and in that case I will take care to consider the subject of this dispatch with the principal consuls whom I would thus meet.

Yours, &c.,

WAYNE MACVEAGH.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Constantinople, January 24, 1871. (Received February 22.)

SIR: In view of the conference now in session at London, and the prominence which has been recently given to the restrictions affecting the navigation of the Straits of the Bosphorus and the Dardanelles, it has occurred to me that you might desire to possess, in the convenient form of a dispatch, a statement as well of the restrictions themselves, as of the grounds on which they are rested. In any view of this question a primary consideration is the grave importance attached immemorially to the geographical peculiarities of the situation of Constantinople.

On the west the narrow Straits of the Dardanelles connect the sea of Marmora with the Greek Archipelago; on the east the narrow Straits of the Bosphorus connect the Sea of Marmora with the Black Sea. From the beginning of the one strait to the end of the other the shores on both sides belong exclusively to the Ottoman Empire; and its capital and chief city is at the meeting of the waters of the Straits of the Bosphorus and of the Sea of Marmora. This site is asserted to be practically incapable of defense against an attack by a naval force, except at the two entrances or straits which have been named, and it is also asserted that the absolute necessity of fortifying and defending these entrances, as the only means of securing the safety of Constantinople from attacks by sea, was recognized centuries before the conquest of the country by Ottoman Sultans; and that the same necessity has been constantly asserted and maintained ever since. In this view all the waters connecting the Greek Archipelago with the Black Sea are mare clausum, and are only navigable by the consent of and under the restrictions imposed by the government of the Ottoman Empire.

The question of this consent, and of these restrictions, naturally divides itself, first in reference to vessels of commerce, and secondly in reference to vessels of war. As regards both these classes the Ottoman government alleges that its policy has been uniform, and as liberal as a proper regard for its own safety would allow; and that its conduct in the exercise of its undoubted rights of control over these connecting waters has often received, as it has always deserved, the cordial recognition and approval of all friendly powers.

The right of merchant-vessels to navigate these connecting waters rests upon treaties; and certainly the concessions to the commerce of other nations appear to be very liberal and comprehensive, when the treaties embodying these privileges are compared with the contemporary policies of civilized and Christian nations on the subject of foreign trade.

The earliest treaty between this empire and any western nation of which I have knowledge was concluded with France in 1535. It extended the fullest liberty of navigation to the subjects of France in all the waters of the empire, and provided that vessels coming to Constantinople, and desiring to return, should only be stopped at the Straits of the Dardanelles. The treaty also afforded to the Pope, the King of England, and the King of Scotland the option of becoming parties to it, and thereby securing the same privileges for their subjects.

In the next century—1675—the capitulations granted to Great Britain recognized the same absolute liberty of navigation as was secured by the treaty with France, and considerably enlarged the privileges of foreign merchants in the empire. They also expressly commanded that the old "canon of search" should be executed at the castles and in ports only, and nowhere else, the term "castles" meaning, I suppose, the fortresses at the Dardanelles. In the following century—1747—the treaty with Tuscany allowed "its merchants to enter with their vessels any of the ports subject to the Imperial Turk; to sail backwards and forwards at their pleasure; expose their goods for sale; and quit the said ports in safety and security." It also provides that "said merchants, having obtained the usual license and certificate, shall not be detained on their voyage upon arriving at the Straits of the Hellespont, more generally known as the Dardanelles."

The three treaties to which I have alluded are believed to be fair specimens of the numerous and lengthy commercial conventions concluded by the Ottoman Empire from the inception of treaty relations with the Christian powers to the period when the persistent efforts of Russia succeeded in annexing to her dominions a large portion of the northern coast of the empire.

Until that conquest was effected the passage of foreign merchant-vessels seems not to have been contemplated beyond Constantinople. At least I have not observed any allusion to such a contingency in any treaty of a previous date. It would seem to have been assumed that foreign merchant-vessels would come only as far as the capital and return; and in making this voyage, according to the treaty with Tuscany in 1747, they were required only to submit to examination in port, and to stop to deliver the proper license, or firman, and certificate at the Dardanelles.

The first mention of the passage of the Straits of the Bosphorus and the consequent navigation of the Black Sea occurs in the historic treaty of Kainardji—1774—whereby Russia secured the southern sea-coast she had so long coveted. That treaty, called by the late Emperor Nicholas "the glorious treaty," granted, in ample terms, the free passage of the Bosphorus to the merchant-vessels of Russia. In a convention—1779—explanatory of the treaty of Kainardji, the tonnage of the Russian vessels which are to enjoy the rights theretofore granted is regulated by the tonnage of the vessels of other nations "which come by the Sea of Marmora to Constantinople."

In the treaty of commerce—1783—between Russia and the Porte, the liberty of navigation theretofore granted is expressed in even broader terms, and the Porte obliges itself to deliver firmans or permits to all Russian merchant-vessels going either through the Bosphorus or through the Dardanelles, to secure their unobstructed passage through those straits respectively. The navigation of the Bosphorus and the Black Sea thus accorded to the merchant-vessels of Russia was extended to those of Austria in 1784, to those of England in 1799, to those of France in 1802, and to those of Prussia in 1806; while, in 1826, in a convention with Russia explanatory of the treaty of Bucharest, the Porte agreed to accept the good offices of Russia to secure permission to enter the Black Sea for ships of friendly powers which had not yet obtained this privilege for their commerce.

This convention was, however, soon followed by war between the two empires, and the war was closed by the historic treaty of Adrianople—1829—whereby the broadest possible terms were employed to secure an absolutely free and unobstructed navigation of all the waters connecting the Greek Archipelago with the Black Sea for the merchant-vessels of all the world. The language employed could hardly be rendered more comprehensive by human ingenuity.

It declares "that full and entire freedom of trade" by sea and land shall not be molested nor fettered in any way, or under any pretext, nor in consequence of any regulation or measure, whether of public government or internal legislation. The Sublime Porte engages, moreover, to take especial care that the trade and navigation of the Black Sea particularly shall be impeded in no manner whatever. For this purpose it admits and declares the passage of the "Straits of Constantinople, the Bosphorus, and that of the Dardanelles," to be "entirely free and open" to vessels under the merchant flag of any power at peace with the Porte; and it engages that such vessels shall be exposed to no hinderance or annoyance of any kind, declaring that "to this full freedom of trade and navigation not the least obstacle shall ever be opposed." In the following year—1830—our own treaty was concluded with the Porte, securing to us all the privileges of the most favored nations, and providing that "the merchant vessels of the United States shall have liberty to pass the canal of the imperial residence, the Bosphorus, and go and come in the Black Sea." Our treaty of commerce—1862—contains upon this subject only the clause usually inserted in commercial treaties concluded in recent years with the Porte. "The firmans required for merchant vessels of the United States on passing through the Dardanelles and the Bosphorus shall always be delivered in such manner as to occasion to such vessels the least possible delay." It will thus be seen that the fullest liberty exists for the navigation of all these connecting waters by the merchant vessels of all nations.

Of course this liberty of navigation, however ample, is subject to proper regulations of police and of health, but the language of the treaty of Adrianople and of the common clause of recent treaties respecting firmans, which I quoted from our own treaty of 1862, affords conclusive evidence that regulations for these purposes should be framed so as to cause the slightest possible annoyance to commerce. Unfortunately such is not the case.

The regulations in force are antiquated, and unnecessarily vexatious. A merchant vessel passing from the Archipelago to the Black Sea is obliged to stop at the Dardanelles to exhibit her bill of health; to stop at Constantinople to procure a firman for the eastern passage; and to stop at the Bosphorus to deliver it. And the same vessel, upon returning, is obliged to stop at the Bosphorus to exhibit her bill of health; to stop at Constantinople to obtain another firman for the westward passage; and to stop at the Dardanelles to deliver it. As neither strait can be entered, nor either firman obtained, at night, these six stoppages would constitute a very serious detention even if they did not, in many cases, cause the loss of favorable winds, and thus entail far more serious delay. Upon some occasions, also, by reason of them, danger is added to delay. It is confidently asserted that, for all these injurious restrictions, small steamboats, stationed by day and by night at each strait and conveying an officer of police and an officer of quarantine to each vessel desiring to pass, would afford a complete substitute; that they would secure every object now attained by the Porte and with greater certainty; that they would, at the same time, obviate every reasonable ground of complaint; and that the foreign commerce of these straits would cheerfully and even gladly bear the slight additional burden necessary to defray the expenses of the proposed service. A commission to consider the whole subject was instituted by the foreign legations, and an elaborate report was presented by that commission April 16, 1870. It is believed that if an earnest and united support was given to the recommendation of that commission, or to any other mode of remedying existing evils, little difficulty would be experienced in securing its adoption. Unfortunately, however, unanimity is hardly attainable in the diplomatic body accredited here. It is not charitable to imagine that jealousy of the influence of other nations could influence some members of it, while a general policy of disintegration rather than of amelioration might influence others; but, in fact, agreement is not easily reached. Until it is reached, it does not seem to me to be just to hold this government responsible for inaction. No serious objection is made to the rights which the Porte claims or to the duties which it extorts. The mode of asserting and exacting them only is objectionable. Until, therefore, the representatives of the more enlightened nations interested can agree in suggesting a better mode, it is not surprising that this government, which is essentially one of motive, adheres to its ancient usages. Indeed, the conduct of the Porte, in many respects affecting foreign trade, and the uniform language of its commercial treaties, would appear to justify the assertion of Count Cavour during the conferences at Paris in 1856, that "no power possesses a commercial legislation of a more liberal character than that of Turkey."

While, however, as we have thus seen, these connecting waters are free and open to the merchant ships of the world, subject only to regulations of police and health, with reference to the second branch of the inquiry—vessels of war—the exact contrary is the case.

In time of peace no war vessel of any nation is allowed to enter these connecting waters. On the east the fortresses of the Bosphorus, and on the west the fortresses of the Dardanelles, prohibit and deny such entrance to the war flag of any nation, however friendly to the Sublime Porte.

This prohibition is of immemorial observance, and has taken its place in public law under the name of "the ancient rule of the Ottoman Empire;" and it is distinctly recognized by Mr. Wheaton in his authoritative treatise upon "International Law."

The earliest incorporation which I have observed of "the ancient rule" in the text of a treaty occurs in the treaty of peace with Great Britain, 1809, and its presence there is probably owing to the fact that in 1807 an English fleet had forced the passage of the Dardanelles, and for the first time in the history of the empire a hostile naval flag had been visible from the walls of Stamboul.

The eleventh article of the treaty recites that it has been from all time denied to vessels of war to enter either the Bosphorus or the Dardanelles; and Great Britain promises for the future to respect this "ancient rule of the empire." The next mention of the subject is in the secret article of the famous treaty of Albarice with Russia, called the treaty of Unkiar-Skelessi, 1833, whereby the Porte agreed "to close the strait of the Dardanelles so as not to allow any foreign vessels of war to enter therein under any pretext whatever." This treaty was the price paid for the assistance of Russia in repelling the aggressions of Mehemet Ali, and the treaty was concluded while a Russian squadron was anchored in the Bosphorus and a Russian army was encamped upon its shores.

The next allusion to the subject is in the convention of London for the pacification of the Levant—1840—wherein the four allies of the Sultan declare that their temporary protection of Constantinople and the straits in question shall in no manner derogate from the "ancient rule of the empire," which the Sultan on his part declares it to be his firm determination to maintain intact in the future as in the past. The recently published life of Lord Palmerston, edited by Sir Henry Bulwer, who was formerly British ambassador here, gives a very interesting account of the negotiation of this convention. Then followed, as is well known, the convention of the Dardanelles, concluded at London 13th July, 1841, whereby "the ancient rule of the Ottoman empire, prohibiting at all times ships of war of foreign powers from entering the straits of the Dardanelles and of the Bosphorus," received in a treaty, devoted to that subject only, the formal and solemn adhesion of Great Britain, Austria, France, Prussia, and Russia.

By the third article of the treaty the Porte reserved the right to communicate the treaty to all the powers with which it sustained friendly relations. Accordingly a circular was delivered by the Porte, March 5, 1842, to the foreign representatives of those powers at Constantinople, for transmission to their respective governments, reciting the convention and requesting the observance by each nation of "the ancient rule of the empire," thereby confirmed. This circular was transmitted to Washington by Commodore Porter, then occupying this mission, April 16, 1842. It only remains to add that the convention of the Dardanelles was re-enacted in terms, and annexed to the treaty of Paris of 1856, and that an exception has always existed to the "ancient rule" in question in favor of armed vessels of moderate size visiting the Porte, by special permission, on missions of friendship, or attached to the service of the foreign legations at Constantinople. It will be seen, therefore, that the closing of these straits to ships of war has never been rested upon the agreement of the powers recognizing it, but always upon the undoubted rights of the Ottoman empire; and while six great powers at Paris in 1856 recognized this usage, it is not known that any power at any time has ever questioned either its propriety or its validity.

I need hardly say that I have neither aimed nor expected in this dispatch to furnish you any information you do not already possess, but simply to provide you with a convenient statement of the actual condition of these two straits, "whose waters and ports, thrown open to the mercantile marine of every nation, are formally and in perpetuity interdicted to the flag of war."

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Constantinople, February 16, 1871. (Received March 20.)

SIR: As it is generally supposed here at present that peace will be concluded at an early day between France and Germany, and, as a consequence, that France will give a formal adhesion to the results already attained at the London conference, the principal subject of anxiety still remaining for the government of the Sultan is the very unfortunate condition of affairs in Roumania.

As all students of European politics have been watching with great interest the progress of the curious experiment of which that country has been the theater for some years past, I have been hoping from time to time to secure the proper information of the present condition of parties there to enable me to send you an interesting dispatch upon the general subject.

For the present, however, I must content myself with stating to you that the state of affairs is so critical that the Porte may be obliged at any moment to have recourse to an armed occupation. It is indeed with a view of being prepared for this emergency that a camp of instruction has been established at Shumla, and that a force of probably thirty thousand men is being concentrated there with considerable rapidity.

No movement will be made by the central government until a necessity for the maintenance of internal order clearly exists; but when that moment arrives and the requisite sanction of the protecting powers is received, the movement, I have reason to believe, will be executed with such promptness and vigor as to assert the suzerainty of the Porte and prevent any serious internal disorder.

It is indeed a sad medley, a kind of "devil's dance," which a nest of politicians at Bucharest are having with the destinies of a most promising country, and it can hardly fail to result in either a coup d'état by Prince Charles or in his abdication. In either case it will be the duty of the Sultan to assume the responsibility of the maintenance of order, until, in conjunction with his allies, his government can decide upon what modifications are desirable in the existing constitution.

Prince Charles, in a letter recently published at Berlin, and which I doubt not has been brought to your notice, alleges that the cause of the difficulties now existing is the excess of power granted to the political leaders by the present constitution, while the political leaders, divergent on almost all other points, agree in declaring it to be wholly unsafe to allow any increase of power to the present prince, upon whom they seem to have succeeded in placing a great part of the odium attaching to a recent railway concession, generally known as the Strausberg scandal.

While, therefore, it is of course possible that matters may remain in statu quo until the European cabinets succeed in reaching an agreement upon the subject, you must not be surprised to hear either of a revolution, a coup d'état, or an abdication at any time.

It is true also that some persons imagine that in such event Russia and Prussia would be in accord in objecting to any occupation by the Porte, and would insist upon a solution of the question in favor of the autonomy of the Roumanians; but I am wholly unable to bring myself to believe that Prussia would favor such a policy, or that Russia would venture to assert it without the active support of Germany. I look only for an armed occupation by the Porte until an agreement of the great powers.

Your obedient servant,

WAYNE MACVEAGH.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Constantinople, March 27, 1871. (Received April 27.)

SIR: Your dispatch No. 15, of the 5th of January, 1871, reached me some time ago, but I have delayed answering it until the result of the conference at London was clearly ascertained, and the important subject alluded to by you could thus be considered in its true light. My dispatches Nos. 23 and 24, on the same subject, had been forwarded to you some time before I was in receipt of yours, the dispatches having passed each other en route, and I beg you to regard what I now have the honor to submit to you as simply in continuation of those dispatches. In the former I endeavored to sketch for you the Ottoman history of the Dardanelles and the Bosphorus, and in the latter to suggest the probable action of the conference at London on the subject. That action, as announced by telegraph to us, is in exact accordance with the tenor of my dispatch of January 27, 1871. The ancient rule of the exclusion of ships of war is maintained except when the Porte deems it necessary to open them to allied and friendly fleets to secure the objects of the treaty of Paris of 1856; in other words, to resist the attack of an enemy. It may, therefore, become important at any moment for the Department to consider the question suggested in your dispatch of January 5, 1871, the denial of the passage of these straits to our ships of war; and, indeed, the dispatch itself suggests the necessity of its serious consideration at an early day. Under these circumstances I need offer no apology for calling your attention to the conduct of our Government in the matter upon previous occasions. In one of my former dispatches I fully explained the error of supposing that the closing of these straits to foreign ships of war depended upon, or was the result of, any treaty or agreement between the Porte and any other powers, great or small. It rests solely upon the immemorial usage of this empire; a usage explicitly recognized by the authoritative treatise of our own Wheaton, sanctioned by the recognition and respect of all nations at peace with the Porte since the possession of Constantinople by the Ottoman Sultans, and whose validity and prosperity are not known to have been ever seriously questioned. Like many other rights of sovereignty of many other nations, the manner of the exercise of this right of sovereignty of the Porte has, at different times, been the subject of treaty stipulations with other powers. As I stated at length in my former dispatch, at one time, by treaty with Russia, the Porte agreed to suspend the exercise of its right as to the vessels of Russia, but to exercise it as against the vessels of all other powers. At other times it agreed with the five great powers of Europe to exercise its right as against the vessels of all nations. By the recent treaty of London, it agrees to exercise its right at all times and against the vessels of all nations, except when it believes the opening of the straits is essential to its own defense. On all these occasions the Porte has received a most valuable equivalent for its agreement as to the mode of exercise of its sovereign rights over these straits, a solemn guarantee for the integrity of the Ottoman Empire, and on all these occasions it has retained the exception, which is as immemorial as the usage, of permitting the passage of vessels of moderate size attached to the service of the foreign legations resident at Constantinople. If, therefore, the Porte has the right of closing these straits to vessels of war, the mode of the exercise of that right would seem to be wholly unobjectionable at the present time, for, unlike the Russian treaty of 1833, the present operates upon all nations with perfect equality. The recognition of this right of the Porte by the Government of the United States has been frequent and uniform.

During forty years of friendly intercourse hardly a year has elapsed without some application for a firman for the passage of a war-vessel in virtue of the exception to which I have alluded; and from the John Adams, which brought Commodore Porter here in 1831, to the Franklin, which carried Admiral Farragut away in 1868, there was no intimation of any kind on the part of our Government of any dissatisfaction with the rule of exclusion, or of the slightest doubt of its entire validity. In addition to these constant recognitions of the rule from year to year, this legation has on different occasions brought the matter to the knowledge of the Department of State, without ever evoking a suggestion as to the impropriety of the usage. Moreover, the Porte itself has on several occasions notified the legations resident here of its intentions with respect to the closing of the straits, and these intentions have been brought to the attention of our Government, and have been received with entire acquiescence. Following this unbroken series of precedents from the institution of the legation, my predecessor, Hon. E. Joy Morris, on the occasion of the permission accorded the Franklin to pass the Dardanelles, in 1868, she exceeding in size the class of vessels contemplated by the exception, recognized the rule of exclusion in the clearest terms, and acknowledged the exceptional character of the favor as well as its courtesy, and in the circular addressed by the Porte upon that occasion to the representatives of the signatory powers of the treaty of Paris of 1856, the ample recognition of the rule by Mr. Morris is set forth. Copies of the correspondence and of the circular were furnished by Mr. Morris to the Department in his dispatch No. 272, of 29th October, 1868. The Department of State, in a dispatch of September 15, 1868, had written to Mr. Morris: "The courtesy shown to the United States by the Sublime Porte in dispensing with the prohibition which would have prevented the Franklin from going up to Constantinople, is creditable to the Sultan's government, and for many reasons it is pleasing to the Government of the United States." Such has been the uniform tenor of the intercourse of the two governments upon the subject, as well before as after any treaty had been made by the Porte in the matter. The passage of our vessels of war has uniformly been requested in writing, and either as within the exception to the rule, or as an act of special courtesy in suspension of it. In the latter case it has uniformly been followed by the thanks of our Government for the favor. It does not seem proper to occupy your time with numerous extracts from the archives of the legation, but I have given you the results of a very careful and exhaustive study of them. We began our intercourse with Turkey by a treaty which secured for our vessels of commerce the right of passing these straits; and thus excluded the idea that we possessed the same right for our ships of war. In the long interval we have uniformly recognized, in all the modes known to diplomatic intercourse, the continued existence of the distinction.

In all this we have acted in company with every other civilized State. Any departure by us from a policy which we have so uniformly and so long pursued, and which all other nations continue to pursue, would certainly require very grave reasons for its justification. As I cannot conceive that upon careful consideration any such reasons will be found to exist, I fear I am troubling you unnecessarily with this dispatch, but it seemed to me to be proper to thus bring the whole subject to your notice. Of course I am not disturbed by the notions I found prevailing in this atmosphere upon the subject of our eastern policy, that we had no views or policy in these matters of our own, properly speaking; but that in the name of the removal of restrictions, or of the freedom of the seas, or of oppressed nationalities, or of the Hellenic idea, we were to espouse the policy of this or that European power, and to serve its purposes. These convictions do, however, quite generally prevail in this vicinity, as you will observe by some extracts I have heretofore sent you, and have, in the ignorance which prevails of our national character, done us some harm. I do not discover that these aspersions have made any impression upon this government, though there have been of recent years some unfortunate combinations of circumstances which might have given rise to suspicions in suspicious minds. Whenever a proper opportunity has offered I have uniformly protested that we were the partisans of no power, whether friendly or hostile to Turkey; that we were loyal and sincere in our professions of friendship and amity for this government; that we remembered with gratitude the unwavering fidelity of the Porte during our great struggle; and that it was a base libel upon our national character to insinuate that we were susceptible of undue control or capable of other than a manly, straightforward, and utterly independent line of conduct. At the same time I have frankly stated that in the interest of our general policy we would rejoice at the opening of these waters to the unrestricted navigation of the globe, and that we would continue to cherish the hope that it would before long appear to the government of the Sultan to be compatible in every way with its interest and its safety to abandon in this respect the ancient usages of the empire. In the mean time, however, I have added, it would be grossly unjust to the United States to imagine for a moment that it would suffer itself to be used as the agent or ally of any other power to cause undue embarrassment to the Porte upon this or any other subject.

SIR: Your dispatch No. 29, of the 17th ultimo, relative to the controversies between Spain and Egypt and Italy and Tunis, has been received.

The Department has been fully informed of the origin and progress of the latter question by Mr. Heap, the experienced and intelligent consul of the United States at Tunis. The opinion which you express, that it is advisable for the United States to limit to as few as may be absolutely necessary the persons exempt from the local jurisdiction by being attached to the legation and consulates in Turkey and its dependencies, is entirely approved by the Department, and has for some time past been urged upon the officers of the United States in that quarter. It is understood that formerly there were great abuses in this respect. It was long before their extent could be ascertained, and it was found difficult to correct them from the eagerness with which persons sought the protection, so called, of the United States, and the reluctance of ministers and consuls to refuse it. No such immunity should be extended to any person not legally entitled to it, and then, as you remark, it should be maintained with firmness in behalf of those upon whom it may have been deliberately and considerably bestowed.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Constantinople, April 25, 1871. (Received May 23.)

SIR : At the present time, the two matters which are attracting most attention in political circles here are the mission of the Archbishop of Thessaly, as Ambassador of the Pope, to settle, if possible, the difficulties of the American Catholic community, and a synod of Bulgarian delegates now in session here, endeavoring to secure an ecclesiastical autonomy. Both efforts are likely to fail, for the pretensions of the Pope are so extensive as to be wholly incompatible with the sovereign rights of the Sultan as well as with the rights claimed by the recalcitrant members of the community; and in the matter of the Bulgarian schism the government has latterly evinced a disposition to withdraw from its former wise position of recognizing the independence of the Bulgarian Church. Whether this retrograde action is due to the influence of Russia, as some pretend, it is impossible to say; but nearly all careful students of eastern politics, of recent years, have agreed in regarding it as a most wise step for Turkey to withdraw the Bulgarians from all foreign associations, civil and religious, and thus draw closer the bonds which unite them to the Porte.

Scarcely any conjunction of circumstances could be more illustrative of the complications which beset this empire than that which exhibits it, not only as a preserver of the peace between the contending sects of the Christian church, but as an arbiter between contending factions of the same sect. To the wisdom of the Sublime Porte, as illuminated by the Koran, it is given to decide how far the Armenian schismatics shall obey the Pope, and the Bulgarian schismatics shall obey the Patriarch, while it is no unusual occurrence for Mahometan policemen to be obliged to prevent members of one Christian sect from killing those of another. Indeed the violence of the Armenians of the Greek faith against the converts to Protestantism is becoming so great that I fear it may spread until it endangers those of our own citizens engaged in the missionary work in some of the more benighted parts of the empire. Within the last fortnight three well-authenticated cases of outrages of this character have been brought to the knowledge of this legation, affecting as yet, however, only the converted subjects of the Porte; but, as I have said, unless this spirit of violence is checked it may extend from those who are converted to those who convert them. In some of these cases the consular agents of Russia and of Greece are alleged to have acted in the most outrageous manner, inciting the mob to violence and promising its members foreign protection; but if such is the case, and it is brought by the Porte to the knowledge of the representatives of these governments here, I am sure that proper punishment will be inflicted upon the offenders. As no American citizen has suffered in any direct manner, I have not felt at liberty to take any official notice of those occurrences; but in an informal and entirely unofficial manner I have mentioned them to the Porte, and suggested the wisdom of preventing repetition of them lest the spirit of discord might spread; and I am happy to say that the Porte has received my suggestions in the kindest spirit, and has manifested an earnest desire to secure the fullest religious liberty for all its Christian subjects.

You will readily appreciate, however, the difficulties with which the subject is surrounded, and especially how seriously it affects the prospect of any important legal reforms. The Greek Church in Turkey regards Russia as its natural protector. The Catholic Church has heretofore regarded France in the same light, while Protestantism has usually looked to the English embassy in time of trouble. Even if foreign officials would not interfere to encourage disturbances of the public peace, they will interfere, directly or indirectly, very often in legal controversies between members of different sects; and if Mussulman judges could be induced to believe Christian witnesses, it is very sure, in any case in which a coreligionist was concerned, Catholic judges would not credit Greek witnesses, nor would Greek judges credit Catholic witnesses, while the testimony of Protestants is that it would be equally unsafe to believe either. Such is the muddle out of which a Mahometan government is asked to extract a coherent system of judicial reform, to be administered subject to the continued interference of the consular agents of the great powers.

We must not be surprised, therefore, if thus far no such system has been devised as promises to afford proper securities for the prompt and impartial administration of justice, for even if trained judges and trained advocates could be provided, the ignorance of great masses of the people inflames their religious animosities until they become incapable of desiring justice, and the constant interference of the agents of foreign powers leads them to look elsewhere than to the tribunals of the country for protection.

WAYNE MACVEAGH.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 5, 1871.

SIR: Your dispatch No. 30, dated 27th March last, has been received and read with interest.

The representations which you state that you have given of the sincerity of the friendship of the Government of the United States for that to which you are accredited, and of the absence of any identification with the policy of European powers, or of any committal to their interests in questions affecting Turkey, are fully approved.

This Government is not disposed to prematurely raise any question to disturb the existing control which Turkey claims over the straits leading into the Euxine. It has observed the acquiescence of other powers whose greater propinquity would suggest more intimate interests in the usage whereby the Porte claims the right to exclude the national vessels of other powers from the passage of those straits.

But while this Government does not deny the existence of the usage, and has had no occasion to question the propriety of its observance, the President deems it important to avoid recognizing it as a right under the law of nations.

The position of Turkey with reference to the Euxine may be compared to that of Denmark with reference to the Baltic, with the difference that the former is sovereign over the soil on both sides of the straits, while Sweden owns the territory on the east of the sound leading to the Baltic.

Commercial nations from the earliest times until recently submitted to the exactions of Denmark of what was called the sound dues, which were ultimately abolished by the payment of a gross sum by each country, proportionate to its tonnage, in the habit of passing the sound.

The legality of the tax when it was levied was, at least, questionable, and probably was acquiesced in from its antiquity merely, though, perhaps, in part from a regard to the comparative weakness of Denmark to resist its collection by the commercial world at large, or by the more powerful nations singly.

We are not aware that Denmark claimed the right to exclude foreign vessels of war from the Baltic merely because in proceeding thither they must necessarily pass within cannon-shot of her shores. If this right has been claimed by Turkey in respect to the Black Sea, it must have originated at a time when she was positively and comparatively in a much more advantageous position to enforce it than she now is. The Black Sea, like the Baltic, is a vast expanse of waters, which wash the shores not alone of Turkish territory, but those of another great power who may, in times of peace, at least, expect visits from men-of-war of friendly states. It seems unfair that any such claim as that of Turkey should be set up as a bar to such an intercourse, or that the privilege should in any way be subject to her sufferance.

There is no practical question making it necessary at present to discuss the subject, but should occasion arise when you are called upon to refer to it, you will bear in mind the distinction taken above, and be cautious to go no further than to recognize the exclusion of the vessels as a usage.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Constantinople, May 8, 1871. (Received June 12.)

SIR: The dispatch of Mr. Tuckerman, our esteemed and accomplished representative at Athens, to the Department of State, dated May 11, 1870, and recently published in the "Diplomatic Correspondence for 1870," on the subject of brigandage in Greece, has attracted considerable attention in the East. The Greek journals have published it quite extensively, and the report that it had given great pleasure to the King increased the general desire to see it. It has accordingly been republished in this capital, where, as you know, there is a large resident Greek population; and it has doubtless thus fallen under the notice of the government of the Sultan. Of course the distinguished statesman who presides over the department of foreign affairs here has not mentioned the subject to me, nor would I have suffered myself to listen to any discussion of the subject; but it is quite generally felt here, outside of the Greek colony, that Mr. Tuckerman was wholly mistaken in declaring that "Greek brigandage was born of Turkish oppression," and in calling the thieves who followed it for profit, alike before and after the independence of Greece, "restless men who fled to the mountains for independence," as well as in his assumption that the work of freeing Athens from brigands must be commenced at Constantinople. The assertions are, indeed, so old, and so commonly received in the West, that it is not astonishing Mr. Tuckerman should have accepted and repeated them; but unfortunately their ill effect is not confined to the gross injustice which is thereby done this government.

It happened, indeed, curiously enough, that between the writing and the publication of Mr. Tuckerman's dispatch it became the duty of the Grand Vizier to refute the same injurious allegations proceeding from other quarters; and, in his dispatch of January 5, 1871, and of which a copy I suppose was handed you by the Turkish chargé d'affaires at Washington, he effectually disposed of the assertion that Turkey had shown any lukewarmness in the suppression of Greek brigandage. He showed also that not only had the freest permission been accorded the Greek troops to cross the Turkish frontier in pursuit of brigands, after the massacre at Marathon, in April, 1870, but that the Turkish troops had in nine months thereafter captured nineteen brigands and killed thirty-four others, who had sought a hiding place on this side of the frontier. Indeed, while this government has many and grave defects, I am convinced that no competent and impartial observer would venture to charge it with any disposition to tolerate such a crime as brigandage; and no better answer can be given to such accusation than the fact that our missionaries live and travel in all parts of the empire in almost entire security, while travel is virtually unobstructed in every part of it. Acts of lawlessness undoubtedly occur here as elsewhere, and the moldering intolerance of rival religious sects may occasionally blaze out with terrible fury; but the general security of life and property compares very favorably with most civilized countries.

In Greece, on the contrary, security is unknown, and the inhabitants of Athens dare hardly step beyond the city limits. Brigandage is there part of the structure of society, and a recognized weapon of political warfare, heretofore always tolerated, often patronized, and occasionally elevated into patriotism, when engaged in irregular warfare to enlarge the limits of Hellas. The root of the trouble really is, that the average moral intelligence of Greece is to-day incapable of seeing that the Greek brigand is a common thief, and therefore to be extirpated as the enemy of society. And it is natural, therefore, that when some atrocious murder raises the indignation of the world, its public men should endeavor to cast the blame elsewhere rather than endeavor to root out the evil.

WAYNE MACVEAGH.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Constantinople, May 15, 1871. (Received June 12.)

SIR: As I propose to avail myself on the 10th of the next month, June, of your kind permission to return home, unless some public necessity should arise in the mean time for my continuance at my post, and the legation after that date will be in the hands of the secretary, Mr. Brown, as chargé d'affaires, it has occurred to me that you might care to know, before I leave, the condition of political affairs now prevailing here.

both as regards the internal condition of the empire itself and its relations to its vassal provinces. It is to the latter consideration that I intend to confine the present dispatch. With regard to the tributary provinces in Europe, the government of the Sultan ordinarily feels little concern. The relations with Montenegro are entirely nominal; they are almost equally so with Servia, and are so also with Roumania, in times of peace and internal order in these respective provinces themselves. It is only when foreign agents or native politicians succeed in creating disturbances which threaten the public peace that they become objects of interest to the Porte; and even then less from a desire for interference than from the necessity of avoiding a pretext for the interference of other powers. The bonds which unite these provinces to the suzerain authority are so light and so little felt, that no disposition is supposed to exist to cast them off in the provinces themselves; but inasmuch as they are too weak to maintain their independence, other and neighboring powers might be interested in sowing the seeds of disaffection in the hope of absorbing them after they had renounced their allegiance to the Sultan, or of an armed occupation for the maintenance of the public tranquillity, which might ripen into annexation.

A glance at the map will show what an immense temptation existed for Russia and Austria to divide Roumania between them, and what peril to the integrity of this empire existed in the continued agitation of the question of nationality among the southern slave. Many persons here, however, affect to believe that these perils have disappeared for the present in the presence of the graver question, whether the valley of the Danube is to be German or Russian. It is not now seen how the coveted territory can be divided or the question compromised; and in that event, there may be a long postponement of it under the suzerainty of the Porte. At present there is no ground of dispute whatever between this government and any one of these provinces, and even in Roumania the party of the reigning prince has secured such a majority in the recent elections as promises the continuance of quiet and order for some time to come. The relations with the tributary provinces of Asia are not quite so satisfactory, and chiefly, I suppose, because of their Moslem population, much more sensitiveness is felt by the Porte on the subject of their loyal behavior. Indeed, "La Pârgine," which assumes to be a kind of national organ, never wearies of enforcing the duty of the Sultan to secure what it calls "The Unity of Islam" by availing himself of the repeated misconduct of the Viceroy of Egypt and the Bey of Tunis to dispossess them, and incorporate these provinces once more with the integral part of the empire. The grand chamberlain has just returned from a special mission to Cairo, to require the cessation of the building of forts and the preparation of torpedoes for the coast of Egypt and the Suez Canal, and brings the most positive assurances from the Khedive of his submission to the will of his august master. The Bey of Tunis is reported to be equally obedient in words, but, in truth, both vassals long to throw off the yoke of their vassalage, and make tentatives in that direction continually. One day it is by an attempt to enter into diplomatic relations with foreign powers directly, and the next day by contracting a loan without the sanction of the suzerain, or some other attempted exercise of sovereign authority; and while heretofore many of these acts of quasi rebellion have been overlooked, the present tendency of the Porte is that of vigilant and prompt repression of any attempt on the part of either of these provinces to overstep the limits of their delegated authority. Jealousies will thus necessarily arise from time to time, but this government seems to feel the most ample confidence in the ability of its army and its navy to enforce without delay the mandates of the sovereign in any of the outlying provinces of the empire. When Prince Charles threatened to abdicate and leave Roumania a prey to its intestine factions, the Porte immediately proposed an army of occupation, thirty thousand strong, under the then disguise of a camp of instruction at "Shumla," and only needed the sanction of the protesting powers, as provided by the treaty, to exhibit its power to maintain its authority on the most northern border. When the insurrection of the Assyr tribes, on its most southern border, broke out, a well-equipped army was at once dispatched to the scene of disorder, whose rapid marches and signal victories have not only quelled all disturbances in that disaffected region, but have also taught a most useful lesson to the Khedive, who is suspected of being the real author of the rebellion. The territory has been erected into a province, with the victorious general for governor, and it is expected that a permanent force will be maintained there as a wholesome influence at once upon Egypt and Arabia. You will see, therefore, that at present and outwardly the relations between the government of the Sultan and its vassal provinces are entirely peaceful and satisfactory, and that it is only with regard to the Moslem provinces that an under-current of suspicion exists, but that, with respect to them all alike, the Porte is at present more than ever determined to maintain in their full vigor the limited relations of dependence now existing, and is also more than ever confident of its ability to do so.

No. 38.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Constantinople, May 26, 1871. (Received June 19.)

SIR: In accordance with the intimation contained in my last dispatch, I propose in the present communication to state briefly for your information the actual condition of the internal affairs of this empire. At present the hold of the Grand Vizier upon the political power of the government seems even more firm than at any former period. At peace with all the world and with a new guarantee in the recent treaty of London for the territorial integrity of the empire, Turkey can afford to await the growth of the antagonism which is assumed to be inevitable between Russia and Germany upon the eastern question, and to find safety perhaps for many years behind it. Such appears to be the general idea in government circles here, while in the mean time ample opportunity and leisure will be afforded for the carrying forward of such reforms of internal administration as will give to the Porte the strength of a well-ordered and civilized state. Alas! if the performance would only equal the promise, the realization of the picture would not be difficult, but there is in eastern character such a disposition to postpone matters which are disagreeable, and to allow the future to care for itself, that it is impossible to be sanguine of the future of this country. Certain great advantages it already possesses, among them absolute equality of rights and absolute liberty of conscience; and the value of these two blessings it is almost impossible to exaggerate, especially in the peculiar situation of Turkey. The government has also acquired the habit, owing doubtless in great part to the influence of the capitulations, of great kindness in its dealings with foreigners, which is fitly illustrated by admission free of duty of all articles for the use of the missionaries, and its granting of special grounds for their religious houses, as well as the exemption of their churches and missions from taxation. Of course the bigotry of the Moslems in some parts of the empire is still fierce, and another massacre like that of Damascus, in 1860, is still a possibility here, but unquestionably at present there is far less bitterness manifested by the Moslems toward the Christians than from some of the Christian sects toward others; and the policy as well as the professions of the government is steadily and firmly on the side of the fullest and freest toleration. Indeed, it is now proposed to remove the last bridge of distinction between the Mussulman and the non-Mussulman subjects of the Sultan, that of service in the army, and to include within the limits of the conscription all owing allegiance to the Porte, without distinction of religion. The conduct of the army in the recent suppression of the Assyr revolt was excellent, as was the entire management of the expedition, showing a degree of general efficiency far greater than was supposed to exist. Its probable strength is about one hundred and twenty thousand men, with a capacity for a very quick increase from the reserve to two hundred and fifty thousand men, and is well supplied with artillery. It is, therefore, quite competent to deal with any complications likely to arise within the empire in a summary and satisfactory manner. The navy is in equally serviceable condition for any of the ordinary or probable exigencies of the empire. Of iron-clad vessels there are five frigates, nine corvettes, and five gun-boats, and a large wooden fleet, including five ships of the line, while at present the manufacture of torpedoes for marine purposes is being actively pursued. Those great monopolies of modern civilization, the post, the telegraph, and the railway, have also received attention. The two former services, once inaugurated, are sure to push their way into popular favor, and secure their extension, wherever the necessity for their use exists, and perhaps the defects of their present administration here are less proper subjects of surprise than their existence is of congratulation.

The same remarks are applicable to the railway system also, though far more important results are likely to flow from it in the general increase of the stability as well as of the resources of the country. The Roumelian railways, connecting the capital by way of Adrianople with the European system, are expected to be completed during 1872, and special attention is now being given to the great project of connecting this city with the Persian Gulf by the valley of the Euphrates. If these purposes are realized a continuous line of railway will traverse the whole breadth of European and Asiatic Turkey, and "thrust, as it were, an iron girder right through the wide arch" of the Ottoman dominions. Of course branches would soon multiply both in Roumelia and in Asia Minor, and would exert an almost magical influence in the development and improvement of the entire empire.

Various attempts have also been made at legal reform, but thus far without any considerable success. The failure is partly owing, no doubt, to foreign interference in the withdrawal of a considerable portion of the population from responsibility to the laws of the country in which they choose to permanently reside. Every day a half dozen courts of as many different nationalities are in session here and elsewhere throughout the empire, administering as many different systems of laws. In many instances these litigations are between persons who were born, have always lived, and desire to die and be buried in Turkey; and yet, by a pretext of protection, or by some pretense of naturalization, they assume to be subjects of some foreign power, and thus escape the jurisdiction of the local tribunals of the empire.

The evils sure to flow from such abuses were felt to be so serious by the plenipotentiaries assembled at Paris in 1856, that they unanimously agreed upon the necessity of revising the conditions imposed by the capitulations, and Count Cavour pronounced himself in favor of their immediate abolition. While, however, they doubtless seriously obstruct all efforts at thorough legal reform, other obstacles equally serious exist in the utter absence of competent judges, of trained advocates, and of a public opinion which recognizes the absolute necessity of an impartial and independent administration of justice. All these requisites are of slow growth, they can neither be imported nor forced, and until they exist it is to be feared that the well-meaning and repeated efforts in these directions which the Porte makes from time to time will not bear much fruit. And yet the lack of a proper system of law and an impartial administration of it, and the lack of a proper financial system, to which I called your attention at some length in a former dispatch, these are the two most grave evils which afflict the Ottoman Empire and threaten its ruin. The theoretical despotism of the Sultan is so tempered in the actual administration of the government and by the interference of the foreign representatives as to be almost practically harmless, while the cardinal vice of polygamy is rarely practiced out of the larger towns, and has therefore less ruinous effects than would be supposed, and indeed it is hoped that it is gradually diminishing, and with it the degradation of woman, which is perhaps hardly less dangerous to the state.

* * * * *

In any event it ought always to be a source of sincere pride to Americans to reflect, apart from any sectarian or even religious bias, upon the great and good work our fellow countrymen and countrywomen have done and are still doing for the improvement, elevation, and enlightenment of the various populations of this empire. Apart even from their labors of evangelization, they leave indelible impressions of their work and its usefulness in the increased desire for knowledge, in the introduction of western ideas of life and growth, in the distribution of printed matter, and above all in the schools they establish, which are altogether the most hopeful signs I see of the future of the East, while, as the natural development of these, numerous small district schools have arisen, "The Protestant College" in Syria, and "The Robert College" on the Bosphorus, which are sure to be fit guardians of the name and honor of our country and to secure for her the benedictions of the coming generations.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of letter addressed to this legation by Mr. J. W. Hancox, president of the Venezuela Steam Transportation Company, detailing the facts in reference to the seizure of the vessels of that company at Ciudad Bolivar, to which the attention of the Department is respectfully solicited.

I have asked the United States consul at Ciudad Bolivar for an official report of the facts in this case within his knowledge; and, as I am informed that the United States consuls at Martinique and Guadaloupe have been applied to by our vice-consul at Trinidad to send a naval steamer to investigate this matter, I have written to the commander of our West India squadron a statement of the facts, and requested him, in case a vessel is sent, that it be ordered to report at La Guayra for conference with me previous to going to the Oronoco River. I shall bring this matter to the attention of this government as soon as I am formally received, and will promptly communicate to the Department any further information I may receive in reference thereto.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that I am president of the Venezuela Steam Transportation Company, a company organized under the laws of the State of New York.

That this company owns the steamer Dudley Buck, plying between La Guayra and Trinidad, the steamer Hero, connecting with the Dudley Buck, and plying between Port of Spain and Ciudad Bolivar. That this company further owns the steamers Nutrias and San Fernando, plying between Ciudad Bolivar and Nutrias on the rivers Oronoco and Apure.

That all these steamers are permitted to carry their national flag by special agreement with the existing government of Venezuela, and only upon this condition the company has consented to navigate their waters. The steamer Hero left Trinidad duly cleared for Ciudad Bolivar, on the 26th of August, and while on her voyage up the Oronoco, opposite a place called Guayana la Vieja, was boarded by about two hundred armed men, calling themselves Blues or revolutionists, the officers were overpowered and the vessel captured. The officers, American citizens, with pistols presented to their heads, were forced to navigate the steamer as directed, and the steamer was forcibly carried to a place called Soledad, opposite to Ciudad Bolivar, and the captain was imprisoned in his state-room. The steamer Nutrias, lying at her moorings at Ciudad Bolivar, was forcibly taken possession of by the legitimate government, converted into an armed vessel, and opened a naval engagement against the steamer Hero, causing the Hero to suffer serious damage.

The undersigned was on board of the steamer San Fernando, a new boat making her first trip up the river Oronoco, and arrived at Ciudad Bolivar at 2 p. m. on Sunday, September 3; found the town in possession of the revolutionary party; also the steamer

Hero with armed soldiers on board. I immediately had the necessary proofs of capture and imprisonment certified by the American consul, John Dalton, esq. I then demanded from the chief who governed the city, the release of the steamer Hero, which was peremptorily refused, and continued to exercise all the influence at my command toward the release of the steamer, until the 5th instant, on which day I was notified that if I would comply with their conditions the Hero would be allowed to return to Port of Spain, viz:

1st. That the Hero should return from Port of Spain on the 10th, and resume her regular trips.

2d. That the Nutrias, which had been carried off by the legitimate government with government officers on board, to Trinidad, should return.

3d. That I should use my influence to stop the steamer Dudley Buck from running from Trinidad to Laguayra.

These were only such conditions which prisoners, as I considered myself and the officers, could accept. The importance of communicating with the United States by the mail-packet ship which was to leave Trinidad on the 8th September, and to preserve my property, gave me no choice but to accept their conditions, which they declared must be in writing, and, through one of their chiefs, my word as a mason. I left on the morning of the 6th and arrived in Trinidad in time to connect with the mail of the 8th instant, by which I had the consul's dispatches forwarded. Copy of his telegram to Secretary Fish I herewith inclose.

I returned with the Hero to Ciudad Bolivar, according to agreement, on the 10th September, and the Nutrias left Trinidad on the 13th instant. On my arrival at Ciudad Bolivar I found the steamer San Fernando in possession of the military powers, and on the 14th instant, with the American flag struck, she left on a military expedition up the rivers Oronoco and Apure. To save the vessel, I prevailed upon the master and engineer to remain on board as long as permitted. I left with the Hero on the 17th instant.

As the steamer Dudley Buck is, by special contract of the company, bound to and with Captain Trevirianas to make regular trips to transmit the government mails, my influence, according to agreement, could not prevent him from making this trip.

Your honor has now before you an unvarnished statement of facts; the proof of nearly all is now in the hands of the United States Government. That our Government will act promptly I cannot doubt, and it will be the only means of saving the vessels in these waters, as an attack, now contemplated by the legitimate government upon Ciudad Bolivar, will, without doubt, destroy our steamers.

I beg and pray of your excellency to make use of every means at your command to protect and save from loss our vessels, for if the stars and stripes, our pride and glory, are no guarantee to Americans in any or every clime, I say for one, let me hoist a piece of calico in its stead.

I have, &c., &c.,

J. W. HANCOX.

Mr. John Dalton to Mr. Fish.

U. S. CONSULATE AT CIUDAD BOLIVAR, STATE OF GUAYANA, VENEZUELA.
September 6, 1871.

SIR: Two American steamers, namely, Hero and Nutrias, have been seized by retreating forces in Venezuela. American citizens, officers of said steamers, are prisoners. Property and lives of Americans and other foreign residents are in danger.

Full particulars of these outrages forwarded by mail to you.

National dignity and humanity compel me to apply to you for due protection, to be granted at the earliest convenience.

JOHN DALTON,
United States Consul.

No. 2.

Mr. Edward H. Fitt to Mr. Jas. R. Partridge.

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
Trinidad, September 5, 1871. (Received October 31.)

SIR: I have the honor to inclose declaration on oath of D. L. Sturges, master of the United States steamer Nutrias, as also of Joseph Edny and John Lovell, first and second engineers of the same vessel.

You will perceive that the Nutrias was taken possession of by President Dalla Costa of the State of Guayana, and converted into a vessel of war for the purpose of destroying the American steamer Hero, which, it is said, was in possession of the other belligerent party.

The Nutrias, which had two guns on board, discharged several cannon-shots at the Hero to prevent her landing the troops which she had on board.

As soon as Ciudad Bolivar was in the possession of the party styling themselves the Blues, the government officers on board of the Nutrias ordered Captain Sturges to sail for this port, where he arrived in the morning of the 3d September. On arrival Captain Sturges went on board Her Majesty's ship Cherub to claim the protection of that vessel, which was granted to him, or he would have been compelled by the government officers to proceed in search of the Venezuelan steamer of war Oriente, for the purpose of transferring the officers, men, and arms which she had conveyed from Bolivar.

I have applied to the consuls at Martinique and Guadalonpe to send an American steamer of war to Bolivar to investigate these matters without delay, and afford protection to any American citizens who may require it.

In conjunction with other consuls of this port, I applied to the governor of this island to order Her Britannic Majesty's ship Cherub to proceed to Bolivar, for the purpose of affording an asylum to any foreign citizens who might be in need of protection. This he declined doing unless we could produce evidence that the lives of any of the foreign citizens were in danger. As we could not produce this evidence, there the matter ended.

On receipt of further information from Ciudad Bolivar I will communicate it to you. I may add, the Hero, due yesterday, has not yet appeared. It is reported that when the Nutrias left Bolivar she appeared to be on fire. I cannot vouch for the correctness of this information. I think it expedient that measures should be promptly taken to investigate these occurrences.

I will communicate with the Department of State by the mail that leaves here on the 8th instant.

Mr. J. W. Haucocx, president of the Venezuela Steam Transportation Company, is with the steamer San Fernando up the Oronoco River.

I have, &c., &c.,

EDWARD H. FITT,
United States Vice-Consul.

No. 414.

By the President of the United States of America.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas satisfactory evidence was given to me on the 17th day of this month by the government of Portugal that the discriminating duties heretofore levied in the ports of Portugal on merchandise imported in vessels of the United States into said ports from other countries than those of which said merchandise was the growth, production, or manufacture have been abolished:

Now, therefore, I, Ulysses Grant, President of the United States of America, by virtue of the authority vested in me by an act of Congress of January 7, 1824, and by an act in addition thereto of May 24, 1828, do hereby declare and proclaim that the discriminating duties heretofore levied in ports of the United States upon merchandise imported in Portuguese vessels from countries other than those of which such merchandise is the growth, produce, or manufacture, shall be and are hereby suspended and discontinued, this suspension or discontinuance to take effect on and after the said 17th day of this month, and to continue so long as the reciprocal exemption of merchandise belonging to citizens of the United States from such discriminating duties shall be granted in the ports of Portugal.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this twenty-fifth day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-one, and of the Independence of the United States of America the ninety-fifth.

[L. s.]

U. S. GRANT.
